Foot and Horse, and Ships by Sea: They promised him likewise the Kingdom of Judea, after they had finished the War, that was at that time betwixt them, and Anthony, and Caesar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipater's power, determined to destroy him; and having corrupted Hircanus's Butler with Money (with whom both of them celebrated a Feast) he poisoned him, and afterwards assembling many Soldiers about him, he made himself Master of the City. When Herod and Phasaelus understood the traitorous conspiracy attempted against their Father, they were grievously incensed against Malichus. But he denied all, and especial abjured the intent or practice of the murder. Thus died Antipater a just and virtuous man, and such an one as dearly loved his Country. But Herod who was his younger son, immediately resolved to revenge his fathers death, and came forth with an Army against Malichus: But Phasaelus, who was the elder, resolved to circumvent him by policy, lest he should raise a Civil War. He therefore accepted of Malichus's justifications, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no manner contrived Antipater's death, and only minded his Fathers Monument and Funerals. Mean while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in a desperate condition, restored the same, and pacified the dissensions that were amongst the Inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a Feast) he came to Jerusalem with his Soldiers. Malichus being afraid of his access, persecuted Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the City: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alledging, that amongst the holy People it was not lawful to intermix a Troop of polluted Men. But Herod lighted them that brought him this news, and notwithstanding his command, entered the City by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his ordinary diffimulation, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater his especial friend; but under-hand he prepared a guard for his own safety. Notwithstanding it was thought fit by Herod's friends, to take no notice of his diffimulation; but to make shew that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

CHAP. XX.

Cassius at Herod's entreaty, sends orders to the Commanders of the Roman Troops, to revenge Antipater's death; they slay Malichus, Felix who commands the Roman Garrison in Jerusalem, attacketh Phasaelus, who reduceth him to capitulate.

Herod having assured Cassius of Antipater's fathers death, he knowing very well of what a wicked man Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he should revenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret Letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and assist Herod in that just execution which he intended. After that Cassius had taken Laodicea, and the Inhabitants of the Country came together, bringing with them Crowns and Silver to present him, Herod expecting that Malichus should receive his punishment there, but Malichus mistrusting their designs when he was drawing near to Tyre in Phenicia, he contrived a greater enterprize. For whereas his son was a hostage in Tyre, he entered the City to draw him thence, and afterwards return into Judea; taking that opportunity by reason of Cassius's troubles (who marched to meet with Anthony) he resolved to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himself Lord of the Country: but God disappointed his unjust purposes: For Herod being a man of a ripe judgment, immediately discovered his intention, and sent one of his servants before, under the notion to prepare a banquet, because he had told him formerly that he would entertain all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the Captains, to command them to go out with their Daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth, and meeting with him near the shore, he stabbed him. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that through amazement he grew speechless: and being much moved, he demanded of Herod's men how this accident had happened, and who it was that had killed Malichus; which having heard, and how nothing was done without Cassius's command: he answered that all was well done, Malichus being a wicked Man, and a Traitor to his Country. See here how Malichus was justly punished for the wickedness he committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was gone out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Judea: for Felix, who was left in Jerusalem with an Army, marched forth against Phasaelus, and all the people were in arms. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, Governor of Damascus, and intending to succor his brother, was prevented by a sickness: so that Phasaelus obtaining a victory by his own forces against Felix, enclosed him up in a Tower, whence afterwards he dismissed him under composition. Whereupon he grievously rebuked Hircanus, that being forgetful of divers good offices which he had received by

by him, he had given aid unto his enemies. For Malichus's brother being at that time A revolted, planted Garisons in divers Fortresses, and namely in Madaba, which was the strongest of them all. As soon as Herod had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of divers places that he held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods.

ANTIGONUS, Aristobulus's son, got an Army together, and hired Fabius; Ptolemy Menneus adopted Antigonus for being of his near relations. He was also assisted by Marion, whom Cassius had made Governor of Tyre and tyrannized over Syria, having put Garisons in several places of it, and had taken possession of three places in Galilee, which bordered with his Country. Herod also marching forth against him, dispossessed him of them all; and graciously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing Presents on some of them, for the love he bare unto their City. And that done, he came and encountered with Antigonus, and fought him, and overcame him before he had scarcely entred on the marches of Judea, and drove him from thence. Being come in triumph to Jerusalem, Hircanus and all the People honoured him with Crowns. For Hircanus look'd upon him as one of his Family, because he was to marry Marianna, daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, Hircanus's daughter: on whom he begat three sons and two daughters. Before her also he had married a Wife of his own Nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest son.

ANTONIUS and Cæsar having overcome Cassius, near unto the City of Philippi; Cæsar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Italy, Embassadors resorted to him from all parts: Thither also repaired certain principal Men among the Jews, to accuse Phasaelus and Herod; saying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdom. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him, to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause, they that were his adversaries could obtain no Audience: for Herod had bought that privilege from them with his Money. As soon as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the High-Priest, and all our Nation presently sent an Embassador unto him, with a Crown of Gold; requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Cassius had taken Prisoners (contrary to the law of Arms) might be set at liberty, and that their Country, which was taken from them in Cassius's time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Jews had proposed, were reasonable, wrote back presently to the High-Priest Hircanus and the Jews; and sent an Edict also to the Tyrians, to this effect:

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to Hircanus High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, Health:

Lysimachus the son of Paulanias, and Joseph the son of Mennæus, and Alexander the son of Theodore, your Embassadors came unto me to Ephesus, and have renewed the same Embassage which they heretofore brought to Rome, and at this present likewise they have duly and faithfully acquitted themselves of the Embassage which they present in the behalf of you, and your Nation, by giving us to understand what affection you bear towards us: so that I esteem you for our friend, since I understand how friendly you have behaved yourself towards us, both in words and deeds. For when our adversaries and enemies of the Roman Nation spoiled all the Country of Asia, and without regard of their Oaths, spared neither Cities nor temples; we have opposed our selves against them, not only for our private respect, but in the quarrel of the Common-weal, to punish the authors of such offences committed against Men, and of such impieties perpetrated against God: for which we sup-

HPOSE, that the Sun hath in a manner obscured himself; by beholding with unwilling eyes what an heinous offence was committed against Cæsar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the Country and Air, from whence proceed such detestable designs: and we have likewise cut off the course of their desperate resolution, which made them encounter us near to Philippi, a City of Macedonia, where we seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with mountains as if it were with walls, as far as the Sea, so that the passage was barred up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us may by resisting their unjust exploits, and furthering ours. Brutus is likewise compelled to flee to Philippi, where being besieged by us, he suffered with his Comitatus, and since they have been punished as they deserved; we hope for the future to enjoy peace and tranquility, and that Asia shall be delivered from all the miseries of War, and as for your part, you may assure your selves, that both you and your Country, shall have your share in this happiness, because we have so great a kindness for you to lose any opportunity to procure your advantage, and all the body thereof seems to be relieved from a grievous malady, by means of our victory: We have already sent Letters from City to City, to the intent that if any one among you, either captive or free-man, have been sold to the utmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that Army, they may be set at liberty. And our will is, that you reap the fruits of all the favours that we and Dolabella have granted you: forbidding the Tyrians to molest you, and commanding them to restore all that which they have taken from the Jews, in goods or possessions. As for the Crown which you sent me, I accept of it.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors Senate, and People of Tyre, Health: I have been informed in Ephesus by Hircanus's Embassadors (who is High-Priest and Prince of the Jews) that you have seized on their Country, and spoiled the same, when our adversary held that Province. But as we have undertaken the War for the Empire, and in defence of Justice and Piety, we have punished these ungrateful, disloyal and perfidious persons. Our will is, that you suffer our allies to live in peace; and as touching that which you have obtained of our adversaries; our pleasure is, that you restore the same to those that are dispossessed. For none of them had obtained either Province or Army by the consent of the Senate; but had usurped them by force, and afterwards bestowed them on those who have been Ministers of their impieties and injustice. But since they have been punished according to their desert, we require that our Allies enjoy their own, without any hindrance: and if you hold any places at this present, which belong to Hircanus Prince of the Jews (that were seized since the time that Caius Cassius by an unjust War invaded our Provinces) restore them unto him, without offering to hinder him from the possession of his own. And if you have, or pretend to have any right in them, when I shall repair to those places, it shall be lawful for you to debate your right, and we will so judge, that our allies shall receive no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors, Senate, and People of Tyre, Health: I have sent you my Edict, my pleasure is that you carefully consider it, and that you register it among your publick Records, in Roman and Greek letters, and set it up in Writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all Men.

Marcus Antonius Emperor and Triumvir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for their publick affairs, hath declared, That Caius Cassius during the troubles, by the assistance of his Soldiers, hath usurped another mans Province; and hath in like sort spoiled our Allies, and hath ransacked the Nation of the Jews, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valor, we have repressed his insolence, by our Edicts and Judgments we will correct his offences, to the end that all things may be restored to our Allies, and that all whatsoever hath been sold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be Prisoners or Possessions) be restored to their Masters; to the end that each Man may be at liberty as he was before, and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure is, That whosoever disobeyeth this Ordinance, he may be punished accordingly. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians; all which we will infer in a convenient place, to testify what account the Romans made of our Nation.

After this Antonius went into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him near unto Silicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time also, One hundred of the chiefest among the Jews came in Embassage to him to accuse Herod and Phasaelus; they had chosen the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise undertook the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied unto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphne, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties governed the Common-wealth best? who returned him answer, That they who were on Herod's side, were most studious of the publick good. Antonius (who long since had born a good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitality that he had received of their father, during the time Gabinus was in Judea) established them both Governors of the fourth part, committing to their hands the affairs in Judea: and to this effect wrote Letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to prison; had not Herod interceded for their lives, he had condemned them to death. Notwithstanding this, as soon as they returned from their Embassage, they could not contain themselves in quiet, but resorted once more unto Antonius, to the number of 10000, to the City of Tyre, where Antonius was, but Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadors of the Jews should be punished, for that they had attempted to make new disturbances, and he confirmed Herod's Government. At that time Herod walking by the Sea side, came unto them, advising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to give over their appeal, lest some misfortune should befall them. Which they not regarding, certain Jews and Inhabitants of that City, all at once ran upon them, killed some of them, and hurt others, and the rest taking their flight towards their Country, ever afterwards contained themselves and lived in quiet, through the fear he had conceived. But when the people ceased not to exclaim and protest against Herod, Antonius was so displeased, that he commanded all those whom he held prisoners to be put to death.

The year after Pacorus the Kings son, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. About this time Ptolemy died, the son of Mennaeus; and his son Lyfias reigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the son of Aristobulus, who obtained his favor at his hands, by the counsel and sollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIV.

Antigonus being assisted by the Parthians, beseegeth Phasaelus and Herod in the Palace of Jerusalem, but in vain. Hircanus and Phasaelus are persuaded to repair to Barzapharnes.

Antigonus having promised the Parthians to give them One thousand Talents of Silver, and five hundred Women, if so be they would deprive Hircanus of the Kingdom, and restore it unto him, and withal, put Herod and his friends to death. The Parthians undertook it, and marched towards Judea, though they had not received as yet any of Antigonus's Money. Pachorus led his Troops along the Sea-coast, and Barzapharnes conducted his more within the Land. The Tyrians shut their Gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolomaidians received him into their City. He sent a body of Horse into Jewry, to discover the estate of the Country, and to give succors to Antigonus. The commander of these Horse was the Kings chief Cup-bearer, who was also called Pacorus. Certain Jews (inhabiting about the Carmel) joined themselves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his Enemies, he conceived some hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the Country under his Government, which is called Dryme: and other Jews joining with him in the way, persuaded him to press forward as far as Jerusalem; where being seconded by others, and his followers already much increased in number, they put themselves in a posture to assault the Kings Palace. The two Brothers, viz. Phasaelus and Herod with their follow-

Followers attacked them in the Market-place, repulsed the Enemy, and drove him into the Temple. Which done, they sent armed men into the houses near adjoining to guard them; but the people rushing in upon them, and seeing they were destitute of arms, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this cruelty of theirs was presently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, killed a great number of them. And whereas there were daily skirmishes between both parties, the enemies expected until the people (assembled from all parts of the Country) should repair to Jerusalem, to celebrate the Feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who seized both the Temple and the City; except the Kings house only, which Herod made good with a few Men of War. The Wall thereof Phasaelus his Brother defended. Herod with a company of his followers fell out upon the Enemy, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, he put divers thousands of them to flight, whereof some retired into the City; others into the Temple; the rest into a certain Bulwark near at hand. In this battle Phasaelus shewed no little valor.

Pacorus Conductor of the Parthians, came into the City with some few Horsemen at Antigonus's request, making shew that he came to appease the sedition; but the scope of his coming was, to obtain the sovereignty for Antigonus. After that Phasaelus was come out to meet him, and courteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to go Embassador with him to Barzapharnes, intending under this pretence to surprize him. He suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded, notwithstanding that Herod milked the course, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assist Pacorus, and to assault, and oppress his Forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheless, Hircanus and Phasaelus undertook this Embassage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundred Horsemen, and Ten of those whom they call Free-men) conducted the Embassadors. Now as soon as they came into Galilee, the Governors of the Cities in that Country, came forth armed to meet them: Barzapharnes also at the first gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with Presents; but shortly after he began to practise treachery. For Phasaelus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adjoined the Sea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus had promised One thousand Talents, and Five hundred Virgins to the Parthians, he began already to suspect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treasons intended against him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beset with a Guard. And surely they had been surprised, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jerusalem) should have seized on Herod, fearing lest he having an inkling of their disaster, should betake himself to flight. This was shortly confirmed to be true by the guards that arrived: For which cause there were some of Phasaelus's friends, who counselled him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his Horse, and fly from thence: and amongst the rest, Osfius was most earnest, who had discovered this plot, by Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that road hard by, to further their flight.) Phasaelus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his Brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to use these sinister practices against him. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, than from Antigonus; and that it was an intolerable injustice to put Embassadors to death, who came unto him upon his honour, and had no ways offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things protested, by an Oath, that not one point of that which he had suspected was true; whereupon he presently went to Pacorus.

CHAP. XXV.

Phasaelus killeth himself. The King of the Arabian's ingratitude towards Herod; he goeth to Rome.

As soon as Barzapharnes was gone, some of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phasaelus prisoners, who mightily detested his perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent unto Herod, had instructions given him to intice him without the City Walls, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain Messengers (who were sent by Phasaelus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemy in the way, and Herod getteth notice thereof, he addressed himself to Pacorus (and those in greatest authority among the Parthians) who subtly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him, that he should do well to repair with them without the Wall, to go and meet those Messengers, who brought him Letters; who had not as yet been seized by their adversaries, but came to acquaint him that Phasaelus was well. But Herod gave them no credit, because he was already otherwise ways advertised of his brothers surprisal, and had also far greater suspicion of the Parthians, by the solicitation of Hircanus's daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise woman. Now whilst the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a man) they deferred the whole matter until the next morning. Whilst thus they were debating of their differences, Herod, who rather gave credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) than to his adversaries; as soon as it was night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without slaying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those Forces he had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexander's daughter) the niece of Antipater and her mother (who was Hircanus's daughter (and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumaea without suspicion of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard-hearted, who seeing such a pitiful spectacle, could not be moved to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their Country with tears and complaints; and that which was worse, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redress.

But Herod mistered these misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and securest conservation depended: whereupon they for their part endeavoured themselves to digest their griefs, according to Herod's exhortation. Mean while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himself, by reason of the Chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned, and had almost slain her; yea so much did this casualty terrify him (for fear lest the enemy in pursuit should surprize him during these delays) so that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers (step in to him, and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the enemies violence: assuring him, that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his friends danger. By these persuasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was over-ruled by the multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will, so that taking up his mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and nearest means he could he retired toward the Castle of Masfada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, but he always got the victory. The Jews also pursued him during his flight; for scarcely had he travelled sixty furlongs out of the City, but that they assailed him in the high-way: but he put them to flight, and obtained the victory, not like a desperate man, enforced thereunto through necessity, but like a discreet, clear couraged, and valiant Soldier. So that in the very place where he obtained the victory against the Jews (after he was made King) he builded a most sumptuous Palace, and a City, which he called Herodium. Whilst he remained at Rosfa (a borough of Idumaea) Joseph his brother came forth to meet him, and to consult with him concerning their present condition, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed him, considering that they had no Soldiers in pay, and the Castle of Masfada, (whither they intended too fly) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many, to the number of Nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the Country of Idumaea, and for the better dispatch of their journey, he furnished them with victuals. As for himself, he took with him his most able Soldiers and Friends, and repaired to the Castle of Masfada (in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of Eight hundred, or thereabouts, and furnishing the place with Corn, Water, and other Provisions necessary, he went unto Petra, the chiefest City of Arabia. As soon as it was day, the Parthians plundered all that Herod left in Jerusalem; and amongst other things, they spoiled the Palace; but they medled not with Hircanus's money, which amounted to some 300 Talents. They left divers other things them behind also that appertained to Herod, and especially that which had been transported into Idumaea by his providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the spoil of the City, but they foraged all the Country round about, and ruined Marissa a very rich City.

Thus

H Thus Antigenus, brought back into his Country by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phasaelus that were Prisoners: yet he was vehemently displeased, because the women was escaped, whom according to his promise he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing lest Hircanus through the favor of the people should be re-established in his Kingdom (who then was Prisoner in the custody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Priesthood any more, by reason of that maim, because the Law commanded that they who are in that dignity should be sound in all their members. But Phasaelus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for understanding that he must needs die, he was no ways disheartened with death, but that which he esteemed most miserable and dishonourable was, that he must needs die by the hands of his Enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not dispatch himself by other means, (because he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains against a stone, and so ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in such a desperate estate) depriving his Enemy of that power which he intended to practise in tyrannizing over him at his pleasure: It is said, that the wound being very deep, Antigenus sent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they should put poison into the same, where-through he might die. But before Phasaelus gave up the ghost, he understood by a certain woman that his brother Herod had escaped from his Enemies: for which cause he endured his death with far greater cheerfulness and constancy, seeing that he left behind him such a man as would revenge his death, and punish his Enemies. But Herod was no ways discomfited with the greatness of those adversities which invironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to find out new inventions, and to adventure considerable attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom formerly he had shewed much courtesy) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great necessity, and to draw some money from him, either by interest or gift. For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured to redeem him speedily from his Enemies, by paying his Ransom (which amounted to Three hundred Talents) and for that cause he led with him the son of Phasaelus, who was only seven years old, to leave him in pledge amongst the Arabians for the sum that was demanded. But certain messengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoyed him that he should neither receive nor retain Herod; And used this colourable pretence, because he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was perswaded by the advice of the greatest in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themselves masters of that treasure that Antipater had committed to their custody. Herod answered them, That he repaid not into their Country to give them cause of any trouble, but only to consult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own estate, and that afterwards he was resolved to depart, and withdraw himself into Egypt as secretly as might be possible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers; and the next day he came to Rhinocoura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himself of his ingratitude, and speedily sent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten far on his way, and was already arrived near to Pelusion: where being denied his passage of the place, who highly respected and honoured him, and sent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithstanding she could not persuade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithstanding the Winter, and those grievous troubles that at the very same time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himself therefore to sail into Pamphilia, he was tost with a most cruel storm; so that with great danger at last he arrived in Rhodes, having been enforced in the tempest to cast into the Sea great part of his goods. There he met with Sapphirus and Ptolemy, two of his endeared friends. He found also the City of Rhodes had suffered much misery by Cassius's Wars: and although his means were very short, yet he helped them in what he might, and caused their Walls to be repaired, notwithstanding that by so doing he greatly hindered himself. After that, he caused a little Frigate to be built, and embarked himself with his friends to repair into Italy, and arrived at Arundisium, and from thence went to Rome. The first to whom he discovered his misfortunes, was Marcus Antonius: to whom he reported all the occurrences in Judea: and how his brother Phasaelus was taken by the Parthians, and slain; and how Hircanus was imprisoned with him. The manner also how they had established Antigenus King, under promise to give them One thousand Talents, and Five hundred of the fairest Women, whom he intended to chuse out of his own race. Lastly, how he stole away away by night, and rescued them; and escaping his Enemies hands, had afterwards endured many miseries. Besides that, his friends were in great danger, and left besieged; for which cause he had failed by Winter, and despised all dangers, only to seek for assistance at his hands, on whom depended his hope, and last refuge.

CHAP. XXV I

Herod, through Antonius's and Augustus's assistance, is declared King of the Jews, at Rome. Antonius besiegeth Masada, defended by Joseph, Herod's Brother.

ANTONIUS hearing of all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himself of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subject to no less casualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, and also by reason of Herod's promises of certain sums of money, if he were made King by his means, as he had been formerly declared Tetrarch. But that which most moved him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare unto Antonius, whom he accounted to be a murderous man, and an Enemy to the Romans. On the other side, Caesar was well inclined to succor him, both in regard of those Armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his fathers service, as also because of the good hospitality and kindness that he had shewed him in all things; and especially to gratify Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Masada and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the favors which he had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antonius the Romans Enemy, not only for his ancient crimes, but also, that in contempt of the Romans, he had received the Kingdom from the Parthians. Whilst the Senate was fore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian War, it were not amiss that Herod should be made King; which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principal demonstration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he not only obtained him the Kingdom, beyond all hope, for he never thought that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reserve that honour to those of the Kings blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his Wives Brother Alexander and Nephew to Aristobulus by the Fathers side, and to Hircanus by the Mother (which Alexander, Herod afterwards put to death, as shall be declared in time and place) but also for that, within the term of seven days, he sent him out of Italy, with the unexpected titles of his felicity.

As soon as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Caesar went forth, leading Herod between them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other Magistrates, went up into the Capitol to do sacrifice, and to place there this Decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herod's Reign Antonius feasted him; and after this manner he was established King, the hundred and eighty fourth Olympiads in the year wherein C. Domitius Calvinus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Mean while Antonius besieged those that were in the Castle of Masada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Joseph, Herod's Brother, that was within, and Two hundred of his friends, had concluded to fly unto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malchus had repented himself of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilst they stood upon these terms, God poured down a huge rain on a certain night, that in short time filled their Cisterns, so that they had no more necessity to fly, and from that time forward they took courage; and made a sally upon their Enemies, in which they charged Antonius's Soldiers after such a manner, sometimes in open field, sometimes by surprisal, that they slew a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Roman Captain, was sent into Syria, to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making show that he would assist Joseph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from Antonius. Being therefore encamped near unto Jerusalem, and having drawn sufficient money from Antonius, he retired himself with the greater part of his Forces; and to the intent his deceitful dealing might not be discovered, he left Silo with a company of his Soldiers: who likewise was honoured by Antonius, lest he should be cause of some new trouble, before the Parthians, whose coming he expected should yield him aid.

CHAP. XXVII.

Herod being returned from Rome, raiseth an Army, taketh some places, and besiegeth Jerusalem: but cannot take it; he defeateth the enemy in a great battle; the art he used to draw several of the Jews, who had hid themselves in dens, from Antonius party; he marched with some troops to find out Antonius whomas making war against the Parthians. the five battles that he fought on the way; Joseph Herod's brother is killed in a fight, and Antonius caused his head to be cut off. The manner how Herod revenged this death; he besiegeth Jerusalem where Sotius joyneth him with a Roman army; during this siege Herod Mariarith Marianna.

AFTER that Herod was come from Italy by Sea to Ptolomais, and that he had assembled a no small number of Soldiers both strangers and his own Country-men, he marched forward against Antonius, and passed thorough Galilee. Silo and Ventidius also gave him assistance in this action, having received direction by Cellius from Antonius, that they should assist Herod to recover his Country. But Ventidius was employed in appeasing the troubles that were raised in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo he kept in Judea, having been corrupted by Antonius. But the further that Herod daily marched into the Country, the more his forces did increase, and all Galilee (except a very few) submitted themselves unto him. Whilst he marched forward towards Masada, (being moved thereunto, for to relieve his parents that were besieged therein) the City of Joppa would not grant him passage: for the Citizens thereof were his Enemies: so that it behoved him first of all to ruin the same, to the end he might leave no retreat behind him for his Enemy, if he made toward Jerusalem. Upon which occasion Silo laying hold, dislodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Jews did pursue Herod sallied out with a small company, and put them to flight, and saved Silo: who could not resist any longer. Afterwards having seized on Joppa, he halted forwards to deliver his friends that were besieged in Masada; but part of the inhabitants submitted themselves unto him for the friendship they had born unto his father: and others of them, for the honor that they bear unto him: the rest admitted his government, in acknowledgement of those favors they had received from them both. But the greatest part was moved thereunto by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his Government. Thus by these means was his Army mightily increased.

Whilst thus he marched forward, Antonius seized on those places that were fittest to lay ambushes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithstanding that by those stratagems he did but small or no hurt at all to his enemy; so that Herod raised the siege, and relieved his friends out of the Castle of Masada: and after he had taken the Fort of Resisa, he approached Jerusalem, being attended by Silo's Army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when he had pitched his Camp to the westward of the City, those that kept the watch and guard on that side, shot their Arrows and threw stones against him; divers likewise sallied forth, and fought hand to hand against those that were planted there: For which cause first of all Herod caused a Proclamation to be made round about the Walls, signifying unto them that he resorted thither for the common good of the people, and for the conservation of the City, without intent of revenge or memory of any wrongs that his private Enemies had offered him, promising his most free pardon to all those whosoever had hainously offended him. Hereunto Antonius made this answer (directing his speech to Silo and the Roman Soldiers) that contrary to all justice they gave the Kingdom to Herod, who was a private man, and an Idumean (that is to say, a half Jew) whereas it hath been a custom to bestow the same on them that are of the line of the Priests. For albeit at that present they were displeased with him, for that he had seized on the Kingdom by the means of the Parthians, and had resolved with themselves to dispossess him; yet that there were divers others of that Royal Race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who have no ways misdeemed them selves towards the Romans; and moreover there are Priests, who should not be justly and uprightly dealt withal, if they should be deprived of that honor which appertaineth unto them. Whilst they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious taunts the one against the other, Antonius commanded great courage against them, drove them easily from the Tower they kept.

At that time Silon gave manifest proof that he had been corrupted by money: for he suborned divers of his Soldiers, who cried out that they wanted victuals, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requested that they might be placed in some convenient convenient garriſons to winter in, for that the places round about the City were deſolate A becauſe all neceſſaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and waſted by; Antigonus Soldiers. Thus was the whole Army diſcompoſed; ſo that each of them prepared themſelves to diſlodge. But Herod importuned and cried out upon the Captains and Soldiers that were under Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Caſar, Antony and the ſenate of Rome, had ſent thither: That for his own part he would give order that they ſhould have abundance of whatſoever they demanded; and immediately after he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight, for he cauſed an incredible quantity of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cattel, and all other ſuch proviſion from Jericho, to the end that from that time forward the Souldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof, ſo that B he preſently ſent men thorough the Countrey, to intercept and ſurprize the purveyors and victualars. Who following Antigonus command, aſſembled a great number of Soldiers near unto Jericho, and encamping in the mountains, eſpied and watched thoſe that brought the victuals. Mean-while Herod lay ſtill, but took with him ten companies, five of Roman Soldiers, and five of the Jews, with home he intermixed ſome forrain Soldiers, with ſome few horſemen, and came to Jericho, where being arrived, he ſeized on the Town, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom five hundred with their Wives and Children were retired into the top of the mountains, whom he took, and afterwards ſet at liberty: but the Roman Soldiers, entering into their houſes, and finding them full of all ſorts of moveables, they plundered them. And the King C having left a Garriſon in Jericho, diſmiſſed the Roman Army to go and winter in the Countries lately ſurrendered unto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus alſo purchaſed his favour at Silons hands by ſtore of bribes, that part of his Army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to currie favour with Antony.

Whileſt thus the Romans lived in all abundance and bare no Arms; Herod would not be idle, but ſent his brother Joſeph in Idumæa, with a thouſand foot, and four hundred horſe; and himſelf reſorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who were removed out of Moſſada. After this he went into Galilee to ſurprize certain Caſtles which were held by Antigonus Garriſons, and being arrived at Seſebis (during a great ſnow) after that Antigonus Garriſons were gone out of the foreſaid D Caſtles, he found a great abundance of all ſorts of neceſſary proviſion. And there having notice of certain thieves, who inhabited in Caves, he ſent a troop of horſe, with three companies of foot, againſt them: whom he commanded to puniſh thoſe robbers the place where they lay, was not far from a borough called Arbelæ: and fourty dayes after, he himſelf with all his Army marched thither, where the enemies charged him fiercely that the left wing of his ſquadron retreated; but he coming on with his main battel, put them to flight, who were already almoſt maſters of the field, and made thoſe of his followers that fled, face about and to purſue their enemies as far as the flood Jordan: who fled ſome one way and ſome another; ſo that he drew all Galilee under his ſubjection, except thoſe that lurked in the Caves. He diſtributed money alſo amongst his Soldiers, and gave each Soldier an hundred and fifty drachmes, and far more unto their officers, and afterwards ſent them to winter in Garriſons near at hand.

About this time Silon and his Captains, who had paſſed the Winter in the ſaid Garriſons, came unto him Antigonus would no more furniſh them with victuals: for he gave them maintenance for no more time then a month, commanding thoſe that dwelt round about them, to ſpoil the Countrey, and afterwards to retire themſelves into the mountains, to the end that the Romans might be deſtitute of neceſſary maintenance, and by that means might be conſumed with famine. Herod gave Pheroras his youngſt brother the charge of that proviſion, commanding him to incloſe the fort of Alexandrion with a wall; who ſpeedily brought to paſs that the Soldiers had all ſorts of neceſſaries at command: re-edified alſo the fort of Alexandrion which had been laid deſolate. About that time Antony was in Etheneæ, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having ſent for Silon to accompany him againſt the Parthians, did ſirſt of all charge him to aſſiſt Herod in that War: and afterwards to excite the provincial confederates to further his War. But Herod diſmiſſing Silon and his company to follow their deſtinated Wars with Ventidius, did in his own perſon lead out his Soldiers againſt thoſe thieves that lived in dens. Theſe Caves were ſituate in the moſt highſt and inacceſſible Mountains, impregnable through narrow paths environed with ſharp Rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited ſecretly, with all their families. King Herod cauſed a certain number of Coffers to be G made faſt to iron Chains, which he cauſed to be let down by an Engins from the top of Theſe Cheſts were filled with Soldiers, armed with great Hooks to draw theſe thieves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottom. But the uſe of theſe Coffers was dangerous, for it was neceſſary to let them down in infinite depth into the caves, eſpecially for that theſe thieves had neceſſary proviſion among them: notwithstanding when they had gotten down none of the Thieves durſt peep out of the mouths of their Caves, but fear conſtrained them to hold themſelves quiet. But a cert in ſome chap. 15. Souldier having girt his Sword by his ſide, and taken hold of the chain with both his hands whereto the Coffer was faſtned, ſlid down as far as the entry of the Cave: and being diſpleaſed that none came out, he thor divers Arrows at thoſe that were with in, and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew thoſe unto him who reſiſted, and tumbled them down headlong from the ſteep Rock: which done, he ruſhed in upon thoſe that were within the Cave, and ſlew many of them, and afterwards returned and reſted himſelf in his Coffer. Divers hearing the groans of thoſe that were wounded, were ſurprized with fear and diſpair of their life, but the nights approach was the cauſe that the matter was not fully accompliſhed, and many of them getting notice of the Kings free pardon by a Herald, ſubmitted themſelves. The next day they renewed and continued the ſame manner of fight, and divers went out of their Coffers to fight at the entrances of the Caves throwing in fire, which there being much ſewed in the Caves, did great execution. Within theſe Caves there was a certain old man apprehended, with his wife and ſeven Sons: who being deſired by them that he would ſuffer them to go and ſubmit themſelves to their enemies, took up the entry of the cave, and as his Sons advanced to get out he ſlew them all, and after them his Wife; and at laſt, when he had caſt their dead bodies down the Rocks, he threw himſelf down headlong after them, preferring death to ſlavery. Yet before his death he reviled Herod bitterly, and upbraided him with his ignoble extraction: and although Herod (who ſaw all that which had happened) ſtretched out his hand unto him for pardon, yet he would not give ear to him; and by this means were all theſe Caves entered, and the thieves taken.

Herod & R. f.
Herod ſendeth
his ſons to fight with Antigonus.

Now when the King had eſtabliſhed Ptolemy General over the Army in that Countrey, he retired into Samaria, with fix hundred horſe, and three thouſand foot; with a reſolution to fight Antigonus, and to end their quarrel. But Ptolemy had but very ſlender ſucceſs in his Government: for they that before time had troubled the Countrey of Galilee muſt fallied out upon him, and defeated him. After which execution they fled into the Marithes and unacceſſible places, where they robbed and ſpoiled all the Countrey. But Herod returning and ſetting upon them, puniſhed them: for he ſlew ſome of them, and the reſt were conſtrained to ſlie into ſtrong places, where he beſieged them and enring their fortrelles perforce, put them to the ſword, and deſtroyed their fortifications: and having brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the ſum of one hundred talents. Mean while, Pacorus was killed in the War, and the Parthians were defeated with him; which was the cauſe that Ventidius ſent Macharas to ſuccor Herod puniſh: Herod with two legions and 1000 horſe by Antonius order corrupted by Antigonus ſent the Rebels money. But Macharas was notwithstanding Herods diſſwaſion, yet he went to him, alledging Ventidius that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus ſuſpecting his ſudden approach, overcometh entertained him not, but cauſed him to be dartsed at and driven thence, giving him to underſtand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counſel, and that himſelf had failed in miſbe- lieving his advice: for which cauſe he returned to the City Emmaus, and killed all thoſe Jews whom he met withall in the way, being much troubled at it whether friends or enemies, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed at that which had happened. Herod came to Samaria, reſolving with himſelf to go to Antonius to complain of theſe grievances, and to tell him that he had no need of ſuch associates, who did him more harm than his enemies; whereas of himſelf he was able to make good his War againſt Antigonus. But Macharas, halted after him, entreating him to ſtay, and to go no further on that journey, and prayed him to leave his brother Joſeph behind him, to go with him againſt Antigonus. By theſe perſwaſions and inſtant intreaties of Macharas, he was ſome what appeaſed: ſo that he left his brother Joſeph behind him, with an Army, charging him no way to hazard his fortune, or to fall at odds with Macharas. As for himſelf he haſted toward Antony, who at that time beſieged Samofata (a City ſituate near unto Euphrates) having with him an Army of his associates, both horſe and foot. When Herod was arrived in Antioch he found divers men aſſembled there, who were deſirous to go and ſeek out Antony: but they durſt not advance, for fear the Barbarians ſhould let upon them in their journey. Herod encouraged them and offered himſelf to be their guide. When they were come two dayes journey off Samofata, the Barbarians laid an ambuſh for them, and had barred up the way with Hurdles, and had likewise hidden some Horsemen thereabouts, until the Passengers had recover'd the Plain. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush con- sisting of about some 500 Horsemen, they suddenly charged Herod who was in the Rear; when they had broken the first Ranks whom they had met, Herod, with his Troop that was about him, immediately repul'd them; and after he had encouraged his followers, and whetted them on to the fight, he did so much, that he made those that fled, to face about, and fight, so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursu'd them so long, until at last he recover'd that which had been taken by them, which was a certain number of Sumpter-horses and Slaves. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number than those who encountered him at first, he like- wise (rallying his Forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he secured the way to those that follow'd after, who all of them acknowledged'd him for their preserver.

When he drew near unto Samofata, Antonius sent out the best of his Army to meet and honour him. As soon as he came to Antonius's presence, he entertain'd him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embraced him, in admi- ration of his virtue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a Royal dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendered the Fort of Samofata to Antonius, and upon this occasion the War was ended. Whereupon Antonius com- mitted the Province with the Army to Sofus: and after he had commanded him to suc- cor Herod, he departed into Egypt. Sofus therefore sent two Legions of Soldiers before into Judea to succor Herod, and afterwards he follow'd with the rest of his Army.

In the mean while Joseph is killed in Jewry, on this occasion that ensueth: For forget- ting his brother Herod's command which he gave him when he repaired to Antonius, he took five Companies of Soldiers which Machabes had left him, and marching towards Jericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his Tents upon the Mountains: and for that the Roman Troops were but newly levied, and consisted of those Men who were untrained in the Wars, and for the most part were gather'd out of the Countrey of Celestynia; the Enemies having advertisement hereof, assailed and surprized him in cer- tain places of disadvantage, where there was a hot skirmish between them, in which Jo- seph died fighting valiantly, and all his Army was defeated. The dead bodies being in profess'd him 50 Talents for the whole body. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governors, drowned those of Herod's party in the Lake; so that divers Commoti- ons and Troubles were raised in Jewry. Machabes, he fortified the Castle of Gath. This misfortune of Joseph was reported to the King, in a certain Suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who, before the tydings, had already conceived some suspicion and fear, ground- ed upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his brothers death. De- parting therefore from thence with all expedition, he arrived near to the Mount Liba- nus, where he took about 800 Men with him, and the Roman Legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his Army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the Enemies came forth against him, and were overcome by him, and shut up in a Fort from whence they were come out but the day before, where Herod assailed them by break of day: but being unable to do them any harm, by reason of the bad Weather, he led his Men into the Villages near adjoining. But when Antonius's second Legion was come, and joined to his Forces, they that were with- in the Fort grew disheartened, and forsook the same by night. So that Herod marched camp'd near unto the same, he banquetted and entertained the Officers of his Army: and after the Feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himself into his lodgings; in which place it appeared, how much God loved the King: for the roof of the house where he had solemniz'd his Feast, fell down, without hurt, to any one whom- soever, for not one was left within it. Whence it came to pass, that each one persuaded himself that Herod was beloved by God, considering he had avoided so great and unex- pected a danger.

The next day, 6000 Enemies came down from the top of the Mountains to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans; and their forlorn hope chased Herod's Soldiers with darts, and stones, who was himself also hurt in the Thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a Captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some Soldiers, intending thereby to signify unto his Enemies, that he had more Forces than he needed. Pappus drew near to Machabes the Roman Captain; and as for Herod, he took five Cities by force, and put some 2000 of them that were in Garison to the sword; and afterwards (having set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus, who was encamped in a Borough cal- led led Janas. Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry submitted themselves to Herod; who drawing near the Enemy (who marched forward with great boldness, he fought them, and overcame them; and being inflamed with a great desire he had to revenge his brothers death, he pursued them that fled, and killed them even within their borough. These Houses were presently filled with Soldiers, and divers fled and hid themselves upon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the Roofs of the Houses were bea- ten down, whereby divers were killed by stones that were thrown at them from above; the most grievous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those Wars, was, to see an in- finite number of bodies heaped up amidst the Rooms of the Houses.

This exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemies, who lost all hopes of any better success for the future; for a man might have seen them flee away in whole droves: and had not a sudden and violent tempest fallen upon them, the trium- phant Army of Herod had immediately entered Jerusalem with assurance of victory, which had made an end of all that War. For Antigonus had no other thoughts but to flee away, and so forsake the City. Now the night drawing on, Herod gave order for the Soldiers to eat; and himself being weary, retired into his Chamber to bathe, where he escaped a most evident danger through Gods providence; for being naked, and having no body within but one of his servants, three of the enemies who had hid themselves for fear, started out with their Swords in their hands, and ran away, without daring to attempt any thing against the Kings person, so terrible was his presence to them. The next day

Herod caused Pappus's Head to be cut off, and sent it to Pharoras, to comfort him for the loss of his brother Joseph, whom this Pappus had killed. When the Tempest was over, he departed from thence, and approached near to Jerusalem, and encamped near unto the City. This was about the third year after he had been declared King at Rome; and encamping in the places which were fittest for battery, he took up his own quarter be- fore the Temple, as Pompey had done formerly. Having therefore erected three bul- warks in three places, he built Towers thereon, by means of a great quantity of Wood, which he caused to be cut down round about the place: and having put the siege in a forwardness, he went to Samaria, to marry Mariamna, who was Alexander's daughter, and Aristobolus's Grand-daughter, with whom he had been contracted, as we have already told you.

the year of the World, 3977. Before Herod's flight to Caesarea. Antigonus sent a Captain to Samaria to signify unto his Enemies, that he had more Forces than he needed.

Herod being alone and naked in his house escaped without a most evident danger through Gods providence; for being naked, and having no body within but one of his servants, three of the enemies who had hid themselves for fear, started out with their Swords in their hands, and ran away, without daring to attempt any thing against the Kings person, so terrible was his presence to them.

Herod sent the head of his brother Joseph to Pharoras, to comfort him for the loss of his brother Joseph, whom this Pappus had killed.

Herod, assisted by Sosius, General of a Roman Army, taketh Jerusalem by force, buyeth the Plunder from the Soldiers, in favor of the City. Sosius taketh Antigonus Prisoner, and carrieth him away to Antonius.

Sosius and He-

mighty Army against Jerusalem.

AFTER this Marriage was solemniz'd, Sosius repaireth thither through the Countrey of Phenicia; and having first of all sent his Army through the Continent, he himself also resorted thither with many Foot and Horse: thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with a considerable Army, to join with the old Bands; for he had about 30000 Men. All these assembled themselves together near unto the Walls of Jerusalem, and planted their siege nigh unto the Wall of the City that extendeth towards the Northward. The Army consisted of eleven Legions of Foot, with 6000 Horse, besides the Auxiliaries that came from Syria. Two Generals commanded this Army: namely, Sosius, who was sent by Antonius to succor Herod: and Herod himself, who made War for himself, with an intent that having dispossest Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed Enemy to Rome) he himself might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree: Those Jews that were within the Walls (that is to say, almost all the Nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage, boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good success to the people; namely, that God would deliver them from all dangers: and spoiling all provision without the City, that was either behoveful for the use of man and beast, by their secret excursions, they made the besiegers destitute of victuals. Which inconvenience Herod prevented, having laid ambushes to cut them off. As for victuals, he made much provision be brought from remote places: so that within a very little space they had abundance of all that which was necessary in the Camp. He erected also with no less care three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of Workmen: for it was Summer-time; and neither was the air commodious, or negligence of the Workmen such, but that they presently furnish'd and finish'd them. Afterwards having rais'd their Engines upon them, they batter'd the Wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no wayes damage those that were within; who for their parts used all the cunning imaginable to defend themselves, and by divers sallies set on fire the Enemies Engines; and burnt not only those that were half made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessity drove them to close fighting, they shew no less valor than the Romans; but they were inferior to them in skill and martial discipline. And when as the first Wall was beaten down, they built up a new, and countermined against those Mines that were made by the Enemy, so that they fought under-ground hand to hand. Thus using despair rather than courage, they resisted to the uttermost; notwithstanding they were besieged by a great Army, and press'd by famine and want of victuals: for the year wherein the siege was continued was the seventh, in which the earth was unmanured, which by us is called the year of rest. But at last, 20 chosen Soldiers first of all mounted upon the Wall, and after them one of Sosius's Centurions, for the first Wall was taken in the fortieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burnt which were near unto the Temple: which (as Herod said) were burnt by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher Town, lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices unto God: and they sent Ambassadors to their Enemies, to require that it might be lawful for them only to bring in certain beasts to offer them for sacrifices, VVhich Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves, and yield up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the sovereignty in Antigonus, he gave the assault, and took the City by force: where all places were presently filled with murders, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had continued the siege so long; and the Jews that were on Herod's side, enforced them utterly to destroy all those that were of the contrary party, so that slaughters ranged and reigned everywhere, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reverence of the Temple save those Suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but without compassion both old and young were put to death: neither did their murdering hand spare or refrain from Women; nay, not so much as from young Infants. And although the King requested them to forbear, yet no man gave over, but all sorts of persons were murdered by them, without respect either of sex or age. HAD been, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attend'd him, came down from the Tower, and humbled himself on his knees before Sosius's feet; who having no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he saw him, outrageously mocked him, calling him Madam Antigona: yet he left him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herod was buisied in devising how he might moderate his associates and strangers, after he had the upper hand over his Enemies: for the strangers swarmed into the City, and not only into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted some, and threatened others, and restrained the rest by force of arms; and he was more troubled at that present in being a Conqueror, than if he had been conquered: for that those things that were not lawful to be seen, were beheld by prophane men. He prevented likewise the spoil of the City, as much as in him lay: beseeching Sosius most instantly, to preserve it to the utmost, asking him, If the Romans would leave him King of a Desert, after they had voided the City of men and gods: alledging furthermore, That he esteemed the government of the whole World of no value, in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Sosius answer'd, That it was reason that the pillage should be given to the Soldiers, who had born the hazard of the siege: whereunto Herod answer'd, That he would satisfy every man out of his own Treasury; and by this means he ransom'd the rest of the City, by fulfilling those promises: for he gave many mighty gifts unto every one of the Soldiers, and by proportion unto the Captains; but above all, he royally rewarded Sosius: so that every one of them departed very well satisfied.

These calamities hapned in the City of Jerusalem, in the year wherein Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the 185 Olympiade, in the third month on the dayes wherein the solemn Fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had jump together in one instant with that of Pompeys, which had hapned that very day 27 years. Sosius offered a Crown of gold unto God, and afterwards departed from Jerusalem, leading Antigonus Prisoner with him unto Antonius. But Herod fearing lest if Antigonus should be kept by Antonius, and sent to Rome, he should debate his Title with him before the Senate by protest, that he was descended of the Royal Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common person: and that although he had offended the Romans, and thereby might not deserve to be King; yet at least his Children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their Title: Herod, I say, fearing these things, prevailed so much, by force of his money, with Antonius, that he caused him to put Antigonus to death, so that at that time Herod was truly deliver'd from all his fear. Thus ended the estate of the Asmonaeans, after 126 years. This family was famous both for their Nobility, and also by reason of their Sacerdotal dignity, and for the noble actions and exploits which their Ancestors had achieved for our Nation; but they lost their authority through their mutual factions: which sovereignty was deliver'd to Herod, Antipater's son, who was ignoble by birth, and of mean friends, who were subjects and vassals to Kings. See here what we have received from our Ancestors, as touching the end of the race of the Asmonaeans.

able to endure that affront. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexandras wife, A who was King Arifobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one very beautiful, who was called Arifobulus: the other was Mariamne, who was likewise fair, and married to Herod. She was highly displeased to see her son so much undervalued, that during his life another was called to the honor of High-priesthood: for which cause she wrote unto Cleopatra by the means of a certain Musician, beseeching her to beg the High-Priesthood at Antonius hands for her son. Which Cleopatra did most willingly, but Antonius made little reckoning of those suits. A certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Jerry about certain of his affairs, and who had seen Arifobulus, fell in love with him by reason of his beauty: and admiring likewise his tall stature, and allured by Mariamne's admirable beauty, he openly protested, that he accounted Alexandra B a happy Mother in her children: and discoursing to this effect with her he persuaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius; for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him nothing wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra persuaded by these words, sent their pictures unto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderful, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendered of no mortal strain, but by some divine power, endeavoring as much as in him lay, that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill becoming him to send for Mariamne, who was married to Herod, and desirous likewise to avoid Cleopatras suspicions, wrote unto Herod, that under some honest pretext he should send Alexandras son unto him (with this addition, if it might not seem C troublesome unto him.) Which matter when Herod understood, he thought it no waies safe for him to send Arifobulus, (who was a handsome young man, and little more at that time then sixteen years old, and so nobly born:) considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that, was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without fear of punishment in regard of his greatness and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the young man should but only depart out of the Country, all the Land would presently be filled with War and Troubles, for that the Jews pretended alteration in Government, and sought to innovate by preferring a new King. When he had in this manner excused himself unto Antonius, he resolved to entertain both the D younger Arifobulus and his Mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreover his Wife Mariamne did continually importune him to give the Priest-hood to her brother, alleging that by that honour he might prevent the occasion of his journey. For which cause assembling his friends together in counsel, he grievously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the Kingdom, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra she laboured to dispossess him of the sovereignty, to the intent that her Son by Antonius means might Govern in his stead. Which practice of hers was so much the more unjust, because she deprived her own Daughter of that honour wherein she was, and raised up troubles likewise in that Kingdom which he had conquered with great labor and extreme danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly E forgot that which was past, and forgave those wrongs she had done against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindness and courtesie both to her and hers. He gave the High-Priesthood to young Arifobulus, alleging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, than for that Arifobulus was under years.

After that he had thus seriously and considerately discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and consistory of his friends, Alexandra almost beside her self, not only through the joy she had conceived by this unexpected good fortune, but also for the fear she had to be suspected, began to defend her self with tears and protestations, saying, that F all whatsoever she had either practiced or done, was to prefer her Son unto the Priesthood whom she saw dispossessed: but as touching the Kingdom, that she had never pretended, neither would (if so be she should be presented therewith) receive the same, thinking her self for the present sufficiently honoured, both for that she saw Arifobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receive, in that he was raised up in dignity above herself. Being therefore overcome by those favors, she accepted willingly the honor for her Son and shewed her self obedient in all things, requesting him that if he had committed any thing rashly and through inconsideration or passion, either in respect of her children, or by the looseness of her tongue, he would be pleased to pardon her. After these debates and interchangeable discourses on both sides, they shook hands the one with the other, in token of a more fixed and unfained friendship than was before, G burying (as they pretended) all evil suspicion or cause of unkindness.

C H A P. III.

Herod deposeth Ananel from the dignitie of the High-Priesthood, and consecrath it upon Arifobulus, he causeth Alexandra to be seized on and Arifobulus when they were about to make their escape by going to Cleopatra; he fineth a reconciliation with them and afterwards causeth Arifobulus to be drowned bejoming a costly funeral on him.

H Ereupon Herod took away the Priest-hood instantly from Ananel, who was not that Country-man born (as we have heretofore declared) but was born amongst those Jews that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Assyrians. For divers thousand Jews inhabited the Countrey of Babylon, and from thence took he his Original also, being otherwise of the race of the Priests, and well affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom he had familiar acquaintance. He had preferred him to this honor when he was made King, and degraded him likewise, to appeale the troubles of his family: demeaning himself herein contrary to the law of the Countrey: for whereas any one hath once been installed in that degree, he is never to be displaced. The first that transgressed this Ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphaneus, who dispossessed Josiah and preferred his brother Onias to this place. The second was Arifobulus, away from his brother Hircanus, and usurped it himself. Herod was the third, who gave the Priest-hood to Arifobulus establishing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this means supposing that he had found out a remedy to appease the discords of his family, he notwithstanding all this lived not without suspicion what event would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, lest demeaning her self as she had done, she should seek occasion hereafter to raise new troubles. He commanded her therefore to contain herself within the royal Palace, and to do nothing of her own authority. Besides that he had appointed certain intelligencers, who should diligently observe that nothing should be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expenses and table. All which things exasperated her against Herod, for being full of feminine pride, she disdained to see her self thus wrongfully suspected: desiring rather to suffer any thing, than to be deprived of the liberty of free speech, and under colour to be honoured, to live continually in servitude and fear. Whereupon she sent some of her trusty friends to Cleopatra to complain and lament the insupportable miseries of her present estate, entreating her according to her power, to give speedy relief. Whereupon Cleopatra sent her word, that both she and her Son should resort unto her into Egypt with as great secrecy as might be possible. Upon which advice she practised this policy. She caused two Coffins to be made, such as men were wont to bury their dead in, in which she hid her self and her son, commanding those servants of hers that were privy to her design, to carry them out in the night time, and to go directly towards the Sea, where there was a Bark in readines prepared to convey them into Egypt. But M Ejop one of her household servants declared this enterprize of hers to Sablon on of Alexandras friends, supposing that he had been made privy therunto: who had no sooner inkling thereof, but (for that sometimes he was Herods enemy, by reason he was suspected to have been one of those that sought to poison Antipater) he resolved by discovery of this secret flight to convert Herods hatred into friendship: and presently discovered Alexandras secret enterprize to the King. Who dissembling the matter until it was upon the point of execution, surprized her at such time as she thought to fly, and yet notwithstanding, he pardoned her that fault (in that he durst not decree any punishment against her, though he could have found in his heart to have used severity) for that Cleopatra would not have contained her self, had she but had such an occasion offered her to express her hatred against Herod. For which cause, under the colour of a high and magnanimous spirit, he made him to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly resolved to destroy young Arifobulus; yet not rashly upon the instant, lest the act should grow apparent and palpable.

Now the feast of Tabernacles was at hand, which was one of those that was ceremoniously and solemnly celebrated among us, for which cause he concealed his intents during the festival dayes, intending both in himself, and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kind of pleasure and delights: yet his envy incited him to hasten the execution of his will. Arifobulus was at that time some seventeen O years old when he approached the Altar to offer sacrifices, according to the law, appeared in the High Priests Ornaments to perform the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and good stature, surpassed the tenderness of his years) expressing in his countenance the dignity and Nobility of his Race, drew the eyes and good affections A of all the people unto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobolus his Grand-Father. All the people being therefore furmounted by their affections, and at that present time being all of them overjoyed, they brake out by little and little into acclamations, mixt with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobolus discovered it self openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a Kingdom) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had plotted against Aristobolus. As soon therefore as the feast was over-passed, he went into Jericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he used Aristobolus with all kindness to draw him B to secure some place, playing with him, and counterfeiting to sport, after the fashion of the young men, to gratifie him. Now the place where they sported being too hot they quickly wearied left their sport, and went out together to take fresh air, and finding a pleasant shade under certain Arbours, and near certain fish-pools, which were largely spread round about, they beheld certain of their Servants and Friends that swam therein, with whom not long after Aristobolus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herod's confederates (who were deputed to execute the murder) laid hands on him and thrust him under the water pretending to duck him, in sport, and never gave him over untill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This hapned about the evening, and after this manner died Aristobolus, after he had lived in all for the space of eighteen years, and administrated the Priest-hood one whole C year: and after this, Ananel presently recovered his former dignity.

Aristobolus is crowned by the old direction. Ananel restored to the Priest-hood.

The lamentation for Aristobolus death.

Herod's counterfeited sorrow.

When this accident was reported to the women, all of them burst out in tears, and were transported with strange lamentations, which they uttered over the dead body. All the City also was mightily troubled, neither was there any private family that thought not it self touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the loss in particular to concern himself and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed she was more passionate and perplexed than any other, being so much the more discomfited for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a far greater mischief constrained her to repress her passion, so that divers times she was ready to bereave her of her own life, and dispatch her self out of misery with her own hands, D But she contained her self, to the end, that surviving, and living after her son, who was so fraudulently destroyed, and prolonging her own life, without giving any suspicion or shadow, that she might with more opportunity expect the occasion to revenge her self: For which cause she dissembled all things, concealed her grief, and made shew that she knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all means to perswade the strangers, that this death had befallen Aristobolus without his knowledge; and did not only prepare that which was requisite for the funeral, but made shew to be truly sorrowful; and it may be, that in remembrance of Aristobolus beauty and flourishing young years, he was really touched with compassion, notwithstanding, that he imagined that his death should be a means of his own security, E demeaning himself in all things circumspectly, with intent to purge himself of that crime: But especially, he shewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furnishing and preparation of the Hearse, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in such sort, as the grief which the Ladies had conceived was pacified after this manner of consolation.

The year of the world, 3912
Before Christ's
165.

Herod is obliged to repair to Antonius, to clear himself from Aristobolus's death; he winneth him with Presents: He gave order, before his way-going, to his Brother-in-Law Joseph, to put Mariamne to death, if Antonius should condemn him to die. Joseph revealed it imprudently to this Prince; and Herod put him to death, for being jealous of him, and Mariamne. Cleopatra's insatiable ambition and avarice.

BUT none of all these things could either move or mollifie Alexandra, but daily more and more she increased her sorrow, and in the height of her tears kindled her wrath with a desire of revenge. She therefore acquainted Cleopatra by her private Letters of Herod's Treasons, and her sons most miserable, and untimely death: I Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and having compassion of her misery, undertook the matter, and ceased not to incite Antony to revenge Aristobolus's death; telling him, that it was an unpardonable error, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should be suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true and lawful Kings. Antony perswaded by these her words (as soon as he came to Laodicea) sent for Herod, to the end, that making his appearance he might answer that which might be objected against him, concerning Aristobolus's death: For he disliked the act, notwithstanding, that Herod himself had attempted it. But although Herod was afraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatra's displeasure K (for that she ceased not continually to provoke Antony against him) yet he obeyed his commands, and transported himself thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise do) notwithstanding he left his Uncle Joseph behind him, committing the Government both of the Kingdom, and his private estate unto him; giving him secret instructions to kill Mariamne, if so be, that Antony should happen to do him any mischief. For he loved her so extremely, by reason of her beauty, that he supposed himself wronged, if after his decease, she should be beloved by another; and he openly declared, that all that misery which befel him, proceeded from Antony's passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had formerly heard some report. As soon therefore, as he had disposed his affairs, notwithstanding he had little hope of L good hap, yet he repaired to Antony.

But Joseph governing that Kingdom that was committed to his hands, conversed divers times upon this occasion with Mariamne, and communicated oftentimes with her, not only about publick affairs, but also to do her that honour which so great a Prince's deserved. Therefore as he secretly conversed with her, witnessing the friendship, and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her; He found, that neither the nor Alexandra did credit any such thing, but rather laugh'd at it. For which cause, Joseph being too forward to express the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so far, that he discovered the commands that was given him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to live without her, and that if any inconvenience should happen unto him, he would not in death also be dis-joyined from her. This discourse of Joseph was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather, as a manifestation of Herod's wickedness; who dying, desired altho that they should perish; and interpreted, that which he had spoken, as the testimony of his tyrannical and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spread in the City of Jerusalem by Herod's Enemies, that Antony had so tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, and especially the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Joseph to forsake the Palace, and take the Ladies, and retire under the protection of the Roman Legion, who at that time, was about the City, for the security of the Kingdom, under the Conduct of the Tribune Julius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble M should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this means in safety, having the Romans to befriend them; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Antony should see Mariamne, she might obtain at his hands whatsoever she desired, and that he would restore the Kingdom unto her, and deprive her of nothing that concerned her, or was answerable to her Royal estate.

But whilst they were in these deliberations, there came Letters from Herod, contrary to those reports, and all mens expectation. For as soon as he came unto Antony he compassed his favor by his many Presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Jerusalem, and suddenly debated the matter with him, he appeased him so, that he was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatra's speeches O were but coldly received in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Antony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his Kingdom; for that in so doing, he should owe more to his King: but that when the honour is once what other honours he had received at Antoni's hands in Assemblies and Feasts, to which he invited him always; notwithstanding that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detaching him; and being desirous to get the Kingdom of Jewry into her hands, strove, with all means possible, to put him to death: but that he had found Antony always an upright man, and feared not henceforward that any evil should befall him: and returning presently upon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Antony's most assured affection, both in respect of his own Kingdom, and of his particular affairs. B And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seek any further than that which she had because that Antony had given her Celsus instead of that which she had demanded, forbearing thenceforward to mention Jewry any more, because that Antony wholly rejected those suits.

Cleopatra very covetous. Cleopatra murdered her brother and sister.

After these Letters came unto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were, and the desire to retire unto the Romans, as if Herod had been dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet their resolution was not hidden from the King; for his sister Salome, and his mother informed him of every particular at his arrival, after he had parted from Antonius, who was marching against the Parthians. Salome likewise spake against Joseph her husband, and slandered him, objecting against him, that he had Mariamne company. All which she spake through malice, for that in a certain debate, Mariamne had, in her rage, despitefully hit her in the teeth with her obscure birth. Herod (who was always inflamed with the earnest affection which he bare unto his wife Mariamne) was suddenly troubled hereat: and although jealousy pressed him forward, yet love restrained him, and kept him from doing any thing rashly, for which cause he called Mariamne aside, and demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Joseph? She by solemn oaths, and by all possible allegations in her own defence, appeased the King by little and little, and pacified his choller. For he was so transported with the love that he bare unto his wife; that he believed she had sufficiently purged her self of those slanders, that had been forged against her; yielding her most hearty thanks for her honest affection towards him, and declaring unto her openly, the great esteem and love that he bare unto her. At length, (as it often falleth out amongst Lovers) they fell to tears, and embraced each other with great affection: for that the gave him no credit, he endeavoured the more to draw her to belief. Whereupon Mariamne said unto him: It is not the art of a Lover to have commanded, that if any thing should befall thee otherwise than well with Antony, I should presently be put to death, notwithstanding I have no way offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the King, entered in a strange passion, and giving over his embraces, he cried out with a loud voice, and tore his hair, saying, That he had a most evident proof that Joseph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not have discovered those things which he had spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted one another. And in this emotion or rage of jealousy he hardly contained himself from killing his wife. But the force of love overcame him so much, that he bridled his rage, notwithstanding it was grievous and irksome unto him. Yet he gave orders that Joseph should be killed: without either audience or justification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandria, who was the cause of all these troubles, he kept her Prisoner.

About the same time there hapned troubles and revolutions in Syria: for Cleopatra continually solicited and importuned Antony, and whetted on his displeasure against him, persuading him to remove them from their Governments, and bestow the same on her self. And for that Antony loved her extremely, she was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her own nature inclined to covetousness, she abstained from no kind of corrupt dealing and wickedness. For knowing that the Kingdom should descend unto her brother, she caused him to be poisoned, when as he was but fifteen years old; as for her sister Arsinoe, she caused her to be slain by Antony's means, being at her prayers in the Temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreover, in what place soever she understood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples; or in religious place so sacred, from whence she took not away the Ornaments. There was not any thing so prophane and prohibited, which she laid not handson to satisfy her unbridled avarice. Neither was the whole World sufficient enough to satisfy her unbridled avarice. Neither was she so much a slave to her own desires, and her disordinate appetite, that all the riches in the World were not able to satisfy the same. For this cause, she constantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberal towards her: and therefore fore entering into Syria with him, she presently contrived how she might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysanias, Ptolemeys son, to be put to death, objecting against him, that he had private intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Jewry also at Antonius's hands, and required him besides that, to dispose of the Kings of Arabia. He was so possessed by this Woman, that he seemed not only to be bewitched with her words, but also incanted by her poisons, to obey her in whatsoever she thought fit: yet he was ashamed to commit to manifest injuries, lest being so far over-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in matters of more consequence. Lest therefore, either by denying her, he should disoblige her, or by condescending to her demands, he should seem to be the wickedest man alive; he deduced a several portion of both their dominions, and presented her with the same. He gave her likewise, those Cities that are situate between the flood Elutherus and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earnest solicitation, she thought to seize these also.

CHAP. V.

Cleopatra goeth into Judea, and used all her endeavours (but in vain) to make Herod fall in love with her. Antonius having conquered Armenia giveth her great Presents.

After that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make War in Armenia: she returned back again, and by the way, visited Apamea and Damascus, and at last, took her progress into Jewry: where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had been given unto her in Arabia, with all the revenues of Jericho, unto her. This Country bringeth forth that balm which of all other ointments is the most precious, and only groweth in that place; and also the finest Palm-trees in the World. Being arrived in that place, and grown inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust; being of her self naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) she laid this foundation to intrap him, under colour to revenge her self of some injury by that means. But in effect, the generally manifested, that she had a passionate love for Herod; but he was not so kindly bent towards Cleopatra; knowing how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceived the greater hatred against her, because, by that intemperance of hers, she pretended to destroy him: and although, that from the beginning, he had rejected her solicitations; yet he resolved to be reveng'd of her, if so be by these her subtil underminings she should continue her policies to betray him. He asked counsel of all his friends whether having her in his possession, he should put her to death. For in so doing, all those should be delivered from divers evils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter she should bring in trouble. Moreover, that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessity should enforce him to make trial of her friendship. But whilst he debated and discoursed upon this resolution, his friends dissuaded him, assuring him that it was far below a Prince of his worth, to cast himself into so manifest peril, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding, it might be approved that it stood with his profit: nay, rather, that by this means he should encrease his desire. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that that was the Woman of the greatest Note and Nobility of that time; and that whatsoever profit might redound unto him by her death, it would be an affront to Antonius: Whereby it most evidently appeared, how great damages would befall to the Kingdom, and the Kings family also; advising him, to humour her in all things, except in her unlawful request. By these, and such reasons, and probable conjectures, they deterred and dissuaded him from adventuring upon this apparent danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich Presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

Herod goeth about to put Cleopatra to death, and is dissuaded by his friends.

Antonius could not resist Cleopatra's desire.

Herod bringing Cleopatra onward on her way towards Egypt.

As soon therefore, as Antonius had made himself Master of Armenia, he sent Artabazus, Tigranes's son, with all his children, who were great Princes, Prisoners into Egypt, and presented them to Cleopatra; with all those precious Jewels likewise, which were taken by him, or found in the Kingdom. But Artabazus his elder son (who at that time had saved himself by flight) reigned in Armenia; whom Archelaus and Nero the Emperor drove out of his Kingdom, and placed his younger brother Tigranes in his room, as it shall be declared hereafter. As for the Tributes of the Countreys which Herod was bound to pay unto Cleopatra, for the lands bestowed on her by Antonius, he, without deceit, deceit, justly paid them, supposing it to be very suitable to his security, to continue A himself in her good favor. As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the levying of such a Tribute, payed him for some little time 200 Talents a year; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the half.

CHAP. VI.

Herod intendeth to go to assist Antonius, against Augustus; but Antonius obligeth him to follow on his design against the Arabians, so he entereth their Country, overthroweth them, and gaineth it; but loseth a second, when he thought to have won.

A Retar demeaning himself thus ungratefully, and refusing to do that which in right he ought to perform; Herod made shew to take Arms against him, but deferred his revenge, in regard of the contentions among the Romans. For at that time nothing else was expected but the Asian War (which fell in the hundred and eighty seven Olympiade) in which Augustus Caesar determined to try his Title with Antonius for the Monarchy. In the mean while Herod, who had already for many years been Master of a peaceable and fruitful Country, from whence he drew rich Revenues, and many Forces; gathered divers Forces with the greatest expedition that he might, to succor Antonius. But he by Letters signified unto him, that he had need of his assistance; notwithstanding, he commanded him to make a road upon the Arabians, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not only understood by Herod himself, but also by Cleopatra's advertisements. For she very cunningly conceived, that it would redound unto her profit, if one of these two should overthrow the other. Herod according to these instructions from Antonius, returned back into his Country, and retained his Army always ready about him, and presently invaded Arabia, and with his Forces, both Horse and Foot, came directly to Diopolis, where the Arabians (having notice of his intended War against them) came out to meet him. They fought a most cruel Battle, wherein, at last the Jews had the upper hand. After this, a great Army of the Arabians assembled themselves at Cana, a certain place in Galilee. Whereof, when Herod was fore-advertised, he marched forth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his Forces. As soon as he drew near to Cana, he resolved to incamp in that place, and after he had well fortified and intrenched his Forces, to let on the Enemy with the first opportunity; but whilst he employed himself in the execution hereof, all the Army of the Jews cried out, requiring him without delay, to lead them forward against the Arabians, and were so encouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good conduct and ordering of their Army, as in regard of their forwardness, who had been actors in the former War, and partakers of the Victory; so that they scarce gave their Enemies leisure to stand to their Arms. When Herod perceived that the heat and forwardness of the Soldiers could hardly be appeased; he thought good to make use of the readiness of his Army, and arming himself, he marched on Head of his Army in battle array; This sudden approach, danted the Arabians. For although, for a while, they made head against them; yet perceiving their Enemies full of heart, and themselves unable to resist them, divers of them retreated, and betook themselves to flight: so that all them had been utterly defeated, had not Antiochus endamaged Herod and the Jews. For he having the command of that Army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a privy grudge to Herod, disposed his Army in a readiness; and expecting the event of the Battle, resolved with himself to contain his Forces if the Arabians overcame the Jews; and so if they had the worst (as indeed it came to pass) to set upon the Jews, who should be spent by that time; and surprising them unawares, even in the height of their hope of good success, to massacre them with fresh supplies. When the Jews had spent all their strength against their Enemies, and expected nothing less than the assurance of the Victory, he charged, and overcame them, who had retreated into certain rough, and difficult places (whereunto their Enemies were better accustomed than themselves) being grievously wounded by the Arabians, who returned back, and set upon them, divers of them that fled were killed; and of those that escaped, few of them recovered the Camp. Herod losing the hope of this Battle, posted on Horseback as fast as he could, to bring on fresh supplies: but notwithstanding all his expedition and diligence, yet could he not recover the place in time. The Camp of the Jews was taken and sacked, and the Arabians obtained no small success, beyond their expectation. From that time forward Herod began to make certain incursions into Arabia, preying on the Country, and doing them much mischief. He incamped himself likewise upon the Mountains, forbearing to draw his whole Forces into the field; and by his diligence and industry, his labours were not fruitless; for prevailing in some exploits, he put his Men in a capacity to recover their former losses.

CHAP. VII.

A terrible Earthquake happeneth in Judæa. The Arabians attack the Jews, and kill their Ambassadors who were sent to treat of a Peace.

AT such time as Cæsar and Antony made trial of their titles in the Asian War, and in the Country of Judæa, that never the like was seen in any other place: so that divers beafts were slain thereby, and many men were overwhelmed with ruins of their damage, because they encamped in the open field. Only the Soldiers received no hurt, of which were far greater by report, than they were in effect, by such, who in favour of their courage increased hereby, as if all the Cities of Jewry had been already overthrown, and the men thereof extinguished; and as if they had no adversaries remaining who came unto them to Treat of Peace in their desperate condition, they killed them and afterwards in the heat of their spleen, set upon their Enemies Camp. But the Jews, not daring to expect or prevent their assault, for their present miseries had to depair of their safety. These thus affected did the King encourage, and called unto him the Captains, and (as much as in him lay) reviving their drooping spirits; and when he had restored some to better hopes, at length he attempted to speak unto all the Army, who in the former overthrows would yield to no persuasion. These he did both comfort and exhort in such manner as followeth.

CHAP. VIII.

King Herods Oration to his Soldiers, by which he doth so encourage them that they overcome the Arabians a terrible overthrow and oblige them to take Herod for their Protector.

FRIENDS and fellow Soldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth, how many misfortunes have hindered our progress of late, which are able to wearie and amaze the men of the greatest resolution. But since we must needs fight, and that all those things that have befallen us unto this present, are of that nature, that by your own valour they may be recovered; I have resolved to inform, and confirm you in those means, whereby you may retain and continue your accustomed valour and courage.

First of all therefore (as to our War) it consisteth on just grounds, for we are informed thereby unto through the insolence of our Enemies: the Knowledge whereof should chiefly make you recover your courage. Secondly, I will apparently prove unto you, that our condition is not so desperate, but that we have great and assured hopes to obtain the victory. First of all therefore, I will discourse of that which formerly I proposed, and will make your jealous judges of those things which I will discourse upon. For you are privy to the Arabians injustice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, and impious and barbarous towards all men; but especially they have always troubled us, provoking us through their extreme avarice and malignant envy, with perpetual injuries. And yet to let slip all other our benefits to that Nation, who is he that delivered them from their imminent peril and shalldom, that was hazarded by Cleopatra's means, but our selves? For the friendship I had with Antony, and his benevolence toward me, was the cause that their burden of miseries was so lightened; Antony forbore to commit anything that might draw us to suspicion.

Besides, after he had wrought him by her solicitation to cut off certain portions of the two Kingdoms to be given unto her, the matter was so handled by me, that by divers presents particularly bestowed upon him by my hands, I have obtained security for us both, and by disbursing two hundred talents of mine own, and giving my word for two hundred more for others, for the Revenues of that very Land which in time past was ours, and these now possest and enjoy. Notwithstanding, reason it were in my opinion, that we that are Jews should not be tributaries, or give any portion of our Country to any man; and if we must needs do it, it will become us to pay it for these, who enjoy their lives by our means. It should not be reasonable for the Arabians, who after they had confessed with many plausible protestations and thanksgivings, that they enjoy their liberty by our benefit, to have deprived and thrust us from our own, and to have unjustly dealt with us; you even with us, I say, who were not their Enemies.

Enemies, but rather on the contrary side their chiefest friends in the time of Peace. And if A fidelity should be respected even amongst those that are our most hated Enemies, much more before Christ's Naivety, 29.
 necessity ought it to be observed by those that are friends. But these men sit tight thereby, who think nothing honest, but that which is annexed with lucre; and think no wrong unexcusable, that hath but a shew of profit. Is there any question then, whether we should chastise these unjust men by a just War? Since both God commandeth us less, and enjoyeth us always to hate outrage, and revenge injustice, especially in that War which is not only just, but necessary. For that which both in the confession of the Grecians, and opinion of the Barbarians is most hateful and heinous, this have they perpetrated in murdering our Ambassadors. For the Greeks say, that Ambassadors are sacred and inviolable, and we our selves have received our wholesome and holiest precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from B his Heraults and Messengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile Enemy to Enemy.

Legates invio-
 lable.

With whom forever justice is God also.

What Impiety therefore is more unpardonable, then to put these Ambassadors to death, who bring tidings of right and justice? or what prosperity can they expect either in their Wars, or felicity in their whole lives, after so heinous a crime? Truly I cannot imagine any:
 But perhaps some man will say, that right and equity is on our side; but that the greater number of men and means are with them: but this their speech is unworthy of my followers.
 For with those with whom justice is, with those also is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let us make further, and weigh our own own forces by themselves. In the first Battel we had the victory, in the second, upon the first charge we put them to flight, and found them unable to make their party good against us. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, behold, Athenio, not by lawful War, but by subtil treachery assailed us. But shall this be called their valour, or rather their fraud and second iniquity?
 why therefore should we have less courage, who ought to have the greater confidence? or why should we fear them who are always insidious, if they fight openly, and without fraud;
 and when they seem to overcome, they do it by injustice?

Moreover, if any man suppose them to be valiant, this should therather incite them more and more unto virtue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble mind to overcome his inferiours, but to have meane and might to conquer his superiours. And if any one be terrified by our domestick and homebred miseries, and by our late earthquake, first of all let him think himself, that he erreth in that which deceiveth the Arabians by supposing the same to be more grievous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it be-cometh them not to draw matter of fear from thence, whence the other took occasion of courage.
 For as touching themselves they conceive not any hope thorow any good that is in themselves, but only in the trust they have that we are already dejected by our calamities. But when they shall see us march forth against them, their courage will be weakened, and our confidence by this means shall be awakened, for that we are not at this time to encounter with desperate men:
 For neither are we overmuch afflicted; neither (as some think) hath this misery befallen us through Gods displeasure, but these are the casualties of fortune. And if by the will of God these things are come to pass, it is marvel if by the same will our calamity cease not; and that our punishment should not satisfy his displeasure. But that this present War is approved by him for just, he himself hath evidently declared. For whereas divers thorow the whole Nation have been oppressed by the earthquake, none of you that bear Arms have incurred any mischief;
 but all of you have been preserved, which is a manifest token of the will of God; and if your Children and Wives had generally followed the Wars as you do, none of you should have been wanting. When as therefore you shall have brought your selves of these things, and moreover in regard that God hath at all times an especial care over you, fail not to pursue this injurious Nation with a just war that neither respecteth the laws of friendship nor keepeth the league of covenant; valiant in murdering sacred Ambassadors; and subject and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour.

These persuasions of his did not a little encourage the Jews to the battel, and made them more forward then before. As For Herod, after he had offered sacrifice, according to the custom, he drew his Army forth, and led them with great confidence against the Arabians, and passing Jordan, he encamped near unto the Enemy, with an intent to surpris a Fort Situate between them both; making this account that it would further him much, either if presently he should be drawn forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march forward, for that this place should serve him to encamp in with more security. The same resolution also had the Arabians, for which cause they fell to skirmish in that place, wherein the first on both sides that gave the charge, and afterwards some other followers were killed: so that those of the Arabians side being overcome betook them to retreat. This success of theirs bred no little hope in the Jews, who seeing the Enemies Army address'd to attempt any thing rather then to fight

The Arabians
 are overcome
 by Herod.

H fight grew the more bold to assail the Arabian in his trenches, and beat him from his camp. They being forced by these affautes drew forward to their defence in great disorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithstanding they defended themselves, both in regard of their great number, as also in respect of that necessity whereunto they were incited by the Jews. The skirmish on both sides was hot, and divers on either party were put to the Sword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worst, turned their backs. The slaughter was so great, that they not only perished by their Enemies Swords, but they themselves murdered one another in the crowd, and disorderly fight, in which they were troden under foot, and lay murdered in a manner by their own weapons. So that, in that defeat there fell some five thousand: the rest fled on the other side of the Rampire: but being overpressed with want of victuals, and especially with lack of water, they had not any ground or assurance to escape. After them posted the Jews, and being unable to recover the fortress with them, they begirt the camp with a siege, and shut up all the passages that no succor could come unto them, and took from them all opportunity to escape, although they would have gone away.

When as therefore they saw themselves reduced into such extremity, they sent Ambassadors unto Herod, first of all to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppressed with thirst, to crave some remedy for their present necessities. But he neither respected the Ambassadors, neither the proffered ransom for the Captives, nor any other whatsoever reasonable demand, desiring earnestly to revenge himself of those injurious treacheries they had practised against his Ambassadors. Being therefore incited by thirst (which amongst other plagues most grievously afflicted them) many of them forsook their Trenches, and offered themselves to bonds and to be led away Captives; so that within five dayes space four thousand of them yielded themselves Prisoners. On the sixth day, all the rest determined to fall out, and assail the Enemy; rather making choyce of assured death, then thus lingeringly and ingominously to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their Trenches, but like unapt Soldiers for a skirmish, decayed not only in body, but in courage; reputed their death for advantage, to escape thereby their extreame misfortunes. For which cause upon the first onset, about some seven thousand of them were killed: and thus the fierceness of this Nation being allaid by this overthrow, they submitted themselves to Herod, whom to their own sorrow they had approved to be a valiant Souldier.

CHAP. IX.

Antonius is overcome by Augustus in the Battle of Actium; Herod put Hircanus to death, his pretence for it, he resolvethe to repair to Augustus; his orders before his way going.

M Herod puffed up with his successful fortune, returned back into his own Countrey, having obtained great reputation by his valour and virtue. But when he supposed his State to be most assured, he grew in danger both to lose his dignity and life, by reason of that victory that Cesar obtained against Antony in the Actian War. For at that time he not only supposed himself to be utterly overthrown, but both his friends and Enemies that were round about him lost their hopes, for that it was unlikely that he should escape unpunished with Antony. Whereby it came to pass, that his friends could not conceal their despair, and his Enemies under their colourable and dissembled griefs, covered their joy, promising themselves thereafter a better and pleasing administration of the Common-Wealth. Hereupon Herod perceiving that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood Royal alive, determined to cut him off, resolving with himself, that if he hapned to escape the danger, a man who at that time was worthier the Kingdom then himself, should not claime the Crown: and if any misfortune should befall him in regard of Cesar, he desired to dispossess Hir-canus of the Kingdom, in regard of the envy which he bare him, for that he was the only man who deserved to be advanced to that dignity. Whilest thus he was tormented in his thoughts, he had an occasion offered him by Hircanus' own followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a milde and gentle nature, during all his lifetime forbore to intermeddle with State affairs, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himself with whatsoever condition it pleased her to allot him.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and unable to conceal with modesty the hope she conceived of change, solicited her father that he should not any longer endure the subjection of Herod, who was the very scourge of their family, but rather that he should stand upon his own guard, and reserve himself to his better fortune. She gave him counsel to write unto Malchus, who had the Government of Arabia, requesting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herod should chance to be cut off by Caesar's displeasure, doubtless the Kingdom would return unto him, both in regard of his Nobility, as also of the peoples favour. These persuasions of hers Hircanus, at the first repulsed, but afterwards being overcome by the importunity of the woman, who ceased not day and night to sing the same Song of future hope, and of Herods Treasons, he gave certain Letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein he required him to send him certain Horsemen, who might conduct him to the Alphaitic Lake, which lieth distant from the confines of Jerusalem some three hundred Furlongs. And therefore he committed these Letters to Dositheus trust, both for that he favoured Hircanus and his Daughter, and seemed likely for divers causes to hate Herod: for he was Joseph's kinsman, who was killed by Herod; and not long before, certain of his Brothers were put to death amongst others at Tyre by Antonius command: yet for none of those considerations continued he faithful to Hircanus. For he preferring the present favour of the King that then reigned to the rest, discovered the Letter unto the King; who first of all giving him thanks, required one office of friendship more at his hands; which was that folding up the Letter, and sealing it he should convey and deliver the same to Malchus, and return his answer, for that it nearly concerned him, if he knew his resolution also. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, for that it nearly concerned him, if he knew his resolution also. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, for that he was ready to entertain both himself and his whole family, and all those Jews likewise which were of this faction, promising to send him a band of Soldiers, who should be able to conduct him safely thither, and should be obedient to his command in all things. Now as soon as Herod had seized on these Letters, he called for Hircanus and demanded of him whether he had any confederacy with Malchus: he denied it, but Herod protesting and bringing forth his Letter in an open assembly, commanded him afterwards to be put to death. Thus are these matters Registered in Herods commentaries: for by some they are delivered otherwise, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which he had committed; but for some Treasons against the King. For they Write to this effect, that Herod at a certain banquet (dissembling his suspicion) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had received any Letters from Malchus: and that he answered, that he had received Letters, but such as contained nothing else but compliments. He asked him also whether he had received any present: and when he had answered, that he had received nothing but four Couriers for his Saddle: the King wrested this to a Capitall offence of corruption and treason, and commanded him presently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltless, they allege this for a most approved argument; namely, his gentle disposition, who even in his youthful years never gave sign or appearance of rashness, or pride, or signification of audaciousness, no not even then when he had the royal government in his hands, but in the freedom of authority disposed of the most things by Antipaters advice. But at that time he was more then fourscore years old, and knew that Herods estate was secured: and that there is no likelihood that he would remove from beyond Euphrates where he lived in great reputation, to live under Herods Jurisdiction, or to engage in any trouble contrary to his humor, and so far different from his nature; so that all these things seem to be fained by Herod.

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and adverse fortunes, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For when his mother Alexandra lived he was created High Priest of the Jews, and obtained that honor for the space of nine years: and after his mothers death, he had scarcely governed the Kingdom for the space of three months, but that he was expelled by his brother Arifolunus; and afterwards restored by Pompey's assistance, and receiving all his former honours, he lived in full possession of them for the space of forty years. After this he was once more dispossessed by Antignus; and being maimed in his body, lived certain years in captivity among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though he had many things promised him by Herod, yet after so many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands; and that which amongst all the rest is most of all to be lamented, as we have said, he was unjustly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a lover of justice, and an observer of perpetual modesty, and governed his Kingdom for the most part by other mens direction, being only guilty in himself of ignorance and the love of idleness. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodness obtained to great riches: For which defects of his, against all Law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But

H But Herod, after Hircanus's death, addressed himself to perform his journey towards Caesar: and having little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antignus; he grew desperately jealous of Alexandra, lest the taking opportunity of this time, should incite the people to rebel, and fill the Kingdom with domestic sedition; for which cause, committing the Government to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, and all his Kindred in the Castle of Masada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retain the Kingdom in his own hands, and maintain it. As for his Wife Marianna, for that by reason of certain dislikes betwixt her, his mother and sister, he left her with her mother, in the Castle of Alexandria, and committed them to the custody of his Treasurer Joseph, and Sabemus the King's ream, and with her, the keeping of his Castles, both which, had always been his faithful friends, and to whom, in way of honour, he committed the custody of these Princely Ladies. But he gave them also this command, That if they should be certainly informed, that any sinister mishap had befallen him, they should presently kill them both, and to the utmost of their power continue the Kingdom in his Children, and his Brother Pheroras.

CHAP. X.

Herod speaketh so generously to Augustus, that he obtained his favor; he accompanieth him into Egypt, and receiveth him with such an extraordinary magnificence, that it put him in repute with all the Romans.

After he had in this sort given order for all his affairs, he took shipping to Rhodes; Herod cometh to meet with Caesar. And as soon as he arrived in that City, he took the Crown from his Head, and laid it apart, but as for his other Princely ornaments, he changed them not; and being admitted to Caesar's presence, he gave a more ample testimony of the greatness of his courage than ever: for he neither addressed his speech to intreat his favor (according to the custom of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gave account of all that which he had done, without being daunted in the least.

For he freely confessed before Caesar, that he had intirely loved Antonius, and that to the utmost of his power he had done him service, to the end that he might obtain the sovereignty and the Empire of the World; not by joining his forces unto his, in that he was otherwise employed in the Arabian War, but in furnishing him both with Wheat and Money, and that this was the least office which he bestowed him to perform towards Antonius; for that being once his friend, it behooved him not only to employ his best endeavors on his so Princely benefactor, but also to hazard both his head and happiness to deliver him from peril. All which (said he) I have not performed according as I ought to have done; yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as he was overcome in the Actian Battle, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I restrain my self; for although, I befriended not Antonius with my presence and assistance in the Actian War, yet, at least I assisted him with my counsel, assisting him, that he had but one only means left him for his security, and prevention of his utter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enjoy her estate, and might more easily obtain his peace, and pacify thy displeasure against him. And for that he gave but slender regard to these my admonitions by his own justiceless and indiscretion, he hath hurt himself, and profited you, because, as I said, he did not follow my counsel. Now therefore (O Caesar) in regard of the hatred which you bear unto Antony, you condemn my friendship also. I will not deny that which I have done; neither am I afraid, freely and publicly to protest how much I have loved him: but if without regard of persons you consider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how resolute and constant a friend I am, and how mindful of kindness, the effect of that which I have done may make me known unto thee: For if the name be only changed, the friendship notwithstanding may remain, and deserve a due praise.

By these words (which were manifest testimonies of his resolute and noble courage) he so inwardly endeared himself unto Caesar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he converted this his accusation into an occasion to win and work him to be his friend: for which cause Caesar, letting the Crown upon his head, exhorted him that he should no less respect his friendship, than he had in former times Antony's; and withal, did him much honour; certifying him moreover, that Capitoline had written unto him, how much Herod had assisted him in his Wars that he had with the Monarchs of Syria. Herod seeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the Kingdom was more surely confirmed unto him, than before time, both by Caesar's bounty, bounty; and also by the decree of the Senate, which he had practised to obtain, for his greater assurance, accompanied Cæsar as far as Egypt, presenting both himself and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his estate: endeavoring, by these means, both to win their favor, and to shew also the gratefulness of his courage; requiring moreover at Cæsars hands, that Alexander, who was of Antoniuss dearest friends, might not be fought out to be punished; yet notwithstanding, he could not obtain the same, by reason of an Oath that Cæsar had past before he solicited him. That done, he returned back again unto Jerry, with greater honour and assurance than before; whereby he struck them with wonderful amazement, who expected his contrary success; as if by Gods special providence he always over-went his dangers, to his great honour. Therefore he prepared himself to entertain Cæsar, who returned out of Syria, to take his journey into Egypt, and received him at Pholomach, with all Royal honour, and gave his Army Presents with all abundance of Provision: so that he was accounted for one of Cæsars most affectionate friends, and rode about with him, when he took the view of his Army; he entertained him also, and his friends with One hundred and fifty Men, adorned with most rich and sumptuous apparel. And for that they were to pass thorow a Country, wherein there was great scarcity of Water, he furnished them with both Water and Wine; so that they needed neither of them. He gave Cæsar also Eight hundred Talents, and so royally satisfied the all Men, that they confessed themselves to have had a far greater entertainment, than the Revenues and Profits of his Kingdom could afford them. By which means, he gave the more ample testimony of his forward friendship, and free affection to deserve well: and making use of the opportunity of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroic and noble spirit; so that he was held inferior unto no man, for the good entertainment which he gave to the chieftest Romans in their return from Egypt.

C H A P. XI.

Mariamne giveth Herod so cold a reception when he returned from Cæsar, that being joined to the aspersions which Herod's mother and sister laid upon her, he had infallibly caused her to be put to death at that very instant: But he is engaged to return to Augustus the father to death at his back-coming. The business of Alexandra, Mariamne's Mother. Herod's despair after Mariamne's death; he saileth dangerously sick. Alexandra endeavoureth to make herself Mistress of the two Forts of Jerusalem; he made her be put to death, and Costobarus, and others follow; he instituteth Plays; and shews in Honor of Augustus, by which, he doth so irritate the most part of the Jews; that ten of them undertake to kill him; he putteth them to death: He buildeth many Forts, and rebuilds a very fine, and a strong Town upon the ruins of Samaria, which he names Sebalte.

BUT as soon as he returned unto his Kingdom, he found all his Household troubled, and both his Wife Mariamne, and her Mother Alexandra grievously displeased with him. For they supposed (and not without cause) that they were not shut up in that Castle for their securities sake, but as it were in a Prison; so that, in as much as they neither might make use of other Mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly discontented. Mariamne also supposed that her Husband did but dissemble his love, rather for his own profit than for any entire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieved her, than that he had not any hope to live after him, if so be, he should happen to die, especially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could he ever forget what commands he had before that time left with Joseph, so that by all means possible, he laboured to win the affections of those that had the charge of her, and especially Sobemus, knowing very well, that her safety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaved himself very wisely and faithfully, containing himself very circumpectively within the bounds of his commissions; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents, and feminine flatteries, wrought and mollified him by little and little, at last he blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him, especially, for that he hoped not that he should return with the same power and authority, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himself, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be deprived of that dignity wherein they were at that time; but would return them the like kindness when Mariamne should be Queen, or next unto the King. Furthermore, he hoped, that if Herod also should return with all things answerable to his desires, that he would perform nothing without his Wives consent; or upbraid him with the act, if he contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loved her so, that it was impossible to equal or express his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the the trust that was committed unto him. But Mariamne was very sore displeased to hear that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether united and tied to the dangers of Herod; and the oftentimes wished that he might never more return again in safety, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which, the afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod, beyond all expectation, arrived in his Country, being adorned with mighty fortune, he first of all, as it became him, acquainted his Wife with his good tidings, and happy success, whom only amongst all other his friends and Wives, he she, while he repeated unto her these fortunate events of his affairs, rather entertained the fame with a pleasant attention, than applauding joy: Neither could her great sincerity cover the agitation of her mind. For when he folded his arms about her neck, she unfolded her sorrow in her sighs; so simple and unfeigned were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased than appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiving these things not only suspected, but also fully manifested: but above all things, he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparent hatred that his Wife had conceived against him, which incensed him so, that he could not resist the love that had attained him; so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace, and being unresolved in himself, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his mind tossed between love and hatred, when oftentimes he desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loves mediation failed him in the enterprise. For nothing did more torment more grievously wound himself, through the desire he bare unto his deceased delight. Whilst thus he was tortured in his passions, and conceived sinister opinions against Mariamne his Wife, Salome his sister, and his mother, having an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunity to express and execute their hatred towards Mariamne: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleen and disliking by variety of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his jealousie against her. To these reproaches of theirs he lent no unwilling ears; yet he had not the heart to attempt any thing against his Wife, or to give free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased, and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither she could colour her cares and discontents, nor contain himself from exchanging his love into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatal doom against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Antibony and Cleopatra being dead, Cæsar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cause, halting forward to meet and entertain him; he left his family in that present estate. Upon his departure, he recommended Mariamne to Sobemus, giving him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granting him in way of gratuity a part of Jerry to govern.

M When Herod was arrived in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæsar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cæsar gave him those four hundred French men that were of Cleopatra's guard; and restored that part of his Country unto him Cæsar called Gadara, Hippus, and Samaria, and on the Sea Coast, the Cities of Gaza, Antedon, Joppe, with the Tower of Strath: which when he had obtained, he grew more mighty than before: and after he had accompanied Cæsar as far as Antioch, he returned into his own Country. Upon his arrival, he found that fortune which was favourable unto him abroad, too froward at home, especially in regard of his Wife, in whose affection he seemed to be most happy: for he was inwardly touched with the lawful love of Mariamne, as any other of whom the Historians make report; and as for her, she was both chaste and faithful unto him; yet he had a certain womanly imperfection and natural frowardness, which was the cause that she presumed too much upon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; so that without regard of his person, who had power and authority over others, she entertained him oftentimes very outrageously: All which endured he patiently, without any shew of discontent. But Mariamne upbraided; and publicly reproached both the Kings mother and sister, telling them, that they were but abjectly and basely born.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity, and an uncoverable hatred between the Ladies; and from thence also, there arose an occasion of greater accusations and calumnyation than before. These suspicions were nourished amongst them, for the space of one whole year after Herods return from Cæsar; and at length, this long contriv'd hatred brake out violently, upon this occasion that ensued: Whereas about mid-day the King had had withdrawn himself into his Chamber to take his rest, he called Mariamme to him to sport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command she came unto him; yet would she not lie with him, nor entertain his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took these reproachful words in very evil part, and was almost ready to strike her: but his sister hearing a greater stir and noise than was usual, sent the Butler, who long before that time was suborned by her, whom she commanded to tell the King, that Mariamme had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love. Charging him moreover, that if the King in hearing him speak of this potion, should seem to be moved therewith, that then he should proceed further in his discourse. He therefore (being in this manner before-hand instructed what he ought to do) at that very instant was sent to discover his treachery unto the King; for which cause with a sober and stayed countenance he entered in unto him, being seriously and well prepared to discourse, and told him, that Mariamme had bribed him to present his Majesty with an amorous cup of drink. Now when he perceived that the King was troubled with these words, he prosecuted his discourse, alleging that the potion was a certain medicine which Mariamme had given him, the virtue whereof he knew not, which he had received according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his own security, and the Kings safety.

Salmone supplicated by Herod in Mariamme's behalf is put to death.

Mariamme is executed by Herod, and condemned, and supplicated, Mariamme by Salome's instigation, is led to execution.

Alexandra unbecomingly desires to requite her self of Mariamme's Treason.

Herods, who before this, was highly displeased, hearing these words, was so much the more incensed: for which cause, he presently commanded Mariamme's most faithful servant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poison, supposing that it was impossible for her to undertake any thing whatsoever without his privacy. He being tried and tormented after this cruel manner, confessed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared unto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceived against him, proceeded from certain words that Salmone had told her. Scarcely had he finished these words, but that the King cried out with a loud voice, saying, That Salmone, who before time had been most faithful, both to him and his Kingdom, would not have declared these his privy commands, except there had been some more inward familiarity and secrecy betwixt him and Mariamme: for which cause he presently commanded his Ministers to lay hands on Salmone, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her trial, and to this effect he assembled his most familiar friends, before whom he began to accuse her with great spite and spleen, as touching these potions and poisons aforesaid; wherein he used intemperate and unseemly speeches, and such as for their bitterness did ill become him in cause of justice; so that in the end, the assistants seeing the scope of his desire, pronounced sentence of death against her: which being past, both he, and all other the assistants were of his opinion, that she should not so speedily be executed, but that she should be kept close prisoner in some sure place in the Palace. But by Salome's solicitations, Herod was incited to hasten her death, for that she alleged that the King ought to fear, lest some sedition should be raised amongst the people, if he should keep her alive in prison. And by this means Mariamme was led unto her death.

Alexandra, her mother considering the estate of the time, and fearing no less mischief from Herods hands than her daughter was assured of; the undecently changed her mind, and abjectly laid aside her former courage and magnanimity. For intending to make it known, that she was neither party nor privy to those crimes wherewith Mariamme was charged, she went out to meet her daughter, and entertained her injuriously, protesting publicly that she was a wicked woman, and ungrateful towards her husband; and that she well deserved the punishment that was adjudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so heinous a fact, respecting to requite her husbands entire love with her unfeigned loyalty. Whilst thus dishonestly she counterfeited her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mariamme by the hair; the assistants, according to her desert, condemned her generally for her hypocrisy: but she that was led to be punished, convicted her self by her mild behaviour; for first of all, she gave her no answer, neither was any ways altered by her reproaches, neither would so much as cast her eye upon her; making it appear, that she discreetly concealed and covered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieved that she had so openly shewed so great indignity: expressing for her own part, a constant behaviour, and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her, perceived in her a kind of manifest courage and nobility, even in her utmost extremity.

the year of the World, 3936.
Upon this before Christ's

H Thus died Mariamme, having been a woman that excelled both in continence and courage notwithstanding that she failed somewhat in affability and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, she was an admirable and pleasing beauty, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein she was entertained, that it was impossible to express the same, in that she surpassed all those of her time; which was the principal cause that she lived so graciously and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loved her, she received nothing that might discontent her, she presumed upon a great and intemperate liberty in her discourse. She digested also the loss of her friends very hardly, and as in open terms she made known unto the King; whereby also it came to pass, that both Herods mother and sister, and himself likewise grew at odds with her.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections, who before as he had declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folk; but whereas almost even unto madness he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too unbridled manners of his wife to allay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doating on her, he increased the flame. And all that time especially he supposed that God was displeased with him for the death of Mariamme. Oftentimes he did invoke her name, using such lamentable expressions; that did not become the Majesty of a King. And notwithstanding he devised all kinds of delights and sports that might be imagined by preparing banquets, and inviting guests with Princely hospitality, to pass away the time; yet all those professed him nothing, for which cause he gave over the charge and administration of his Kingdom. At length he was so besotted with grief, that oftentimes he commanded his servants to call silence within the City, that consumed a great part of the people, and most of the nobility, and all interpreted that this punishment was inflicted by God upon them, for the unjust death of the Queen. Thus the Kings discontents being by this means increased, he at last hid himself in a solitary wilderness, under pretext of hunting; where alighting himself incessantly at last, he fell into a most grievous sickness. This disease of his was an inflammation or pain in the neck; he seemed also in some sort to rave and grow mad; neither any remedies relieve him of his agony: but when the sickness seemed rather to increase, all men at last grew almost desperate of his recovery. For which cause his Physicians, partly in respect of the contumacy of his disease, partly, because in so great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gave him leave to take whatsoever best pleased his appetite, committing the uncertain event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Whilst thus he continued in Samaria, which now is called Schaff, Alexandra, being at that time in Jerusalem, having notice of this his condition, endeavored to reduce all the strong fortresses that were within the City under her jurisdiction: the one of which was hard by the Temple; the other was situate within the City: for they that are Masters of the keep of all the rest of the nation under their awe; because that without these, neither the usual and daily sacrifices may be performed: neither may the Jews live without such sacrifices and oblations, who had rather lose their lives than condemn their religion. She therefore solicited those that had the government thereof to surrender them up to her, and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamme, lest he being dead, they should be seized on by others: and if it should fortune him to recover his health, in the mean while they might be kept and held by no man more securely, than such as were his nearest friends. This suit and solicitation of hers was but coldly received; and the Captains who at all times shewed themselves always faithful, at that time were the rather far more constant in their duty, both for that they had Alexandra's, and also that they thought it a great offence to despair of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods own Nephew, whose name was Achiab. For which cause they sent presently messengers unto him to shew him Alexandra's intent: who having heard these news, presently commanded her to be put to death; and it length overcoming his sickness, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he grew hateful unto all men: so that all those who offended him, and for how little cause soever were presently punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his friends, as Collabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater, surnamed Gadatas, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensued. Collabarus was an Idumean; and one of the greatest account amongst his countrymen, who was defended from the Priests of Cadiz, whom the Idumeans esteem for a god, before that Hircanus had obliged them to embrace the Jews Religion. Herod being made King of the Jews, appointed Collabarus to be Governor in Idumaea and Gaza, giving him Salome's sister to wife, after he had put Joseph to death, to whom he had been married before, as we have declared. Collabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more proud than this good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himself so far, that he thought himself dishonoured, if he should perform

For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods own Nephew, whose name was Achiab. For which cause they sent presently messengers unto him to shew him Alexandra's intent: who having heard these news, presently commanded her to be put to death; and it length overcoming his sickness, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he grew hateful unto all men: so that all those who offended him, and for how little cause soever were presently punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his friends, as Collabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater, surnamed Gadatas, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensued. Collabarus was an Idumean; and one of the greatest account amongst his countrymen, who was defended from the Priests of Cadiz, whom the Idumeans esteem for a god, before that Hircanus had obliged them to embrace the Jews Religion. Herod being made King of the Jews, appointed Collabarus to be Governor in Idumaea and Gaza, giving him Salome's sister to wife, after he had put Joseph to death, to whom he had been married before, as we have declared. Collabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more proud than this good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himself so far, that he thought himself dishonoured, if he should perform

that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumeans should be under the Jews subjection, notwithstanding they had received their manner of government from them. He therefore sent messengers upon Cleopatra, giving her to understand, that Idumea had always been under her ancestors subjection: and for that cause she ought upon just cause to demand and beg that country as Antonius hands, and that for himself he was ready to become her servant. All which he practised, not to gratify Cleopatra in any sort whatsoever, but to the intent that if Herods fortunes should be any wayes weakened, he might more easily by this means both enlarge and obtain the Kingdom of Idumea. And with these foolish hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by such dishonest means as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatra's often and earnest petition to obtain his sovereignty, yet could he not obtain it as Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of these covert and cunning practices, he was ready to kill Cassabarus. But upon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him, yet held him always in suspicion, by reason of this practice. Not long after it happened, that Salome fell at debate with Cassabarus, for which cause she sent a Bill of divorce to her husband, notwithstanding it was against the laws and ordinary customs of the Jews. For according to our ordinances, it is only lawful for the husband to do the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet it is not lawful for her to marry again, except her husband first give her licence. But Salome without respect of the laws of the country grounding herself too much upon her own authority, forsook her husband: saying, that she separated herself from her husband by reason of the great friendship which she bare unto her brother, for that he had received some notice that Cassabarus conspired against her with Antipater, Lyfmachus and Desibemus. And this accusation the confirmed by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all security for the space of twelve years. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soon as he heard it. For as for Babas sons, he had heretofore resolved to cut them off, for that they had been always disaffected towards him and all his enterprises; but all that time he had let them pass, because by continuance they were grown out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmity and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground: when Antigonus enjoyed the sovereignty, and Herod besieged the City of Jerusalem with an army; those inconveniences and necessities that ordinarily happen unto those that are besieged, were the cause that divers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes upon him. But Babas sons being in authority, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, persevered in their faithful observation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the Kingdom in those to whom it appertained by descent; and they themselves followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the Commonwealth. But after that the City was surprised by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Cassabarus, who was appointed to keep the City gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to have forsaken the Kings side, should escape, knowing that the sons of Babas were greatly esteemed and honoured among the people, and foreseeing that their safety might be no small furtherance to himself, if at any time there might ensue any alteration, he discharged and hid them within his own possessions: and notwithstanding that at that time he had protested to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them, yet though suspected of perjury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the King had by Proclamation promised a reward to him that should discover them, and sought for them by all means, neither then also would he confess the fact. For being afraid lest he should be punished for his first denial, he concealed them still, nor so much for their sake as for his own interest.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his sisters report, he sent to the place where they were hidden, and made kill them, and all those that were guilty of the same crime: so that no one of Herods kindred was now left alive, but all of them being killed, who excelled in nobility and dignity, he did what he pleased without any contradiction: for which cause he by little and little forsook the ceremonies and ordinances of his Country, and corrupted the decrees and institutions of their ancestors, which he ought to have kept inviolable, by his new and strange inventions. In whose time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of living: for all fell from bad to worse: and the politick order, whereby the people ought to be governed and kept within compalls of their duty, went to decay. For first of all, he ordained certain wrastlings from five years to five years, in honour of Caesar: and builded a Theater for that purpose within Jerusalem. He erected also a most huge Amphitheater within the Plain, which were two Monuments worthy to be seen, by reason of the sumptuousness thereof: but wholly contrary to the fashions of the Jews. For neither he

Hence, nor the presentation of these spectacles, hath ever been practised or taught by our Ancestors: yet was it his pleasure to enable this assembly, to the end it might be continued from five to five years, and this he proclaimed publicly in the Countries round about, and to this effect, he assembled all the nations. The wrastlers also and all that which concerned their exercise, were fought out from all corners of the world, under the hope to obtain the proposed palm and victory; and all the most expedient in those exercises that were to be found, were invited to that assembly: For he proposed most huge rewards, not only to those that exercised wrestling, but also to those who are called Musicians, and to all sorts of players on instruments, endeavoring to his utmost power, that all the most famous in those professions should be assistant in those pastimes. He appointed also a reward of great value for such as ran upon the chariots of three, four, or of one horse, and all that which was both sumptuous and magnificent to behold, for every one thing was most carefully provided, for he strove to have the honour of a most magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Caesars titles, and the trophies of those nations which were overcome by him, also together set out and shining with gold and silver. As for the instruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, costly vestments, or precious stones. Thither also were drawn certain wild beasts, as Lions and other beasts, which were worthy to be placed in this famous show, being admirable both for their force and rareness of nature, who sought the one with the other, and against such men likewise who were condemned to die: whereby the strangers conceived together with the admiration of his expense an uncomparable and unaccomplished pleasure. His countrymen interpreted this thing for a manifest corruption of those disciplines and manners, which they had entertained and honoured amongst them. For it was an act most manifestly impious, to hazard men against wild beasts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was also a matter as impious to change and prophanize the ordinances of the country for certain exercises: But the most hated of all these were the Trophies, for in that they were certain images attired in armor, the use and veneration whereof were forbidden by our laws, this displeased and grieved them more than any thing whatsoever: neither was Herod ignorant of those troubles which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the same for the present by force, and for that cause he familiarly debated the same with some few of them, and discoursed unto them his occasions, to the end to rid them of their superstition, but could not prevail. For all of them, with one consent, cried out against the indignity which they saw him commit: telling him that although all other things were to be tolerated, yet the Trophies, which were images of men, were unsupportable, because they were unusual in their Country. Herod perceiving that they were discontented, and that they would not be easily wrought upon, except they had some contentment, he called the worst of the men amongst them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought these Trophies were: and when they cried out that they were images of men, he inconsequently caused all the ornaments to be taken off from them, leaving them see that they were neither else but naked Rocks of wood, so that suddenly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were presently dissolved. Thus appeared he the people, and moderated the fury of their discontent, so that divers of them changed their opinions, and were no more displeased. Notwithstanding there were some of these that persisted in the conceit they had of those exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to undergo all dangers, than to endure any alteration in their customs, by permitting that Herod should introduce new and extraordinary fashions, who only in word was their King, but in effect an enemy of their whole nation. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselves by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they had hid certain short swords under their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who urged and egged on by the strangeness of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to resist that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of them were not a little confirmed: These having mutually undertaken this resolution, repaired to the Theater, under hope that Herod should not escape them, for that they intended to assail him unawares: at least if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foul on some of his favorites and followers, accounting this to be some comfort in their expected death, if in regard of their violated religion they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And these intending to offer themselves as Leaders unto the rest, resolved to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herod had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, having discovered all their conspiracy, signified the same unto the King, when he was ready to enter into the Theater. He knowing very well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betook himself to his Palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there

his daughter.

About the same time also he sent Caesar certain supplies, namely, five hundred chosen A men of his Guard, whom Ellius Gallus led into the Wars in Arabia, and had often use of them in his most dangerous attempts. When therefore his Kingdom was referred to his former felicity, he builded a Royal Palace in the higher part of the City, furnished with many large buildings, and adorned with gold and marble seats, so that they might receive a great number of men: he named also each room of the house according to their several names, and called one the lodging of Caesar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with love, he married a wife, left he should be disgraced by vain desires, and the cause of this his new marriage was this: There was amongst those that dwelt in Jerusalem a certain Citizen called Simon, the son of Bathas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in Nobility amongst them: this man had a daughter, the fairest and comeliest creature of that age, whose beauty being renowned by the common voice, it came to pass, that Herod was taken with her good character, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he fell in love with her; yet would not use his authority, lest he should seem to behave himself tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed unworthy of his affinity, and yet too worthy to be contemned, he made election of a convenient means to obtain the fulness of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Jesús, the son of Phabettis, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinity with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded C a new Castle in that place wherein he had overcome the Jews, when he made war against Antigonus.

This place is distant from Jerusalem some sixty furlongs, or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence and fortification. For near it there is a certain steep hill made by Art, after the manner of a round dug, environed with round Towers, with a steep ascent of two hundred steps cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are divers places builded with great and sumptuous workmanship; made both for defence and delight. At the foot of this hill there are two houses worthy to be seen, for divers singularities, and namely, by reason of those Conduits of water, which although they spring not in that place, yet notwithstanding they are brought from far with great cost and expence. D The Plain that adjoineth upon it, is all full of buildings, after the manner of a City, and the top of the Castle commandeth all the Plain. As soon as he had disposed all his affairs, according to his hearts desire, he possessed the Kingdom in great quietness, for that he made his subjects obedient unto him, both by fear, in shewing himself inexorable when it concerned him to punish; and by liberality, whereby he provided for their publick necessities: he therefore took an especial care of himself, as if the life and safety of his person had been the security of his people. He behaved himself officiously and favourably towards all foreign Cities; he entertained the Princes with presents, which according to his occasions he sent unto them, to insinuate himself into their favors, being in his own nature magnificent and fit to govern: so that all his fortunes increased, and all things fell out happily according to his desire. True it is, that the care which he employed in honouring Caesar, and other mighty Magistrates of Rome, caused him to outstrip his customs, and to alter divers Ordinances of his Country in building Cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the Land of Jury: for the Jews would not have endured it, because we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likeness of a man, as the Greeks are accustomed to do; but he did this in the Country and foreign Cities, and excused himself to the Jews: saying, that he did it not of his own head, but performed that according to the charge which he had from others, who were greater than himself: and in the mean while gratified Caesar and the Romans, in that he respected their honour more than he did the ordinances of his Country: although in all things he had regard to his particular advantage, and determined with himself to leave behind him after his death, large and ample testimonies of his power and greatness; which was the cause that he builded Cities with great charge and expence.

Syon, which was called after a building of Herod.

When as therefore he had found out a fit and convenient place upon the Sea-coast to build a City, on which of long time had been called the Tower of Syon, he both magnificently designed and set down the model and form thereof, and made many sum-

H prodious buildings, both Palaces and other private Lodgings, not builded after a slight manner, or of weak and fading matter, but of Marble. But the greatest work of all, was the Haven which he made exempt and free from storms and tempests, that in greatness resembled that of Pharus, and was so spacious, that it was able to receive many great Ships into the Road, and had divers Rooms and Warehouses to lay up the Merchandise therein. And the more admirable was this Structure, because the materials that were fit to finish this great work, were not gotten in that place, but must needs be brought from other places, with great charge and expence. This City is seated in Phenicia, upon the Coast in the way to Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, certain Villages situate upon the Sea-coasts, unfit either for landing or harbour, by reason of the Africk wind, and driving the sand of the Sea upon the shore, giveth not any quiet road unto the ships, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at Anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the Port so spacious, that it was able to receive a great Fleet: and he the Port of Caesarea. cast down to the bottom thereof, which was about some twenty fathoms deep, certain huge stones, that for the most part were fifty foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, some more, and some less. This Mole extended two hundred foot, of which one half served to break the violence of the waves; on the other half was built a wall fortified with Towers, whereof the fairest was called by the name of Drusus, Livia, Augustus Emperors Son, who died young: there was also many Vaults like Arches, to lodge Sea-men, K The descent being hard by, encompassed all the Port like a round plat-form, that served for a pleasant walking place. The entrance and mouth of the Haven was toward the North, which is a wind that of all other most purifeth and cleanseth. The supporter and strength of all the circuit on the left hand, upon the entrance to the Port, was an ample and huge Tower, to fasten it the more strongly; and on the right hand were two huge Pillars of Stone, higher than the Tower, that stood opposite against them, erected and fastened together. All round about the Haven there were certain buildings, all of a row, of polished Marble, and in the midst there was a little Mount, on which there was a Temple dedicated to Augustus, which presented it self to their sight who sailed to the Port, there being two Statues, the one representing Rome, and the other Augustus Caesar. This City also L was called Caesarea, as much to be wondered at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the Art whereby it was erected; and no less cunning was there shewed in the Vaults and Conduits under ground, then in those buildings that were about them: some of them were conveyed toward the Port, and discharged themselves into the Sea: but there was one that went athwart all the rest, to the end that thereby the rain-water, and the cleansings of the City might be conveyed into the Sea, and that when the Sea should flow, it might wash and cleanse all the City.

He erected also a Theater of Stone, and behind the same, to the Southward, an Amphitheater, that was able to receive a great number of men, and so pleasantly and fitly situated, that from thence a man might discover Ships at a great distance on the Sea. This M City was finished at the end of twelve years, during which time the King was never wearied in following the work, nor negligent in furnishing the necessary charges. After this, perceiving that the City of Sebasta was already inhabited also, he resolved to send his two sons, Alexander and Aristobolus, to Rome, to present them unto the Emperor Caesar. Caesar gave them but it was needless, because Augustus gave them an apartment in his own Palace. The great Emperor received them with all the kindness and civility imaginable; and gave their father the freedom to make choice of either of them to succeed him in his Kingdom, enlarging it with the addition of three Provinces, Trachona, Baranica, and Auranica, on this occasion that followeth. A certain man, called Zenodorus, had rented Lysanias Lands; and more, he lived upon spoils and robberies in Trachona, which is a Country the inhabitants whereof commonly live by pillage and spoil, which they purchase from the Citizens and Merchants of Damasco. And so far was Zenodorus from prohibiting these robberies, that he himself also was partaker of the booty: so that the Nations neighbouring about, seeing themselves thus abused, sought for remedy at Rome hands, who was their Governor, requiring him to acquaint Caesar with Zenodorus's proceedings. Which when he understood, he commanded that such lawless rymers should be punished, and that the Country should be added to the Jurisdiction of Herod, to the intent that by his vigilancy, the inhabitants of Trachona should no more molest their neighbors. For it was hard to restrain them, considering that they were accustomed, and tradred in such theft, and could not live otherwise. For they neither had Towns nor Lands, neither heritages nor any possessions, but only certain retreats and caves under ground, and lived pell-mell like beasts: and having made abundant provision of water and victuals, they might easily endure War a long time, time, and maintain themselves in their caves, when their enemies assailed them without. A

 The doors of these dens were so narrow, that they could be entered but by one at once:
 but within it was incredible spacious and large: the upper part thereof was not steep, but plain, and in form of a smooth earth: for the whole place naturally consisted of a sharp and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult passage thereon, unless a man be guided thorough the paths. For the way was not direct and straight, but full of winding and many turnings.
 At such time as they wanted opportunity to spoil their neighbors, they robbed one another, and omitted no kind of wickedness. Herod having received the gift of this Country from Caesar, resorted thither under the conduct of certain guides that knew the ways, and having brought their power and proling to an end, he left the neighbouring nations B in assured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with envy, partly incited by the grief which he conceived through the loss of his possessions, resorted to Rome to accuse Herod, yet could compass nothing of that which he intended.

When Agrippa was sent into Syria by Caesar to govern the Provinces beyond the seas, Herod, because he was his familiar friend, went to salute him at Mytilene where he wintered, and afterwards returned into Syria. But certain Gadareans came unto Agrippa with an intention to accuse Herod: but he sent them bound unto the King, and vouchsafed them no audience. On the other side, the Aurantians, who of long time hated Herod's Government, stirred up commotions, and endeavored to draw the country into rebellion, and that upon a just ground, as it seemed, at that time: for Zenodorus despairing of his affairs, went C and sold them a certain part of the Lordship in Aurantia, which was comprehended within Caesar's donation to Herod, for the sum of fifty talents of yearly revenue, wherewith they grew discontented, for that they were unjustly deprived of their estates: and hereupon they made often incursions, endeavoring sometimes to recover the same by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their possession by course of justice. They drew also unto them certain needy Soldiers; who according to the custom of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innovations: which though Herod knew, and could have providently prevented them, yet exhorted them to maintain their titles right by good means than open violence, being loth to give any occasion of new trouble and dispute. At length, in the seventeenth year of his reign Caesar came into Syria: upon whose arrival divers of the Gadareans began to exclaim against Herod, accusing him of his severity and tyranny: which accusation they the rather attempted, because they were chiefly incited thereunto by the intigations and false suggestions of Zenodorus, who bound himself by an oath, that he would never give over, until that delivering them from Herod's tyranny, they were reduced under Caesar's protection. The Gadareans persuaded by these his protections, began to continue their exclamations, and somewhat the more audaciously, for that they perceived that they lived as yet unpunished, whom Agrippa had delivered into Herod's hands: for Herod had let them at liberty without any punishment, notwithstanding that in regard of his own subjects he was inexorable as ever man was; and most patient in enduring those injuries that were offered him by strangers, whom he always dismissed E without revenge. When therefore they accused him of violence and rapine, and for violating and razing down their Temples, Herod being nothing concerned thereat, presented himself before the Emperor to justify his actions. But Caesar entertained him very kindly, and dismissed nothing of the good affection which he bare unto him, notwithstanding all the upstarts and insolent tumults of the people. This was the first day spent in audience of their complaints, and in those dayes that followed there were no further objections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Caesar's disposition and the inclination of his Council, and fearing (as it was most likely) to be delivered into Herod's hands, the next night after some of them killed themselves; others for fear of torments brake their own necks; and some of them also drowned themselves in the river. And thus whereas they seemed to condemn themselves, Caesar presently absolved Herod.

And this felicity of his was seconded with another of small consequence. For Zenodorus having his bowels broken through an extrem flux of blood, finished his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Caesar gave Herod his Country, which was a large possession, and was situate between Trachonitis and Galilee, containing Ulaitha, Panaea, and the Countries thereabouts. He made him one of the Governors of Syria also, commanding them to execute nothing without his advice. At this time he attained to the height of all worldly felicity: For wheresoever within the mighty Roman Empire all things were disposed by Caesar and Agrippa, Caesar honoured no man more than Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa respected him above all men next to Caesar. Woe upon him that grew to be so confident, that he begged a Titulus at Caesar's hands, for his brother Pheroras: on whom he bestowed one hundred talents of his revenue out of his own Kingdom, that if he should happen to die, Pheroras estate might be assured and left no wayes subject unto his children.

H As soon as he had conducted Caesar as far as the Sea, upon his return he builded a stately Temple of White Marble in honour of his Name, in the country which belonged to Zenodorus, near to a place which is called Panion, which is a huge cave in the East of a Mountain, and a place of great pleasure, under which there is a wide pool of immeasurable depth, which is full of standing Water, and the upper part of the Mountain is very high. From under this cave springs the fountain heads of the flood Jordan. This place of it self so famous and delightful, was chosen out by Herod, and adorned also with a Temple which he built in honour of Caesar. At that time also he released the third part of those tributes which his subjects paid unto him, to the end (as he said) that he might I relieve his subjects after the penalty they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their favours, who were finitely affected towards him.
 For they had conceived an hatred against him, because all piety was in a manner abolished, and the ordinances of the country in a fort dismantled by the means of those temples which he had built, and each man privily murmured bitterly against him, so that they were inclining to a mutiny. But Herod with great discretion prevented it, and cut off all occasions of insurrection, commanding every one to mind his business; forbidding them to make any assemblies in the City, or to talk one with another, under colour of walking abroad for pleasure or feasts sake. Moreover he had sent out certain Intelligencers to discover all that which was done, appointing grievous punishments for those that milked his K Government. For divers of them were led unto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some privately, where they were no sooner imprisoned but they were put to death; and both in the City and in the country, there were certain men appointed to take note of all such that used any assemblies upon any occasion whatsoever. He was so concerned at his subjects distastes, that as it is reported of him, he took the habit of a private man, and thrust himself in the night time into the company of the people, to understand and gather what they thought of his government, and those whom he found to be untractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one means or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serve him faithfully, and constrained them to keep the oath they had sworn, and to acknowledge his Sovereignty: wherunto
 I divers through the fear they conceived, easily conformed. But they who had more courage, & were discontented to see themselves constrained to cut them off by all means possible. He required also an oath of divers of these sectaries who followed the Pharisees Polio and Samaeus, and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet he did not punish them as he did the other for their refusal, in respect and reverence of Polio their Master.
 From this rigor also were they exempt, who amongst us are called Essenes, which is a sort of men that live after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Grecians, of whom I have more expressly discoursed in another place.

I think it not a matter to be overlipp't, neither varying from my History, to report what cause the King had for religious an opinion of those men. There was a certain Es-M se called Manabem, who in his sect was accounted an upright and just man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He feeling Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to School, saluted him and called him King of the Jews. Herod supposing that Manabem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproved him sharply for his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himself to be one of the common sort. Manabem smiling, hit him gently with his hand upon the back, and said unto him, Thou shalt be King, and shalt have a happy reign; for such is Gods pleasure: and at that time remember thy self of the words that Manabem spake unto thee, which shall serve for a testimony to put thee in mind of thy mutable estate. For it becometh thee nothing more, than by justice, piety, and equity, to win the hearts of thy subjects: yet know I by revelation from God, N that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both divine and humane laws, though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate, and purchase eternal glory.
 Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands, for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life with a grievous punishment.

At that time Herod gave small regard to these his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soon as he had obtained the Kingdom to the fullness of his felicity, he in the greatness of his power sent for Manabem, and asked him how long he should reign. But he returned him a doubtful answer. Which when Herod perceived, he asked him anew if he should reign ten years. Wherunto Manabem answered, And twenty, and thirty, without letting him down any prefixed term. He O and contenting himself therewith, embraced Manabem, and gave him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Essenes for his sake. I have thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they seem incredible, to declare that divers of our nation have had communication with GOD by reason of their holiness.

Herod buildeth a New Temple in Jerusalem, after he had pulled down the Old.

Herod's Reformation, chap. 14. al. 11.

Herod intended to re-edify God's Temple. Herod certifies the people that he will re-edify the Temple.

IN the eighteenth year of his reign, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceived in his mind, a mighty project, which was to re-edify God's Temple of greater bigness and answerable height, hoping that this work, which was the most admirable of all those he had undertaken (as indeed it was) being finished, would eternize his memory. But fearing lest the people, in regard of the greatness of the enterprise, would be hardly drawn thereunto, he determined to found their intentions by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner:

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain and superfluous, to recount unto you what things I have performed, during the time of my government. For they have been of that nature, that they have returned me but little honour, and your self great profit and security. For you your selves know, that in those adventures that have befallen you, I have been no ways negligent in that which concerned your profit: and in those buildings I have erected by Gods assistance, I have not so much regarded my self, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I have brought the estate of the Jews to that degree of felicity, that they never had or expected before this time. As for that which I have particularly done in the heart of the Country, and in the Cities which I have augmented, as well with ornament and beauty, as with a number of inhabitants: since you your selves know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memory. But I must assure you that the design which I will presently undertake, is far more holy and more excellent, than may be performed by us. For our predecessors, after they were returned from the captivity of Babylon, builded a Temple in Honour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted sixty cubits of that which Solomon first built: yet ought we not to object it as a blame, or ascribe this action to any impiety in our ancestors. For the Temple was not at their disposing, but the measure of their Building was set down by Cyrus and Darius the Son of Hydastapes, to whom and their Successors, they have first of all been slaves, as after their time they have been under the subjection of the Macedonians: so that they had not the means and opportunity to raise this religious Monument, according to the first pattern, to that requisite and convenient height. But since at this present, by Gods permission, I have obtained the Kingdom: and that for a long time hitherto we have enjoyed a happy peace: and that neither money nor great revenues are wanting: and that which is our greatest good, we are made happy by the favour of the Romans, who in a sort are Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my self to repair that defect, which happened in times past through the miseries of our noble predecessors: resolving with my self to perfect that which is requisite for the service of God, in acknowledgment of the benefits which I have received from him, by whose mercy and means I have obtained my Kingdom.

This sudden and unexpected speech of Herods filled all mens ears with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he seemed to promise such a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought far greater than his power: and that which most distracted them was, for that they had conceived a fear, lest after he had pulled down the old, he should not be of ability to erect a new. For which cause, his counsel seemed to be dangerous, and attempt over difficult. But the King perceiving with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promising in no sort to debase the Old Temple, before all that was prepared and polished, which was requisite for the building of the New. And in this he kept his word: For he appointed a thousand chariots to draw the stones unto the place, and chose out amongst the rest ten thousand expert workmen. He appalled also at his own charge one thousand Priests in their accustomed Vestments, whereof some gave the Masons instructions how they should work, and the rest assisted the Carpenters. This done, after he had prepared all things requisite, he caused them to fall to their building. As soon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and new were planted in their place, the Temple was erected upon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twenty cubits in height, above those hundred cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in some manner sunk, after that by process of time the foundations began to be settled: and during Neros reign our Countymen thought to have raised it to the first height. The building was of white and strong marble stones, where each of them twenty and five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about some twelve cubits broad. All the structure of the same was made after the manner of a Princely Palace on all sides, and the middle part thereof was higher than

The Jews fearing lest Herod should pull down the old Temple before he had prepared matter for the new, he promised the contrary. Convenient stuff is gathered for the building of the Temple.

How the Temple was builded by Herod.

Hthan the rest: so that it might easily be discovered by the inhabitants of the Country many furlongs off; and especially it was most apparent and subje& to their sight, who dwelt opposite against it, or repaired unto the City. The doors thereof and their porches were correspondent to the rest of the magnificence of the Temple, garnished with divers Tapestries and Azure Flowers, which adorned the Pillars: under whose chapters a Golden Vine spread it self on each side, replenished with many goodly clusters of Grapes hanging down: which was an admirable work to behold, both in respect of the greatness, as also for the workmanship and matter whereof it was made. He encompassed all the Temple with most stately Galleries, correspondent to the magnificence of the same, and surpassing those in times past for the cost: so that never any man before him so magnificently adorned the Temple. Two of which were underpinned with very strong walls, whose Workmanship was so exquisite, that it is incredible to relate. There was a stony rising or hillock, and very straight and high, the top whereof towards the Eastermost part of the City was somewhat smooth and bending. The first that encompassed it with a wall, was Solomon our King, who by Gods favour, and labour of divers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also inclosed the lower part thereof with another wall, under which to the Southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastened the one unto the other with Lead, shutting all within his enclosure, and extending it self very deep: so that the greatness and height of this four square building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatness of the Stones appeared in the Front, but on the inside they were fitted together with clasples of Iron, which fortified and strengthened the building for ever against all injuries of times. This work having been thus continued to the top, and the void space between the wall and the rising hillock filling up the floor above, was made level. The whole circuit of the Tower contained about four fadoms or furlongs, a fadom or furlong in length from angle to angle. On the inside and near unto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the Eastern side: having a double porch of equal greatness with that of the wall, and placed in the middle of the Temple, and openeth right upon the gates thereof, which the Kings formerly had adorned. Round about the Temple were planted those spoils which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all those spoils which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the North side there stood a very strong Fortrefs, builded by the Ammonians, who were Herods predecessors, and had been both Kings and High Priests, and had imposed a name on that Tower which was Babylon, in which they kept the Priestly Vesture, wherewith the High Priest was wont to be adorned at that time only, when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, and there remained it after his death, until the time of Tiberius Caesar, under whom Vitellius Governor of Syria, came unto Jerusalem, where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence, as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the favour that he had received at their hands, being requested by them that they might have the keeping of the High Priests Ornaments, he wrote unto Tiberius Caesar to grant them that favour: and till the death of King Agrippa the Jews had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Calpurnius Longinus that governed Syria, and Cassius Fadus Lieutenant of Judaea, commanded the Jews to return the same into the Fortrefs Athonia; saying, That the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had been in times past. For which cause the Jews sent Embassadors to Claudius Caesar, to request his favour therein, who arriving at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperor that it might be lawful for him to have the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the Governour of Syria, to deliver it into his hands. It was formerly kept under the seal of the High Priest, and the custody of the Treasurers, and on the Eve of a certain solemn Feast, the Treasurers went up to the Captain, who kept the Fortrefs for the Romans, and after they had opened their seal, they took the habit: and after the Feast was past, they returned it back again unto the same place, and shut it up under the same seal in the presence of the Captain.

After that Herod had in this manner builded this strong Tower for the security and guard of the Temple, he called it Antonia, for the love of Antonia his friend, and one of the chiefest men in Rome. In the Western part of this porch, there were four gates, whereof the one opened upon the Kings Palace, to which there was a direct way thorough the middle of the valley: the two others led unto the suburbs: and the fourth opened upon the rest of the City, and gave open passage unto the same, by the means of a number of stairs, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley: and from thence there was an ascent by other stairs to ascend upwards. For the City was situate opposite to the Temple, after the manner of a Theatre, which ended at this valley valley on the South side, where, on the very front of this square, there was also another gate in the middle, equally distant from both corners, and a stately Triple Gallery, the length whereof extended from the oriental valley, as far as the Western. It was impossible to extend it any further, for it took up all the space. This work was one of the most famous pieces that was ever seen under the Sun. For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottom if he looked downward from the higher part; and notwithstanding, on the same he erected this porch off a great height, that but to look from the top thereof, and to consider the depth as well of the Valley, as the height of the Porch, it would make a man giddy, and his eye could not pierce unto the bottom of the same. Those Galleries were supported by four ranks of Pillars equally distant; and a strong stone wall filled up the spaces that were between the pillars of the fourth rank: the thickness of the pillars was such, that one was as much as three men could fathom, holding one another by the hand, for each of them was twenty and seven foot about, with a double base at the bottom. The whole number of them was one hundred sixty and two, they were engraven and damask with Corinthian work, so that it moved admiration in those that beheld it. Betwixt these four ranks of pillars there were three Porches, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, and in length a fadde or furlong: and more than fifty foot in height. That in the midst was in breadth once and half as much as these two; and in height twice as much. The floor was made of rare planks, engraven with divers figures, and the roof thereof was far higher than any of the rest, in which were certain huge beams mortised, on which there were certain pillars builded, united and joyned together, that it is incredible to those that have not seen it, and admirable to him that beholdeth it: for all the work seemed to be but one stone. Such was the fashion of the circuit of the first Porch. In the midst, and not far off from the other, stood the second: whereunto there was an ascent made with few steps. It was inclosed with a separation of stone, with an Inscription, forbidding any stranger to enter the same upon pain of death. This inward porch both to the Southward and the Northward had three gates, in rank equidistant the one from the other: and toward the eastward had one great gate, by which those men entered, who were cleansed with their wives. For beyond that place it was not lawful for the women to have access. But the third inward space was once accessible by the Priests. In it was the Temple, and within it the Altar, on which they were wont to offer up sacrifices unto God. But Herod durst not enter into the interior Sanctuary, because he was not a Priest, he committed that Fabric to the Priests care, which they accomplished in a year and a half time: Herod had been eight years about the rest. The people were replenished with the fulness of joy, and every one gave thanks unto God for that the whole Work was finished so speedily, and wished all happiness to the King for his cost and diligence in the execution and finishing thereof: and they celebrated a great Feast in honour of the re-establisment of the Temple. Then did the King offer up three hundred Oxen unto God, and the rest of them, each one according to his ability offered so many sacrifices, that they can hardly be numbered.

About the very time of the Celebration of this Feast, in the honour of the Re-dedication of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to solemnize every year with great joy: and for this two-fold occasion the solemnity and joy was far more sumptuous and compleat. The King also caused a Conduit of Water to be made, and conveyed by pipes under ground, drawing it from the Castle Autua unto the East gate of the Temple; near to which he builded another Tower aloft to the end, that by the Conduits he might ascend privily unto the Temple, if haply the people should practise any insurrections against his Royalty. It is reported, that during the building of this Temple, it never rained by day time, but only by night, to the intent the work might not be interrupted: and our Predecessors have testified no less unto us. Neither is this thing incredible, if we attentively consider those other effects of Gods Providence.

CHAP. I.

Herod maketh a Law which maketh him be reputed a Tyrant: He goeth to Rome, and brings back his Sons Alexander and Aristobulus; his Sister Salome and those of her Faction endeavour to render them odious to him.

The year of the World, 3595, before Christ's Nativity, 9. Herod made a new Law, that wall-breakers should be sold into Bondage out of the Kingdom. The punishment of theft as much as he stole: Which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be sold; not unto strangers, nor into perpetual bondage, but only for seven years; at which time he should again be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new Law to let down an unjust punishment, and rather to favour of tyranny, than of Princely dignity, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient Laws: So that for this cause all men spake very ill of the King.

Amongst the rest of the affairs of the Commonwealth, the King thought it behoved him to redress and hinder private injuries, both in the City and Countrey: For the which purpose he made a new Law unlike to the former, that it should be lawful for such as were Wall-breakers, to be sold for slaves without the limits of his Kingdom: Which Law did not seem so much to intend the punishment of Malefactors, as the dissolution of his own Countrey customs. For to serve Foreign Nations, who lived not after the manner of the Jews, and to do whatsoever they commanded them, was more prejudicial unto Religion than unto the parties provided of that fact. Wherefore it was sufficiently already in the old ancient Laws provided for the punishment of such people, to wit, that a thief should restore four times as much as he stole: Which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be sold; not unto strangers, nor into perpetual bondage, but only for seven years; at which time he should again be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new Law to let down an unjust punishment, and rather to favour of tyranny, than of Princely dignity, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient Laws: So that for this cause all men spake very ill of the King.

At the same time Herod failed into Italy to salute Caesar, and to see his Children living at Rome. Where Caesar receiving him very courteously, permitted him to take his Sons home with him, as being now sufficiently instructed in the Liberal Arts. Who returning into their Countrey, were joyfully received of all their Countrey-men, both for that they were of comely stature, and of courteous behaviour, and in their very carriage did shew that they came of Kingly lineage. Which things moved Salome and the rest, by whose false accusations their Mother Mariam was destroyed, to envy them; fearing their power, and verily perswading themselves that they would be revengers of their Mother's injuries. So taking hereby occasion, they began also falsely to accuse them, as milking their Father, who had caused their Mother to be slain; and as though they had an aversion from him, whose hands were imbrued in their Mother's blood. For they knew that by such calumny they might draw them into hatred, and avert their Father's good will from them. Yet did they not carry these their inventions to the King's ears, but contented themselves to bruit them abroad amongst the common people; which in the end coming to his hearing, would cause in him such enmity and hatred against his Sons, that it would overcome in him all natural affection.

Salome and others falsely accused Herod's Sons, and made their Father hate them.

CHAP. II.

How Herod gave Wives unto Alexander and Aristobulus, and how nobly he received Agrippa in his Dominions.

But the King as yet mistrusting nothing, moved with a Fatherly care over them, had them in such esteem as reason did require, and for that they were now come unto man's estate, he married them both: Unto Aristobulus he gave Bernice the daughter of Salome; and unto Alexander, Glaphyra the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Which done, understanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Asia, he went unto him thither, and invited him into his Kingdom, requesting him to accept of his Friend's entertainment. Which Agrippa yielding unto, Herod omitted

Admitted nothing that might delight him: For he received him in his Cities newly built, shewing him the fair houses, and goodly Edifices, entertaining him and the rest of his friends and followers with all sorts of delights, pomp and magnificence, as well at Sebaste, as at the Haven of Caesarea, and in the Castles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Nativis, Herodium and Hircania. He also brought him to Jerusalem, where all the people met him apparelled in such rich and brave attire, as they were accustomed to adorn themselves withal, when they celebrate their Festivals, and with many joyful acclamations received and saluted him. Agrippa offered an hundred head of fat Oxen to God, and feasted all the people; and although he would willingly have made a longer abode there, yet Winter drawing on, fearing tempestuous weather, he was forced to fail away with all speed to Jonia, both he and his friends being honoured with very great presents.

CHAP. III.

Herod goeth to meet Agrippa at Pontus with a Fleet, by which he reinforceth his Army; and returning back with him a great part of his way, did much good to several Towns.

Herod having past the Winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was with an Army minded to go to Bosporus, the Spring time being now at hand, he failed unto him again, and taking his course by Rhodes and Cos, he came towards Lesbos, thinking there to find Agrippa: But by a contrary wind he was driven from thence, and forced to stay a while at Chios; where many privately coming to salute him, he rewarded them with Princely rewards: and perceiving that the City gate, destroyed in the Wars against Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but fill lay ruined for want of money to repair it, he gave so much money as largely sufficed to restore it to the former beauty and bigness; exhorting them with all expedition to re-edifice and adorn the City as it was in times past. At last the wind changing, he failed first to Mitylene, and then to Bizantium; and there understanding that Agrippa had already past the Rocks of Cyane, he followed him with all speed, and overtook him at Synope a City of Pontus: Who contrary to Agrippa's expectation arrived there with his Navy: Herod's coming was very grateful unto Agrippa, and with especial affection they embraced one another. It was an evident sign of friendship, that the King omitting his own private business, would now come unto him in so convenient a time. Wherefore Herod abode still with him in the Army, always present either to assist him with counsel, or to bear part of the Labour with him. He was also present with him at such times as he meant to be merry, being his only Counsellor in difficult matters, for the benevolence he bare unto him, and also in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa having dispatched the business in Pontus for which he came, it pleased him not to return by Sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and so they came by land to Ephesus: and there taking ship they came to Samos. And in that whole Journey, almost in every City he gratified Herod, at his entreaty relieving many of their necessities. And Herod did in the way help many with money that wanted, and spent much upon his Guests; and moreover, if any one had any suit unto Agrippa, Herod was the only man that might obtain his suit for him. And though Agrippa also was both nobly minded and easily entreated to grant all such things as were not prejudicial to any man; yet was it a matter of no small moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to use beneficence, being even of his own accord forward enough to put the same in practice. For first of all he reconciled Agrippa, being angry against the Citizens of Iliensis, and himself paid the money that the people of Chios were indebted unto to Caesar's receivers, obtaining for them an immunity: And he also assisted and pleased others in whatsoever they needed.

CHAP. IV.

The Jews who lived in Jonia complain to Agrippa, that the Grecians will not let them enjoy their Privileges.

When they came into Jonia, a great multitude of the Jews inhabiting that Countrey being gathered together, expected him to speak unto him; and finding so by opportunity, they complained unto him of the wrongs that those Countrey-men offered ferred them, not permitting them to live according to their Laws; and that upon Festival days they pulled and haled them before their Tribunal: and that they would not permit them to send sacred money unto Jerusalem, and that they compelled them to do publick busines, and to spend the Holy money in those affairs, contrary to the Privileges granted unto them by the Romans. Herod endeavoured to have the Jews complaints heard by Agrippa, and desired one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Jews cause: Who made a speech unto Agrippa, sitting with the rest of the Roman Nobility, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalf after this manner: "Most worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all men that suffer injury, are constrained to fly for redress to the Higher Powers, and we, over and above, hope to obtain our suit. For we ask nothing but that which your goodness hath already granted, and that which they endeavour to take from us that are as we also are, your Subjects. And although that your benefit bestowed upon us was great, yet we are worthy still to enjoy it, only for that you your self judged us worthy thereof. And suppose it was a small matter, it is a discredit for you not to grant so small a trifle. Wherefore it is evident, that the injury done unto us, doth also redound unto you, whose decrees those that have injured us, fear not to contemn, and do disdain your benevolence towards us. For if any one should ask any of them, whether they had rather lose their lives, than be deprived of their Country Laws, rites, sacrifices and festivities, wherewith they honour their gods, I know they would rather endure any calamity, than to be forced to forsake their Country-customs. For many Wars arise only for defence of Religion: and the greatest reward and content that we reap by this happy peace, which through your means we enjoy, is this, that we are every one permitted to live according to the custom of his Country, and to continue in piety. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by no means they would permit to be taken from themselves, as who would say, it was not as great offence to hinder other men's piety and devotion, as neglect their own. Let us consider whether there be any City or Nation, that doth not count their felicity to be situate in your dominion, and the power of the Romans? or is there any that desireth your honour and power to decay and be of no force? Truly none that is wise: For there is none, whom either publicly or privately it concerneth not: L But these people endeavouring to take from us our liberty, do also as it were deprive themselves of all benefits which they have received at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other Nations living under the dominion of rigorous Kings constituted over them; these do only obey the Romans, and live in happy peace and tranquillity? But as for our affairs, were no man troublesome unto us, yet are they not such as deserve to be envied. For enjoying the common felicity, which others your Subjects do, we desire nothing of high esteem or worth, but only request that we may live according to the Religion of our Country, which of it self is not to be envied, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth always love them who honour him, and them who do not hinder his honour. M What is there in our Religion offensive to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all piety and justice, whereby all things continue and are preserved? For neither do we conceal what life we follow, nor the labours and exercise we use, but resting the seventh day from all labours, we spend that day in learning our Religion, and the Laws and customs thereof, esteeming this custom not to be of small force to correct and amend our manners. These our customs having in them nothing that any that searcheth them can justly reprehend, they are now also, though many are persuaded the contrary, consecrated and confirmed by their antiquity: So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our Laws, that have endured so many ages. There are the injuries that these people by violence offer us; they sacrilegiously take from us the money dedicated to God: They impose tributes upon us, who are free: They upon festival days force us to their Tribunals, to Law, and other prophane busines, without any necessity, but only in contempt and disgrace of our Religion, which they know well in the mean time while they persecute with unjust and unlawful hatred. For your Empire, equally providing for the good of all your Subjects, doth not only nourish the mutual concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice. There are the injuries, most worthy Agrippa, whereof we seek redress at thy hands, requesting thee that hereafter we may live according to our Religion as formerly, and that our adversaries may have no more authority over us than we over them: which is not only justice and equity, but already also O granted by your clemency. And there are yet extant, to be seen in the Capitol, many decrees and ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engraven in brass, which

A "which are read unto this day: doubtless for our truth and fidelity so oftentimes tried; or at least, though we not deserving it, yet holy and inviolate. For you do not only not withdraw from us and all other Nations, your former benefits granted unto us, but you do rather every day, beside all hope and expectation, increase them; all which, time will not suffer me to rehearse. And that we may not seem vainly to boast of our duties and officiousness towards you, and also omitting other things that are past; our King now sitting with you, can sufficiently testify it to be. For what kind of love and good will hath he omitted to shew unto your Nation? where was he not proved truly? what hath he not devised to honour you? where stood you in need, when he was not the first man to help you? Why therefore, should not we receive some favour for his deserts? I will not omit to put you in mind of the Valour of his Father Antipater, who came in with 2000 Souldiers to assist Cesar in the Egyptian Wars, wherein he so valiantly behaved himself, that neither by Sea nor Land any one in those Wars deserved more commendations than himself. I will not repeat at this time how much good he did Cesar in those Wars, and what and how great rewards he received; but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance of the Letters that the Emperor writ unto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith he obtained for Antipater the honours and privileges of the City. For this only argument had been sufficient to have declared that we did not obtain such favour without desert, and request thee now to confirm the same, of whom we might justly hope for new benefits, seeing such friendship and familiarity between thee and our King. For we have understood by our Nation that dwell in Judea, how many offerings thou didst there sacrifice unto our God, and with what vows thou honouredst him; how thou feastedst the people, and wast delighted in that mutual hospitality. All which was an argument of the friendship confirmed between so great a Roman Prince and the Nation of the Jews, even in Herod's house. By all these, we humbly request in the presence of the King, nothing but this only, that thou wouldest not permit us deceitfully to be defrauded of that, which you your selves have already granted unto the Nation of the Jews.

NOW no one of the Greeks offered to oppose himself against that which Nicholaus did speak; for this was no contention to a Judge concerning their right, but only a deprecation and supplication to avoid injury. Neither did they deny it, only thus they excused themselves, that the Jews dwelling amongst them, were troublesome unto them. But the Jews shewed themselves to be free Citizens; and to live according to their Religion and Laws of their Country, without any man's molestation or injury. Wherefore Agrippa understanding that they were wronged, answered thus: That he would not only gratify them for his friend Herod's sake, but also for that they seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore, though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would have granted them whatsoever he might, without prejudicing the people of Rome. And now, seeing they only demand of him that which already the Romans had granted unto them, he would ratify and confirm unto them the benefit which they had already received at the Romans hands, and provide that henceforth no man should molest them for living according to the institution and ordinances of their Country. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the Assembly. Then Herod arising, thanked him in all their names. And then, after mutual embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaves from Leibus.

F How Herod returned into Judea, and freed his Subjects from the payment of the fourth part of the Taxes.

THE King having a prosperous wind, within a few days after arrived at Cæsarea; Herod returned from thence he went to Jerusalem, and calling together all the people, as well as the Citizens as also the Country people there present, there he told them the cause of his journey, and how he had obtained immunities for the Jews living in Asia, that they might converse there among the Gentiles, without molestation. Then he told them what felicity they had received and enjoyed by his reign, seeing that his greatest care was to provide for his Subjects, that they might want nothing. And to gratify them the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the Taxes and Tribute they were to pay for the year past. The people greatly comforted, as well with the King's speech unto them, as with his liberality, departed joyfully, wishing the King all happiness.

IN the mean time, the discord of his house was daily encreased, by reason of Salome's inveterate hatred against Alexander and Aristobulus, she presumed so much on her success against their mother, that she hoped to leave none of her children alive to revenge her death: And she wanted no occasion, for it seems the two young Princes were not very well affected towards their Father, partly for the memory of their Mother's death, and partly also for that they desired the Kingdom. So that they upbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred against them, who daily practised, by all means they could, to overthrow them: The young men also hated them, but not with the like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race, dissembled not their anger, but freely declared their minds. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwise, enviously and craftily prepared themselves a way by calumnies; always provoking the magnanimous spirits of these young Princes, whose fierceness might soon bring them into suspicion with their Father, that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to revenge their Mother's death; yea, even with their own hands, forasmuch as they were not ashamed to be the Children of such a Mother, and would contend that she was unjustly put to death. And now all the City talked of them, every one pitying their rashness: Salome not ceasing to gather by their own speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not only take their Mother's death impatiently, but also raging like furies, did both bewail her death and their own case, who were compelled to converse with the murderers of their unfortunate Mother; and as it were, contaminate themselves with living amongst them. And the absence of the King greatly encreased their dissension; who being returned, having made a speech unto the people, he presently was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his Sister, that he was in great danger by reason of his two Sons, who did openly boast that they would be revenged of them that killed their Mother: Feigning moreover that they were encouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them to accuse their Father unto Caesar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, that he heard the same also reported unto him by others: And hereby he was put in memory of that which was past, how that for the dissension of his house he could not long enjoy his friends and dearest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, and fearing some greater calamity would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly, as abroad he was most fortunate above all hope, so at home he was most unhappy and unfortunate beyond men's opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate success abroad, did contravertail his misfortunes at home; or whether it had been more expedient for him to have had neither the one nor the other, but to have had only a common and ordinary favour at fortune's hands. Deliberating thus with himself, he thought it good to call unto Court another Son of his, whom he begot when he was a private man; and to grace him with honours, and to oppose him against the other two Brethren, to the end to bring down and repress their fierce and haughty minds; (this Son of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection he did) to make him sole heir of all, but thinking thereby to bridle Mariamne's Children, and to diminish their arrogance, by letting them see that it was not needful to keep the inheritance of so flourishing a Kingdom only for them; wherefore he introduced Antipater, one opposed against them, that thereby the other two laying their pride aside, might then themselves more tractable to their Father: And so thought by this means to provide for their safety. But it fell out far otherwise than he expected; for they esteemed this fact as an injury done unto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that having gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeavour all ways possible to be in greater account with his Father than the other two, who was already, through false accusations, alienated from them, and every day (as he also desired) ready to believe any thing that might incense him against them.

Wherefore this was all his business: Yet he had an especial care not to be thought an accuser of his Brethren, but he used others of his Complices, whom the King nothing suspected; who for the trust the King put in them, might also have better credit given unto

A unto their words. For this man had many followers and favourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his means; who with a kind of counterfeit good will, made a show of love and good will towards Herod. And being many in number, and truly one to they shed tears for very grief of the countenances and injuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned their Mother, and complained unto those whom they thought to be their friends, of their Father, as one that dealt not well with them; all which Antipater's Favourers maliciously noting, and adding thereunto something of their own invention, they did presently tell it unto Herod; and so did foment the dissension of his house. For the King being moved heretofore, and purposing to humble Mariamne's Children, did daily encrease and augment Antipater's honour; and at his B that Antipater's Mother into the Court; and many times writing secretly unto Caesar in favour of Antipater, he especially commended him in particular unto him: And being to sail to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, having governed that Province ten years, he only took with him Antipater of all his Sons; whom he also committed to Agrippa with many gifts, to go with him to Rome; and to be brought into favour with Caesar: So that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this man's beck, and the other two to be already disinherited.

C H A P. VII.

C Antipater doth so incense his Father against his Brothers Alexander and Aristobulus, that Herod bringeth them to Rome, and accuseth them before Augustus, for having attempted to poison him.

A Ntipater's Journey to Rome, with his Father's Letters of Recommendation to all his friends there, proved both very advantageous and honourable to him; yet this was a great grief to him, that he could not daily calumniate his Brothers; for he feared lest his Father's mind should change, and so would affect Mariamne's Children D most. This being his daily fear, though he were absent, he ceased not by Letters to incite his Father against them, as having care of his safety; but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practices, hoped to obtain the Kingdom; so that he encreased Herod's wrath against them, that he was become a deadly enemy unto them both. But fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to prejudice them, he determined to sail again to Rome, and there to accuse his Sons before Caesar; lest he being led away through indignation and displeasure against them, should seem to cast off all love and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Caesar there, he followed him unto Aquileia; and coming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two Sons; and accused them E before Caesar of infolency, and for having attempted to poison him; complaining their hatred to be gone so far, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoever they sought their Father's Kingdom, notwithstanding that Caesar had given him full power and liberty to leave the Kingdom to him whom he found most dutiful to him. And that they, though thereby they might not gain the Kingdom, yet they could be contented with their Father's death; and that they sought it with danger of their own lives; and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he having long endured this calamity, was now forced to open it unto Caesar, and trouble his ears with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Have I, deserved thee at their hands? what wrong have I done them? or how can they think it reason, that I, who have exposed my self to so many dangers, and undergone so difficult labours for a long time, to obtain the Kingdom, should not peaceably enjoy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of my own Dominions, and permit me the liberty to leave it unto him who shall deserve such honour in the best performance of a Son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof, seeing piety so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited hereunto; especially seeing that without violating the Law of Nature, it is not lawful to think any such thought: For no man can affect his Father's Kingdom, but he doth also desire his Father's death, seeing it is not permitted men to succeed those in the Kingdom who are yet alive. He alleged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing convenient for a kind G Father to provide for Princely Children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: That also he had provided for them Wives of a Noble Race, and had married one of them unto his Sister's Daughter, and the other unto Archelaus his Daughter King

King of Cappadocia: And which was the greatest matter of all, he had not used the authority of a Father against them after these enterprizes, but brought them unto Cæsar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his own right of a Father, who had been injured; or of a King, against whom treason had been wrought; he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Judge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right and equity; yet requested him that their offence might not be left unpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetual fear; nor suffer them to be so miserable, as never to enjoy themselves, nor desire to see the light of the Sun, after having violated the most sacred Laws of God and nature. Herod having with a vehement voice objected these accusations against his Sons before Cæsar, the two Princes were not able to abstain from tears whilst he was yet speaking; and having ended his speech, they wholly burst out into tears; nor that they were guilty of those impieties laid unto their charge, but that they were accused by their Father; against whom it was not decent to speak freely for themselves, nor expedient to refuse to defend their own cause. Wherein they remained doubtful what to do, moving the auditors to pity them by their tears and lamentations; and fearful withal, lest it should be thought that their guilty conscience did trouble them, that they were not able to speak in their own defence; seeing that indeed it was only for want of experience, by reason of their tender years. Which also Cæsar perceived, and all that were present were so moved to compassion, that neither their Father, who was their accuser, could refrain from being moved with compassion.

After which, Alexander and Aristobolus moved all that were present, even their Father and accuser to tears and compassion.

of Alexander's defence, and how the two Brethren were reconciled to their Father Herod.

Then the young Princes perceiving both their Father and Cæsar to be mollified, and they that were present partly to pity them, partly to shed tears of compassion; the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, directing his speech to his Father, began thus to clear himself of the Crimes objected against him: Father, how well and friendly minded thou art towards us, this present judgement declareth; for hadst thou determined any heavy sentence against us, thou wouldst not have brought us before him, who is the preserver of us all: For thou mightest, being a King, or for thy authority over us as a Father, have punished us for our offence according to thy power: But in that thou hast brought us to Rome, and made Cæsar our Judge, it is an argument that thou seekest to save us; for no man brings any one to the Temple, whom he purposeth to destroy; which greatly aggravateth our cause, who do curse our selves unworthy to live, rather than to incur an opinion of impiety committed against thee such a Father. How far more expedient is it to die guiltless, than to live suspected of so great an ingratitude? Wherefore if God grant us so much success in our defence, as to persuade you of the truth, we shall not rejoice so much for having escaped so great a danger, as to be found innocent by your judgment; for we do not desire to live with the suspicion of those Calumnies. It is a probable accusation to accuse our years, as having affected the Kingdom; and our unfortunate Mother's calamity maketh it seem more probable. But consider, I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoever, as against us. For any King having children by a Wife that is now dead, may if it please him, suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to prove a man impious and guilty: Wherefore produce any one that can bring sufficient proof, that may induce any moderate Judge to believe, that we ever attempted such a horrid Crime. Can any man shew that poison was prepared by us for you, or that we conspired with any, or that we corrupted any servants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters against thee? yet calumny may feign every one of these upon no occasion. It is a grievous matter, for discord to be in a Princes Court; and the hope of Dominion, which your Majesty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impel mens minds unto heinous offences. But although it be most certain that we cannot be convicted of any crime, yet how can we clear our selves from accusations forged against us, before them that will not hear us? But did we speak some insolent words; yet were they not against thee, O my father (for that had been

A been impiety) but against them who traduced us. We bewailed our mother's misfortune. It is true: But not because she is dead, but because after her death she is evil spoken of by those who ought not to do it. We affect the Kingdom of our father, he being yet alive. In it is not that purpose of our vain and frivolous, we having already been graced with Kingly honours? And suppose we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them with killing of thee, whom both earth and seas would disdain after so execrable an offence? Or could we have expected that the loyalty of thy subjects, and the law of our nation would have permitted us, having gotten the Kingdom by murdering our father; to have enjoyed the same, and entered into the holy Temple, which thou didst repair? Or suppose we despised them all; yet could any one that murdered thee escape, Cæsar being living? The Children by thee begotten are not so impious nor foolish, though more unfortunate, than thy estate requires. And seeing thou hast nothing to accuse us of, or nothing to prove any accuser's? Is it because our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to have made us more wary, than insolent and rash. We could speak more in our own defence than this, but what need is it to excuse that which was never done? Wherefore we beseech Cæsar (who is Lord of all, and now our Judge) only this, that if thou canst, O my father, put away out of thy mind all suspicion of us, to suffer us to live hereafter, how unhappy and unfortunate soever: For what is more miserable, than to be rashly accused without cause? But if thou canst not, we living, live without fear of us, let us die condemned by our own curse. For our lives are not so dear unto us that we desire to keep them to his molestation that bestowed them upon us.

Cæsar with these words, though before not greatly crediting such accusations and flanders laid against them, was now more moved to believe that they were guiltless, and the rather, that fixing his eyes upon Herod, he perceived him also to be moved, and all that were present were sorry for the young Princes. So that all who were present, youth and handiomen made all the spectators so concerned at their misfortunes, that there was nothing wherein they were not ready to assist them: And much more, after that Alexander had ingeniously refuted his father's accusations, the accused remaining still in the same posture and place, and for grief fixing their eyes upon the ground. At last some hope appeared, so that the King himself seemed to need some excuse, for having so rashly accused his sons, without any certain proof of his accusations. At last, Cæsar having a while deliberated with himself, pronounced that the Princes were innocent of the crimes laid unto their charge: Yet herein they were too blame, that they had so behaved themselves, that they gave their father occasion to suspect them. And as for Herod, he requested him to lay aside all suspicion, and to be reconciled to his Children. For it was unjustly done of him to believe such forged accusations against those whom he had begotten; that he was fully persuaded that they would prove so dutiful to him for the future, that he would not only forget that distaste that they had given him, but that he would also renew his former affection towards them; and both parties endeavouring thus to re-establish the friendship and trust that ought to be between so near Relations, their union would be greater and more sincere than ever. Cæsar Father's wonted favour: He, not expecting so long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all those that were present, both servants and others, did the like.

Then giving humble thanks unto Cæsar, they departed together, and Antipater with them, counterfeiting himself to congratulate their happiness for being reconciled unto his Father. Within a few days after, Herod gave Cæsar three hundred Talents, who was now bestowing his gifts and presents at Rome, and exercising his liberality upon the people. And Cæsar again bestowed upon him half of the revenues out of the Mines of the metal in Cyprus; and the other half unto the overseer thereof; and gracing him otherwise also, he gave him leave to chuse which of his sons he pleased for to succeed him in his Kingdom; or if he had rather, to distribute it amongst them all: which Herod presently would have done, but Cæsar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he should keep it all whole and undivided, and his sons should be subject unto him.

After this, Herod returned again into Judea, in whose absence the Trachonites, that were no small part of his Kingdom, were revolted, yet by the industry of the Captains, he left to oversee all in his absence, they were reduced again, and forced to do as they were commanded. As Herod and his sons were failing towards home, arriving at Eleyfa a City of Cilicia, which is now called Sabaste, he found Archelaus there, who was King

King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteously entertain Herod, and was very joyful that his sons and he were made friends, and that Alexander his son in Law had so well cleared himself and his brother of the crimes laid unto their charge. And so each one bestowing upon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leave one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Judea, and calling the people together into the Temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, and the courtesy of Caesar: And told them also of other affairs that he thought fit for them to know; and turning the latter end of his speech unto his Sons, and exhorting the Courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his sons should reign after him, and first of all Antipater; and after him his sons that he had by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus: In the mean time every one of them should honour him as King and Lord, notwithstanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to govern, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his Subjects and Children in their obedience; and that the soldiers also, if they only respected him, should live in all happiness and felicity without molestation. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the people; some thinking he had spoken according to equity, others thinking clean contrary: For having now as it were caused an emulation amongst his Children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

Caesarea is finished.
Quinquennial
celebration.

About this time Caesarea was finished, the tenth year after it was begun to be built, the 28. year of Herod's Reign, in the 192. Olympiad. In the dedication hereof, there was great pomp and sumptuous preparations: For all Musicians were brought thither to strive one with another, who was most excellent in their Art; and Champions that wrestled being naked and anointed with oil: There was also a great many that fought with swords, and a great number of wild Beasts; and all things else that at such times were used, and in account, either at Rome or in other Countries. These sports were also consecrated unto Caesar, and were to be renewed every fifth year. All this provision the King at his own cost and charges provided to be brought from all places whatsoever, to shew the greatness of his magnificence. Julia, Caesar's wife also bestowed much of her own to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted to five hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sports, he received all Embassadors sent unto him from other Nations, to thank him for the benefits he had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted and recreated them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sports, at night he received them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things so provided, that the last was more pleasing and grateful than the first, and caused him to be more admired. And it is reported that Caesar himself and Agrippa often did say, that Herod's magnanimity was greater than his present revenues could bear, and that he well deserved an Empire as big as all Syria and Egypt. These sports being ended, he buildeth another Town in a field called Capernaum, chusing for it a watery soil fit for plants: the City was compassed with a River; and he also planted round about it a Wood full of fine Trees. This Town he called Antipatris, after his father's name, Antipater. After which he also buildeth a Castle big as Pharo in the City, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name, Phasaelus, which also was the strongest Fort in all the City. After this, he buildeth a Town near unto the Valley of Jericho, towards the North, whereby the fields that before almost lay desert, were now tilled and inhabited by the townsmen; so that of them it was named Phasaelus-field. It were hard to relate all his liberality in particular shewed, both unto the Cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places wherever he came: For he helped many, either by building publick places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finished for want of money, by giving them money

A ney to finish them, the chiefest among all which were, that he builded at his own cost and charge the Temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gave them many talents of silver to build their ships. He also builded the greatest part of the publick houses and places in the City of Antium, which Caesar built for the Nicopolitans there inhabiting, and that with his own proper cost and charges. He also, for the Antiochians inhabiting the greatest City of Syria, builded Arches on each side of the greater street, that goeth quite thorow the midst of the City, and doth as it were part it in two; and the street itself that lay open, he paved with polished stone; which work was as great a convenience to the inhabitants, as a beauty unto their City. He also helped to maintain the sports at Olympus with yearly revenues, that for want of maintenance began to decay: So that by his means there were more solemn sacrifices, and all things more sumptuous to please them that came to behold them: For which liberality he was declared perpetual Master and Maintainer of those sports. It is admirable to see in one man such diversity of minds: For on the one side, if we consider his liberality towards all men, we must needs say, he was of a most free and bountiful nature; so contrariwise, if we consider the injuries and cruelty he shewed against his Subjects and dearest friends, we must confess him to have been a hard man, and intractable, and who passed all bounds of modesty; so that we would think him to have been of two contrary dispositions. But I am otherwise persuaded, and think that both these did proceed from one matter: For because he thirsted after glory and honour, and wholly applied himself therunto, he became liberal wheresoever he was, in hope, either to reap present thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore spending above his revenues for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable to his Subjects; for it was necessary that he, that so lavishly bestowed such huge summs of money upon others, should some where get it, though with evil means. Lastly, seeing himself for such like injuries hated of his Subjects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wills; which he could do no ways else, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abused the hatred of his people for his own commodity: For if any one of them did not tolerate that slavery wherein they lived, or did endeavour to shake off the yoke of his dominion, against such he used a prodigious cruelty; and injured them no less, than if they had been his enemies, without regarding friendship or kindred; for that he desired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may guess by the honours he did unto Caesar, Agrippa and others of their friends: For he desired to be an example to his Subjects, that as he himself honoured men better than himself, so they should all honour him likewise; thereby declaring what thing he did naturally most desire. But the Jews Religion doth not permit them license to honour Potentates, who of necessity ought to have greater care and respect of right and equity, than of such officiousness towards superiours: for it was disprofit enough unto the Jews, that they could not with Statues and Temples obtain the King's favour, and with like flatteries satisfy the fond appetites of a vain-glorious man. And this seemeth to me to be the reason that Herod was unjust, and hard towards his friends, and to those whom he made partakers of his counsels and enterprizes; and free and bountiful towards strangers.

Testimonies of the Roman Emperours Affection towards the Jews.

The Asian and Cyrenian Jews were greatly afflicted by the Citizens of those Countries, who having had the same privileges granted unto them by the ancient Kings that the Citizens had, were now greatly injured by the Grecians; as though they carried money out of the Country, and were prejudicial unto the rest of the inhabitants. And the Grecians making no end of their injuries, they were constrained by Embassadors to complain of them unto Caesar: who wrote unto every Province, that it was his pleasure, that the Jews should enjoy like privileges with the other inhabitants of the country. The copy of which writing we have set down, that it may the better appear how the Roman Emperours of ancient times were affected unto our Nation.

Cæsar Augustus Pont. Max. Trib. potestatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation of the Jews hath always been trusty unto the Romans, not only at this day, but also in all former Ages, and especially in the time of our father Cæsar the Emperour, under Hircanus their High Priest: I have ordained, that according to the common sentence of the Senate, they they shall live after their Country-Laws, under which they lived in the time of Hircanus the High Priest of God; and that their Temple shall retain the right of a Sanctuary, and that it shall be lawful for them to send votive money unto Jerusalem by certain persons; and that they shall not be compelled to appear before any Judge upon their Sabbath days, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clock upon the preparation day. And if any one be known to steal their holy books or holy money laid up in their places appointed for Religion, he shall be guilty of Sacrilege; and his goods shall be confiscated unto the Treasury of the people of Rome. I also decree, for the good will I bear unto all men, that their Memorial or request offered unto me by C. Marcus Censorinus, shall together with this my Edict be published in the famous place, which all Asia hath dedicated unto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any shall be so bold as to do contrary to our Decree, he shall be punished extraordinarily. This was engraven in a pillar in Cæsar's Temple. Cæsar wisheth health unto Norbanus Flaccus. Let it be lawful for all Jews whosoever living, to carry their sacred money to Jerusalem, according to their ancient custom, and that no man should forbid them so to do: And this did Cæsar write in favour of the Jews.

Agrippa also wrote in the Jews behalf, as followeth; Agrippa wisheth health unto the Magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus: I will that the Jews living in Asia keep their sacred money, which according to the custom of their Country, they usually send unto Jerusalem; and if any one shall steal their holy money, the same person, if he fly to a Sanctuary, shall be violently taken away from thence, as a sacrilegious person, and delivered unto the Jews to be punished. He also wrote unto Syllanus the Magistrate, that the Jews might not be constrained upon their Sabbaths to appear before a Judge: M. Agrippa wisheth health to the Cyrenian Magistrates and Senate. The Jews inhabiting among you, for whom Augustus hath already written unto Flavius the President of Lybia, and unto other Magistrates of that Province, are not to be hindered from sending their holy money to Jerusalem, as their custom is; and they have now complained unto me, that they are molested by the false accusations of some bad people, and forbidden to do it under pretence of a certain Tribute, which notwithstanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to live after their customs, and free in all such matters: And if in any of your Cities any sacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certain persons which you know to be fit for that purpose, ye make choice of them, to send it again unto the Jews. Item C. L. Norbanus Flaccus Proconsul: Health unto the Magistrates of Sardinia; Cæsar hath written unto me, commanding that no man hinder the Jews, according to their custom, to send sacred money unto Jerusalem; wherefore I also write unto you of the same, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæsar's also. Moreover Julius Antonius Proconsul, did also write to this effect: Health unto the Magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus. The Jews of Asia in the Ides of February, I sitting in the judicial seat at Ephesus, signified unto me, that Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa have permitted them to use their Country-customs; and every one according as he thinketh good, to contribute his first fruits for Religion sake, to be carried without let or hinderance unto the Temple of the most mighty God; and they desired me to ratify by my consent, that which they had already granted them by the above named Emperours. Wherefore I would have you to know, that I also, according unto Cæsar's and Agrippa's Decrees and Ordinances, do permit and grant them also to do all things they please, according to their Country-customs, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

I have thought good to add these Decrees, because I know, that these my writings will come into the Grecians hands, that I may them, that in former ages we were so esteemed of the publick Magistrates, that none were permitted to hinder us from using our Country-rites and Ceremonies, and that by their consent we worshipped God in our own Religion, which I do inculcate the oftner, that I may move strange and foreign Nations, and take away their hatred conceived against us, which is without all reasonable cause. For no Nation doth always use the same customs, but almost whole Towns among them do sometimes alter and differ from the rest; yet is justice equally to be distributed unto all men; which is most profitable, as well to the Grecians, as to the other barbarous Nations, which is greatly observed in our Laws; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations love us. Wherefore we request all men, not to despise us, for differing from them in Religion; but favour us in that we follow virtue. For this is common to all Nations, and without this, man's life must needs be unhappy. But I will now return unto my history.

CHAP. XI.

King Herod causeth David's Sepulchre to be opened to get money out of it, for which God punisheth him; strange Divisions and Troubles in his Family. The Cruelties which this Prince's mistrustfulness and Antipater's malice causeth, together with his Son Alexander's Imprisonment.

Herod spending lavishly many fums of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who reigned before him, opened David's Sepulchre, and took out of it three thousand Talents of Silver, and that there was left yet far more, able to defray all great charges whatsoever, he purposed to do the like. And at this time, in the night season, accompanied only with his most truly friends; being very wary that none of the people should know of it, he entered into the Sepulchre; but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he took from thence a great deal of Silver and Gold Plate, whereby he was enticed to make a more diligent search: And he sent two of his company on purpose into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Solomon and David were entombed, who were lost; and, as it is reported, fire came out of those places, and consumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and moved with Religion to make satisfaction, he built a most sumptuous monument of White Marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre; of which building Nicholas also, a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he speaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of David, thinking that there-in he should not keep Decorum, if he should make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accustomed order; for his Writings were to come to the ears of the King yet living, wherein he did only curry favour, mentioning only that, that might rebound unto the King's credit: So that many of his open and wicked pranks, he did either colour under some other pretence, or else all ways possible he endeavoured to hide them. For he doth, as it were, tell a tale of Herod's cruelty against Mariamne and his Sons, as though he did thereby deserve credit and praise; accusing her of Adultery, and them as Traitors unto their Father: and she doth all along, too much extolling the King's good deeds, and too diligently excusing his iniquities. But as I Joseph came of the Priest-ly Line of the Ammonians, have said, we must pardon him who did not so much write to leave a memory of the lineage of the Ammonian Kings, and execute the office of a Priest, account it a shame to lie; and do intend to relate the History of all things that were acted and yet, with their pardon and leave, I must prefer the truth to their inclinations.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herod's house began to decay, whether revenge lighting upon that part which was already scarce found, or whether by mere chance, such calamity at that time befel him, as might justly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a discord in the Court not unlike to Civil Wars, every one striving against other with hatred and forged accusations: But especially Antipater's politick practice against his Brethren was to be noted, who entangled them by other men's forged accusations; himself oftentimes seemed to take upon him their defence, that making a shew of good will unto them, he might secretly oppress them the sooner; and he did so craftily circumvent his Father, that his Father esteemed him to be his only Conservator. Wherefore the King commanded Ptolemy his chief Secretary of State, to conceal nothing of the affairs of the Kingdom from Antipater, who imparted all to his Mother, so that all things were done according as they pleased; and they made him displeased with those, against whom they knew the King's displeasure might rebound unto their profit.

But Mariamne's Children were every day more and more provoked, disdainful to give place unto their inferiours; their Wives did the like: and Alexander's Wife Glaphyra, who was the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly envy and disdain Salome, and the also her again, both for the love that she bare unto her Husband, and for that the disdainful (as women are wont) that her Daughter married unto Aristobulus, should be in equal honour with her. Herod also the King's Brother had a hand in this contention, about a private cause of suspicion and hatred. For he fell so far in love with one of his maids, that he refused the King's Daughter offered unto him, rather making choice of his maid. Herod took this in very ill part, seeing his Brother (who had received so many benefits at his hands, and was almost his fellow in his Kingdom by his means) not to the less like brotherly affection to him again as he ought. And seeing he could not dissuade him from that madness, he married his Daughter unto H Phafelus his Son: And afterwards thinking that his Brother's mind towards his maid was satisfied, he complained of his injurious dealing, in repulsing his Daughter offered unto him to Wife, he offered him another of his Daughters named Cypros. Then Pholomeus advised Phororas not to contemn his Brother's offer, and persist in such folly still; telling him it was mere madness to incur the King's displeasure on such an account. Phororas understanding this counsel profitable for him having obtained pardon at the King's hands, sent away his maid, by whom he had a Son, and promised the King to marry this his other Daughter; and appointed the thirteenth day after to celebrate his Marriage; making a solemn Oath unto the King, never after that time to use the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, I he fell so far in love with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but again accompanied with his maid.

Then Herod, not able any longer to contain himself, used many speeches, whereby he evidently shewed his mind to be alienated from his Brother. And there were many who taking this opportunity, did by forged calumnies encrease his aversion; so that now there was no day nor hour past, wherein he did not still hear some new combinations and fits amongst his dearest friends. For Salome being so offended at Marianne's Children, did not permit her Daughter married to Aristobulus, to enjoy mutual love and comfort of her Husband, enticing her to bewray her Husband's secrets; and if there happened any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) the should more aggravate them with suspicions, whereby the also learned all their secrets, K and made the young Princes hate her Husband. And she, to please her Mother, related, how that often when her Husband and Alexander were alone, that they were wont to talk of Marianne their Mother, and use reproachful words against their Father; and threatening, that if they ever did obtain the Kingdom, they would make the Sons of the King, whom he had by other Wives, Notaries and Town-Clerks, and so they might reap profit of their Learning which they had attained to: and whensoever they saw any of the Kings Wives wear any of Marianne's apparel, that then they vowed instead of that attire, to cloath them with Sack-cloth, and thrust them up where they should never see the Sun. Salome presently told all this to the Kings who, though he were L much grieved hereat, yet he chose rather to seek to amend it, than to punish them: and thus, notwithstanding he was daily more and more put out of humour, believing all reports whatsoever; yet he contented himself with chiding of them, and seemed satisfied with their excuses.

But presently the mischief was again set on foot; for Phororas the King's Brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we have said) was Glaphyra her Husband, who was Daughter to Archelaus; he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was so far in love with Glaphyra, that he could not shake off this affection. The young Prince hearing this, became jealous, and was in a great rage; and now what honour soever or gifts Herod, for the love of his Son, gave her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sense: and not able to put up such M injuries, he went to his Father, and with tears related unto him what Phororas had told him. Herod was never more surprised; and not enduring to be falsely accused of so shameful a fact, inveighing against the great malice of his friends; who for his good offices he did them, so rewarded him. He presently sending for Phororas, very sharply began to chide him, saying; O most impious that liveth amongst men! art thou become so ungrateful, either to speak or think such a matter of us? Thinkest thou that I do not perceive thy drift; that thou speakest not these words unto my Son to discredit me, but also to the intent by this means thou mightest work some treason against me, and cause me to be persecuted? For who but a good Son, as this is, would suffer his Father suspected for such a matter to live, and not to be revenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou think that thou didst put these speeches into his mind, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his Father withal? Or what was thy intent, seeing thou hatest him and his Brother; and only counterfeiting good will towards me, to bely me, and to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought? Get thee hence, thou wretched Imp, seeing thou hast thus abused thy Brother, who hath deserved so well at thy hands. Go bawst of men, I will leave thee to the gnawing worm of thy own perfidious Conscience, to be thy Executioner all thy life time: And for your greater confusion, I will content my self to confound your wickedness with my goodness, in not punishing you according to your deserts; but treating you with that mercy, of which all the world knoweth you to be unworthy. The King having uttered his anger against his Brother Phororas, O he being taken in a manifest fault, answered, that that report was first devised by Salome, of whom he heard it: Which (being then present) hearing, began to exclaim, saying, it was not her device, and that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death

Herod greatly moved against Phororas, for affirming that he was in love with Glaphyra.

A death, being one who did especially with him well; and what in her lay, seeking his safety; and that now he was in danger of more Treason, than ever before: For (said she) I was the only cause that you did put away the woman whom you so doted after, persuading you to marry the King's Daughter; and this is the cause that you hate me. With these speeches, tearing her hair and striking her breast, she made a shew of innocence; but this gesture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Phororas was left in great perplexity, not knowing what to say or do; and could find no pretence to excuse his fact: for on the one side, he confessed that he told it unto Alexander; and on the other, he could not make Herod believe that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while; at last, the King being wearied, sent away his Brother and his Sister; and greatly commending his Son's moderate mind, and that he had given him intelligence of those speeches: it being then late, he went to supper.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, because she was judged to be the Author of this ill report; and the King's Wives hated her, because they knew her to have strange qualities; and so variable, that one while she would profess friendship, and presently after hatred. Wherefore they still had something to inform Herod of against her; taking occasion happening by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obodas, a slothful man, and one given to idleness: And there was one Syllaeus that did govern all; this man was a crafty fellow, and in the prime of his youth, and very beautiful. This Syllaeus coming unto Herod about some business, and viewing Salome, who then sat at supper with him, began to set his mind upon her; and finding she was a Widow, he entred into talk with her: and the finding her Brother now not so friendly unto her as before he had been, and also entangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many Feasts being made at that time, they shewed evident signs of their mutual content, and love one to another. The King's Wives told the King of this in jest. Herod commanded Phororas, at supper time to note if he could espie any tokens of familiarity betwixt them; and Phororas told him, that by signs and mutual viewing one another, they sufficiently shewed their intents. After this, the Arabian being suspected, departed into his own Country. But two or three months after, he came again into D Judea only for this purpose, and talked with Herod touching this matter, requesting him to let Salome be his Wife; affirming that that affinity would be profitable unto him for the traffick between his people and the Arabians, whose Prince he was to be; and did already enjoy a great part of the Dominion. Herod told all this unto his Sister, and asked her if she would marry him; and she answered, she would. Then they requested that Syllaeus should become a Jew in Religion, or else it was not lawful for him to marry her. He would not condescend hereunto, affirming that he should be stoned to death by his people, if he did it; and so he departed without obtaining his purpose. From that time forth, Phororas, and especially the King's Wives, accused Salome of intemperancy; affirming that she had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his Daughter unto Salome's Son, whom Phororas refused for the love of his Maid; which Son of Salome's was her eldest that he had by Costabarus; to shew his good will towards Salome's Sister. But he was dissuaded by Phororas, who told him that the young man would never love such a Father in Law, because of his Father's death; persuading him rather to marry her to his eldest Son, who was to succeed him in his Terrarchy, which he easily persuaded the King unto, and so obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore, the match being changed, the Maid was married unto the young man, who had a hundred Talents in dowry with her, more than otherwise should have been given with her.

But all this while this diffention of Herod's house did not cease, but rather encreased; it having a shameful beginning, and coming to a sorrowful end. Herod had three Eunuchs, whom he greatly esteemed for their beauty; one of them was his Butler, the other his Cook, and the third his Chamberlain; whom also he was wont to employ in serious affairs of his Kingdom. Some one or other informed the King, that these three Eunuchs were corrupted by his Son Alexander, with great summs of money; and being upon Tortures examined if he had accompanied with him, they confessed all; yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted against his Father. But their torments being encreased by Antipater's Favourites, they were forced to confess that Antipater secretly hated his Father; and he exhorted them to forsake Herod, who was now good for nothing; who dissembled his age by painting his face, to make himself seem younger than he was; and colouring his head and beard black, which were already grown very white through age: But rather set their minds upon him, who would in despite of his Father, enjoy his Kingdom due unto him; P p 2 and

and that then he would advance them to the highest honours of the Kingdom: For he had not only title unto it by his birth, but also was now prepared likewise to invade it; and that he had many of the Captains, of the souldiers, and many of the King's friends on his side, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his sake.

Herod hearing this, fear and anger did seize on him, by reason that his Son's words seemed both insolent and threatening; and being for both these causes in a rage, he feared some greater matter to be put in practice against him, which he could not suddenly, having so little warning, avoid: And not daring to make open enquiry, he set secret spies awork, to tell him how all matters stood, himself now mistrusting all men, and accounting it his security to mistrust all, even them that deserved it not: and not moderating his suspicious mind; now whosever was the nearest to him, was the more suspected, as of most power to injure him. As for others, that were but only named by his spies, he presently esteemed it his safety to put them to death. Then they of his household, every one being careful to save himself, were one turned against another, every one esteeming it his own safety to prevent others, by accusing them unto Herod; which done, presently they incited other men's envy against him, and every one of them to devise such measure as they had measured unto others; and thus they also revenged their private Quarrels, and presently after they themselves were taken, and did by other means suffer the like, being entraped in the same trap they set for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent for having put very many to death, who were not convicted; yet for all that, he was not hereby admonished to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged so far, as to cause him to inflict the same punishment upon the accusers, which he had done upon them. The Court was in such a lamentable condition, that he commanded many of his dearest friends, and them especially, whose fidelity he had formerly experienced, not to come in his sight, nor within his Court-gates. For he did now shake off the friendship between Andromachus and Gemellus, and himself, who were his ancient friends; and oftentimes had gone Ambassadors for him, and always been of his counsel, and had been tutors unto his Children, in whom he had always reposed more trust than in any others; the one of them, for that his Son Demetrius was familiar with Alexander and Gemellus, for that he knew him to be a friend to Alexander; for he was one of them that had brought him up, and had travelled with him to Rome. And no doubt but he had censured them with some more heavy sentence, had it not been that they were so eminent persons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to have banished them, and deprived them of all their authority, to the end, that having disgraced these good men, he might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cause of all this mischief; who from the first time that he perceived his Father to be fearful and suspicious, still after that, joyed with him as Counsellor; and as it were, encreased his rage and cruelty; and then he gallantly played his part, endeavouring that whosever would resist him, should be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the rest of his friends being now banished the Court, the King presently tortured all that he imagined any way to favour Alexander, to see if they were guilty, or if they knew of any treason to be practised against him; but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidst their torments. Where he so much the more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not so much as an evil thought against him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceal the truth, than to shew themselves not trully to their masters and friends; wherefore many being taken, he caused them to be tortured to get something out of some of them. At last one amongst the rest, not able to endure those torments imposed upon him, said; that he had often heard Alexander say, when any one commended his tall stature, or skillful shooting, and the rest of his virtues; that nature had bestowed upon him these qualities to his prejudice; for his Father through envy hereat, was offended; so that when he talked with him, he did on purpose draw his body together, lest his Father should perceive the tallness of his stature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he on purpose did miss the mark he could have hit, because he knew his Father could not endure that he should be commended. And whilst these words were considered and pondered, and his torments intermitted, he accused Alexander again, to have conspired with his Brother Aristobolus, to kill his Father when he was hunting, and then to fly with speed unto Rome, and beg the Kingdom of Cesar. There were also found some of Aristobolus his Letters written unto his Brother, complaining of the injurious dealing of his Father, who had given certain Possessions to Antipater, the yearly revenues whereof amounted to two hundred Talents. Then Herod thinking himself to have probability enough, his former suspicion

Alexander being in prison, his friends were tortured

One accused Alexander to have sent letters to Rome against his Father.

Alexander confesseth the treason, and who had a hand in it.

Herod was so troubled with the contention in his house, that he was weary of his life.

A suspicion was now confirmed, and so he took Alexander and cast him in prison; and again he began to doubt, because he did scarcely believe the informations against him, neither could he devise any cause wherefore they should seek to commit Treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish; neither was it probable, that having openly killed his Father, he would afterwards have gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to find some stronger argument of his Son's impiety; and because he would not be thought rashly to have committed his Son to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all Alexander's friends to be tortured, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

Whilst thus all the Court did resound with fear, torments and contentions, a certain man accused Alexander, to have sent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cesar thither, that he might accuse his Father of certain conspiracies against Cesar, and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, than the friendship of the Romans; affirming also, that he had poyson ready prepared at Alcalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by flatterers about him, as having not done any thing rashly; and so he gave now full credit unto all: Yet the poyson was diligently sought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamity, he yet took courage; and because he would more incite his Father's displeasure against him, he did not deny it: Perhaps meaning to make his Father ashamed of himself, for giving credit so easily unto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the Court and him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ four little Pamphlets, and sent them unto his Father; telling him that it was needless to use any more torments, for indeed, treason was intended against him; and that Pheroras and his most trully friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly unto him, and as it were, forced him to lie with her: And that all of them aimed at this mark, to have him made away, that so they might enjoy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolemy, and Sapinimus of this conspiracy, who were more faithful unto their King, than all others: So that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hadly pursued every one, that they had not time to speak in their own defence: Neither were their punishment deferred till their cause was tried, and the truth known; so that some were bound and imprisoned, others presently put to death, others laughed in their sleeves to see that day, yet discontented for that any delay was used for their punishment: So that the King's Court was now greatly defaced with sorrow and heaviness, wherewith the usual felicity thereof was destroyed, Herod himself amidst these calamities, could not but be weary of his life; who, nor daring to trust himself in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourly fear of some untimely death, that would befall: And many times persuaded himself, that he did see his Sons before him with a drawn sword ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, life, E so that herewith he almost ran mad.

CHAP. XII.

How Archelaus King of Cappadocia, reconciled Alexander to his Father.

Whilst Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappadocia careful of his Daughter, and the young Prince his Son in Law, and pitying his friend Herod in such calamities; he thought it his duty to make a journey unto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported unto him before his coming, he thought it an unfit way to argue him of too much credulity and rashness; perceiving that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himself. Wherefore Archelaus devised another way to appease these troubles; and he counterfeited indignation against the young Prince, approving all the King's actions; affirming that he would break the band of Wedlock between his Daughter and Alexander; and that if he knew of the Conspiracy, and did not inform the King thereof, himself would punish her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, began to remit his anger: And now with just consideration weighing what he had done, by little and little, he began to have a Fatherly affection, and to be hereby moved to compassion; yet so oft as any one sought to excuse the young Prince, he grew very angry thereat: but when Archelaus also began to accuse him, then Herod's heart relented, and he with tears besought befoUGHT Archeleus not to yield too much to anger, nor for the young Princes offence, break off the marriage. Then Archeleus perceiving him to relent, began to turn the matter against Herod's friends, as the causes of all this mischief, who had corrupted Alexander, who of himself was void of malice; and especially he aggravated the matter against Phororas the King's Brother. Phororas having now incurred the King's displeasure, perceived that none could so soon reconcile him unto the King, as Archeleus; wherefore, clothed in black, and making other signs, as though he despaired of his life, he went unto him, who did not deny to help him what he could; yet he told him that it was no easie matter for him to pacifie the King, so highly offended, perwading him rather himself to give unto the King his Brother, and crave pardon of him; confessing himself to have been cause of all this mischief; by which confession of his, the King's wrath would be greatly appeased, and so he also should have better occasion to entreat for him. Phororas followed his counsel, which fell out happily for them both; for the Prince, contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles; And Archeleus made Phororas and Herod friends; and he himself having obtained great friendship of the King in his adivities, he returned joyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of as Herod's chiefest friend. They also agreed amongst themselves, that Herod should go to Rome, because he had already written unto Cesar, concerning this matter: And they both went together to Antiochia, and there Herod reconciled Titus the Prefident of Syria unto Archeleus; and so he returned unto Judea.

CHAPTER. XIII.

Whilest Herod being gone to Rome, was absent from his Kingdom, the Arabian Wars began, on this occasion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whose Countrey Cesar taking from Zenodorus, gave it unto Herod; being forbidden and hindered from stealing, were now forced to frame themselves to live like husband-men, more civilly than before: But this kind of life pleased them not, neither did their Countrey yield fruits worth their labours; yet at first Herod compelling them thereunto, they abstained from injuring the inhabitants bordering upon them, which did greatly redound unto Herod's credit, by whose fidelity they were brought unto it. But when Herod was gone into Italy to accuse Alexander, and to commend Antipater unto Cesar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, revolted, and turned to their accustomed robberies: Yet they were at that time again subdued in the King's absence by the Captains that he left at home; and forty of the chieftest of the Thieves amongst them being taken, the rest terrified by their example, left their own Countrey, and fled into Arabia, where Syllenus received them, in revenge that he could not obtain Salome for his Wife; and receiving of him a strong hold to dwell in, they did not only make incursions, and rob and spoil the borders of Judea, but also of Calogria, and drove away the preys they got into the place allotted them, Syllenus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endangered by these Thieves; and seeing he could not subdue them, by reason the Arabians denied protect them; not enduring that injury, and entering into Trachon, he killed all their Families: Whereby they were so much the more enraged against his Countrey; for they had a Law amongst them, whereby they were commanded to revenge the death of their Families; and so contemning all dangers, they came and wasted all Herod's Countrey with continual incursions. Then the King complained hereof unto Saturninus and Volumnius then Presidents, sent thither by Cesar; requesting that he might have the Thieves to punish them. They hearing this news, with as much speed as they might, gathered their Forces together; and making themselves stronger than they were before, with sudden incursions wasted all where they came, destroying both the fields and villages, and killing all they could find; so that now this resembled a War, rather than a Robbery; for they were a thousand in number. Wherefore Herod required these Thieves and Robbers to be delivered unto him, and required the debt that Obodas owed him; for Herod had lent Obodas threefold Talents, and sent them unto him by Syllenus; and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllenus, who had taken all the rule from Obodas, and himself governed all, denied that those Thieves were in Arabia, and deferred the payment of the money: So that this matter was debated before Saturninus and

A and Volumnius then Presidents of Syria. At last it was by them determined, that within thirty days, the money due to Herod should be paid, and the ruins of both Countreys delivered each to other. But there was no one Arabian that either had fled unto Herod for any offence committed, nor for any other cause; but the Arabians were convicted to receive the Thieves that fled from Herod.

CHAPTER XVI.

B Syllaus will perform nothing of what Augustus's Lieutenant's had ordained, but goeth to Rome to him. Herod entrencheth into Arabia with an Army, and taketh the Castle where the Trachonites were retired.

When the day was come that was appointed, Syllens not minded to stand unto the agreement made, went in the mean time to Rome: But Herod exacted his money, and the Thieves to be reformed unto him. Saturninus and Volumnius permitting him with force of Arms to persecute those obstinate people: So he levied an Army, went into Arabia; in three days space going as far as ordinarily men use to march in seven; and coming unto the Castle wherein the Thieves kept at the first on-set he took it and destroyed it, being called Repta and did no other harm unto the inhabitants. And a Captain of the Arabians, named Nacbur, came to succour the Thieves, and so fought with Herod's Army; in which Battel a few of Herod's men were slain; but of the Arabians were killed five and twenty, with their General, and the rest were put to flight. Being thus revenged upon the Thieves, he led three thousand Idumeans into Trachon, to keep the inhabitants from robbing; and sent Letters unto the Roman Governours who were in Phœnicia, that he had only used the authority which they gave him against the rebellious Arabians that refused him, and nothing else; which afterward also, they making enquiry, they found true.

С Н А Р. XV.

Syllæus doth so incense Augustus against Herod, that he refuseth to give Audience to his Ambassadors; neither will he admit those whom Aretas King of the Arabians sent. This Aretas succeeded Obodas, whom Syllæus caused to be poisoned, that he might get the Kingdom. Herod sends the third Embassy to Augustus.

E The Arabians sent messengers with all speed to Syllens at Rome, and informed him otherwise, aggravating every thing according to their falshon. Syllens being a little before infatuated into Cesar's acquaintance, by chance was then also about the Palace; and hearing these news, he presently changed his apparel; and clothed himself in black, he went in this manner unto Cesar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with Wars, and that the whole Kingdom was wasted by Herod, who had entered into the Countreay with an Army, and with tears complained that 2500 of the Arabian Nobility were killed, and amongst them his friend and kinsman Nacebus; and great riches were taken away, which were laid up at Kepta; and that all this was done in contempt of Obedat, who had no Army ready, nor a fit Captain for his Forces, he being not there. Syllens having thus spoken; adding moreover, that he would not have come to Rome, but that he was perfwaded that Cesar would have had a care of the common peace and tranquility of his Subjects; and that had he been at home, Herod to his cost should have violated that Peace. Cesar heard he greatly moved, and enquired of some of Herod's friends who were then present, and Army out of the limits of his own Kingdom. Which they not denying, and Cesar not vouchsafing to hear the cause why, his displeasure against Herod was greatly encreased, so that he writ threatening Letters unto him; telling him, that hitherto he had used him as a Friend, but hereafter he would use him as a Subject; which also Syllens signified unto the Arabians. By which Letters they were made proud, and would neither render unto him the Thieves that were escaped, nor restore the money he lent them; King, nor pay him rent for the pasture-ground that they hired of him. More- over, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled against the Garrison of the Idumeans and thereat and joyning with the Arabian Thieves, who wasted their Countrey; not so much respecting their own gain, as their revenge and particular profit; they did many mischiefs, and exercised great cruelty against them. Herod did put up all injuries, and durst not once mutter, Cæsar being offended with him; for the which cause he was not so courageous nor valiant as he was before. For first of all, Cæsar would not admit his Ambassadors, whom he sent to plead his cause before Cæsar; and Herod again sending other Ambassadors, Cæsar sent them back again, their business undone.

Wherefore Herod being in this perplexity, greatly feared Syllæus; who being now at Rome, did easily persuade Cæsar any thing; for Cæsar was very credulous; and Syllæus aimed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Encas succeeded him in the Kingdom of Arabia, changing his name, called himself Aretas; whom Syllæus, by forged calumniation, did seek to depose from the Crown, and usurp the Kingdom unto himself, giving great sums of money unto the Courtiers, and promising great sums unto Cæsar; whom he now perceived to be angry against Aretas, for that, without his consent, he presumed to take upon him the government of the Kingdom. But at last he also sent letters and gifts unto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a Crown of Gold worth many Talents; and in those letters he accused Syllæus, who as an impious and disloyal servant, had poisoned his King Obodas; in whose life-time he had also invaded the Government of the Kingdom, committing Adultery with the Arabians Wives, getting together other men's money, thereby to obtain the Kingdom. Cæsar would not permit these Ambassadors to have Audience; but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affairs of Judæa and Arabia every day became worse and worse, every one seeking to trouble the estate of both Kingdoms, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet established in his Kingdom, and therefore could not control his Subjects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himself, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put up all injuries that were done unto him: And finding no end of his miseries, he at length determined to send again to Rome Ambassadors, to see if, by the help of friends, Cæsar might be persuaded to think better of him; and so committed that Embassy unto Nicholaus of Damascus, and sent him to Rome.

C H A P. XVI.

Herod more incensed than ever against his Sons Alexander and Aristobulus by several Aspersions, causeth them to be imprisoned. Augustus is made sensible of Syllæus's wickedness, condemns him to die, confirms Aretas in the Kingdom of Arabia; he is sorry for having had so ill an opinion of Herod, adviseth him to call a great Assembly at Beirite, where his Sons, after new complaints given in against them, are to be judged.

IN the mean time the diffension of Herod's house was much increased, by the augmentation of hatred against his Sons Alexander and Aristobulus; and although at all other times his Court was never void of suspicion, which is a pernicious evil to Kings and Princes; yet, at that time especially, this mischief was in his principal vigour and force. For Eurycles a Lacedæmonian, and a Noble man of his Countrey; but having a turbulent wit, given over to flattery and pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both voices, coming unto Herod and giving him gifts, and receiving greater gifts at his hands, was by him courteously entertained; and familiarly conversing with him, brought it to pass, that he was esteemed amongst his especial friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipater's house, being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: For he said that Archelaus King of Cappadocia and himself, was great friends, and therefore he counterfeited himself to reverence Glaphyra very much; and all men judging him indifferent in all parties, he diligently noted whatsoever said, and every word that was spoken, seeking, by all means he could, matter to gratify others carrying of tales; and with such flattering fair speeches he insinuated himself into every man's friendship, that he seemed Alexander's only trusty friend; and that all his endeavours with others, were only for to be more serviceable to Alexander in his concerns. And by this his deceit, he so insinuated himself into Alexander's favour, that the young Prince thought him to be his only friend, unto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander shewed him how much he was grieved for not being in his Father's favour; and related his Mother's misfortune, and that

Antipater had now gotten all authority and dignity from him and his Brother, and was the only man that could do all; and that these injuries were no longer tolerable, their Father being now incited against them, that now he would never admit them into his Councils nor Banquets. And he committed his griefs (as he then thought) into his friends bosom. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speak of it for the greatness of the present danger; desiring him to beware of Alexander, who did not stick openly to shew what mind he bare; but did, as it were, manifestly shew that he desired to make away his Father. Which done, he received of Antipater most rich gifts, and pledges of his good will towards him; at length he persuaded him to relate his news himself unto Herod. The King gave an attentive ear, whilst he related Alexander's malice; and was so moved with the circumstances, that he conceived a deadly hatred against his Son, which also without further delay, he did make manifest; for he rewarded Eurycles for his pains with fifty Talents. Which he having received, went unto Archelaus; and speaking well of Alexander, acquainted him how instrumental he had been in reconciling him unto his Father: and receiving of him also a sum of money, he departed before his malice was discovered, and returned into his Countrey; and using the like shifts there also, he was at last by his Countrey-men banished from Lacedæmonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before, to hear only that which was told him of Alexander and Aristobulus, did himself enquire though no man accused them, and permitting all men to speak what they pleased against them. And amongst the rest, Evaratus of Coos had conspired with Alexander; and he seemed now to hear no talk more willingly than this, and such like. But then greater misfortunes than all the rest befell the two Princes, false accusations nem of some crime or other unto the King, pretending the care they had of his safety. Herod had two Champions, Juchandus and Tyrannus; both acceptable unto his Guards; and for that they were very active, he bestowed many gifts and much money upon them. Whereat the King presently conceiving suspicion, began to torture them; and after many torments, they confessed that Alexander had hired them that he falling off his horse, fell upon his own Lance, and so was killed; which once before had almost happened unto him. They also declared unto him, that certain gold was hidden and buried in the stable: And they also accused Herod's chief Huntsman, that at Alexander's command he had given Alexander's Servants the King's Lances and his Armour. After them the Governour of the Castle of Alexandrium was taken, and examined upon tortures; and it was objected against him, that he promised to receive them into the Castle, and deliver unto them the King's Treasure there. But he denied it, his own Son affirmed all to be true, and brought forth Letters to testify the same, resembling Alexander's hand written to this effect: So soon as by God's assistance we have done that which we intend to do, we will presently come unto you; be careful therefore, that according to your promise you do receive us into your Castle. Herod having had a view of these Letters, did now without any doubt believe, that indeed Alexander was Antipater's device. For Diophantus the Secretary had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter afterward being taken with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the King produced them that had been tortured at Jericho before the people to accuse his Sons, where they were flamed to death; and the people hereat moved, would also have killed Alexander and Aristobulus with the same death. But Herod, by the means of Pholomeus and Phororas, did restrain them; and commanded the young Princes to be cast into prison, and there to be kept so close that no man was admitted unto them; but many spies were set; who should narrowly mark all their actions and words; and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other men's opinions, and also by their own. One of them, to wit, Aristobulus, for grief inviting his Aunt, and his Mother in Law, to compassionate his present calamity, and to hate him that was the Author hereof; affirmed that the also was in great danger, being accused in hope to marry with Syllæus, to have signified unto him by Letters all that past in Herod's Court. Which words the woman presently came and told to her Brother Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound, and kept in several places.

places, one from another, and each of them to write what they had plotted against his Father: And being thus commanded, they wrote that they neither prepared Treason, nor yet thought of any Treason against him; only they purposed to fly, because they perceived that they could no longer live here, because they were so suspected, and in continual care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Ambassador from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greatest Lords of the Country: And Herod desiring to shew his Son's malice, he sent for Alexander out of prison; commanding him to relate how, and after what order, or whether they meant to fly: he answered, unto Archelaus, who had also promised them to send them that; who, by his own forged rumours spread amongst the people, did cause them to hasten their deaths. Which being said, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led unto Glaphyra, that the might be asked whether he were any way privy to the conspiracy against Herod: And coming unto her, the woman seeing her husband bound, presently tore her hair; and being amazed, with great compassion, cried out. The young man's cheeks were also bedewed with tears; so that a long time after, those that were present amazed, and moved to compassion at this miserable sight, could neither speak nor do the King's command. At last Ptolemy, to whose charge Alexander was committed, desiring him to speak, whether his Wife was privy to his intent; he answered, How could it be otherwise, who is dearer unto me than mine own life, being Mother of my Children? then the answered, crying out aloud, that she was privy to nothing that has any harm; yet (quoth she) if it will avail you any thing, or help to save your life, I am ready to tell you whatsoever, seeing I must die, and will deny nothing you would have me to say. Alexander answered, Neither did I purpose any impiety against my Father, as some suppose, who ought not to think so; neither dost thou know of any one: this thou knowest, that thou and I purposed to fly unto Archelaus thy Father, and that he promised to convey us to Rome; which the also affirmed.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was disaffected towards him, delivered Letters unto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to pass by Eusebia a Town of Cilicia, and deliver certain Letters unto Archelaus himself to the same effect; and that from thence they should go to Rome; and if so be when they came there, they found that Cesar had been reconciled to him by Nicholaus his means, that then they should also deliver certain Letters unto him; declaring all that was past between him and his Sons, and the proofs alledged to convince the Princes. Archelaus writ again unto Herod, that indeed he would have entertained the young men, for fear that any greater mischance should befall them or their Father, by reason of the suspicion against them; yet was he not minded to send them to Cesar, nor to have confirmed them in any malicious course. The Messengers coming to Rome, found Cesar reconciled to Herod, and delivered the Letters unto him. For Nicholaus his Embassy was to this effect: So soon as he came unto Rome, and had entered the Palace, beside the charge he had given him, he did also undertake to accuse Syllus. For he perceived the Arabians at variance among themselves; and that some of them had declared all Syllus his bad practices, and that by his means many of Obodas's Kinsmen were murdered, as his adversaries manifestly proved by his Letters which they intercepted.

Now Nicholaus desirous to reconcile Herod unto Cesar, omitted not this occasion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the King's defence, he should then find a hard and heavy Judge against him; but if he began to accuse Syllus, he should find also a fit occasion to plead his King's cause. Wherefore Nicholaus taking upon him to prove the accusation against him at the day appointed, he converted with King Aretas's Ambassadors, accused Syllus as a murderer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money, to trouble the peace of the Commonwealth; and that he had corrupted many women and honest Matrons, both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a most grievous crime, to wit, that he, by his lies and false reports, had deceived Cesar; whom in all things he had misinformed, concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cesar commanded him to omit the rest; and only to relate the matter concerning Herod; whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an Army, and did kill two thousand and five hundred men, and carry away Captives, and rob and spoil the Country? Nicholaus answered, that to these demands himself was able to answer, that Herod did none of these; and that he did not deserve any displeasure. Cesar, contrary

A to his expectation, hearing this, began to give diligent ear to what Nicholaus said: And hereupon Nicholaus related unto Cesar, how Herod had lent five hundred Talents, and that he had a Writing in pawn, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repaid him again, to prey upon all the whole Country, and satisfy himself; and that this was no hostile invasion, but according to Law and equity, a requiring of his right and debt due unto him. And that this was not rashly done, though by the writing he was so permitted to do; but by the consent of Saturninus, one of the Arabians, and Volumnius Presidents of Syria; in whose presence Syllus swore by Cesar's good fortune at Berytus, that within thirty days after, both the debt, and also certain gifts bestowed from the King, should be restored unto him; and that Syllus performed none of these: And so Herod went again unto the Presidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his money; and that so by their permission he went into Arabia. And this is the War that his adversaries have so tragically exaggerated; and yet how can it be called a War? seeing that it was done by the consent of the Presidents, and that by Covenant after Perjury, wherewith both God's and also Cesar's name was violated. It now remaineth that I speak something concerning the Captives. There were forty Thieves of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from Herod for fear of punishment, and fled into Arabia, whom Syllus protected and succoured to the injury of all men, and gave them ground to inhabit, and was partaker of their preys; notwithstanding that by his foreaid oath, he was bound to restore them, together with the borrowed money; neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and carried away Captive, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the Captives being thus refuted, hear, O Sovereign Cesar, the lying invention, which to provoke thee to wrath, himself devised. For I am well able to affirm this, that when the Arabian Army assaulted us, and one or two of our men were killed, then at last Herod forced to make resistance, he killed Nacchus, and with him five and twenty, and no more; for every one of which Syllus falsely told Cesar a hundred, and so told him that two thousand and five hundred were killed. Cesar hereat greatly moved, with an angry countenance looking upon Syllus, he asked him how many Arabians were killed in the fight? He amazed, and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cesar commanded the Writings to be read, containing the conditions between them; and the Writings of the Presidents, and the Letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the Robberies. And so the matter was brought to pass, that Cesar was reconciled unto Herod, and condemned Syllus to die; and repenting himself to have written so threatening Letters to Herod, he objected that also unto Syllus; affirming, that by his false informations he had caused him to pass the limits of friendship, in using his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllus into his Country, that after he had satisfied his creditors, he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas for that without his authority, he had usurped the Crown and Kingdom: and he was minded also to bestow Arabia upon Herod; but the Letters which Herod sent him, changed his mind. For Olympus and Volumnius, as soon as they understood that Cesar's wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they delivered unto him the Letters as they were commanded; wherein were contained the Arguments whereby his Sons were convicted of Treason against him. Which Cesar having read, he thought it not convenient to trouble the old man (unfortunate with his Sons) with another Kingdom; and so he admitted Aretas his Ambassadors; and chiding them that their King had rashly usurped the Kingdom without his Authority and knowledge, not expecting his pleasure: he received their gifts, and confirmed him in the Kingdom by his Authority. This done, he being now reconciled unto Herod, he writ unto him, that he was sorry for him, that he had such Children; and that he should, if they had attempted any Treason against him, punish them as men that desired to murder their Father, for he gave him free and full Authority; but if they only attempted to fly, he should also be satisfied with a less punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a Council at Berytus, together with the Roman Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the Nobility thereabout, according as they should advise him, so to do. And this was the effect of Cesar's Letter.

Herod receiving this Letter, rejoiced above measure; both for that he had again obtained Cesar's favour, and for that Cesar had given him full Authority to do what he pleased unto his Sons. And yet I know not how it came to pass, that he who in his prosperity was a hard Father, yet did shew himself not rash in putting his Sons to death; and though his affairs were in a very flourishing condition, yet he was very moderate in his revenge. Wherefore by Letters he called together all those whom Cesar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would have withstood his purpose: And when they were all come together, as well the Presidents as the rest, who were called out of divers Cities, he would not bring his Sons into the Council, but kept them in a Village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not far distant from the City, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himself alone entering into the Council, before an hundred and fifty men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his Sons before them; and used a speech not only pitiful for his own calamities, but also little becoming a Father. For he was very vehement in inveighing against their offence; neither did he sufficiently express his mind, shewing many signs of fury and anger; neither did he deliver in writing any proofs of the Accusations unto the Judges; but undecently himself alleged there, the Father against the Son; himself also reading before them certain Letters written by them, wherein was contained no impiety nor Treason, but only a consultation to flee away, and certain hard speeches whereby they shewed themselves offended; which when he came unto, he exclaimed, as though hereby they confessed their treacherous practices; greatly exaggerating the matter, and protesting that he had rather die than hear such speeches. Lastly, affirming that both Nature and Cesar gave him authority against them; and his Country Laws so commanded, that if any one being accused, his Father or Mother should lay their hands upon his head, and the standers by must presently stone him to death; which though he might easily do in his own Country and Kingdom, yet he thought good also to expect their censures. Yet he came unto them, not for that they were to judge his Sons, who were taken in a manifest crime; but that by this occasion they might add their suffrages to the just indignation of a Father offended, and that they might leave an example unto all posterity, that such Treasons ought not to be left unpunished. The King having thus spoken, and not permitting the young Princes to be brought in to answer; all seeing what the King intended, and that there was no hope to reconcile them unto their Father, or save their lives; they all confirmed his authority. And first of all Saturninus one that had been Consul, and had been adorned with many honours, pronounced an indifferent sentence, limited with circumstances, to wit, that he condemned Herod's Sons, yet not to die; for (quoth he) my self have Sons, and I would not add this calamity to Herod's misfortune past. After him also his three Sons, who were their Father's Legates, pronounced the same sentence. But Volcaninus pronounced that they had deserved death, who were so impious towards their Father; whose sentence after him the most part followed; so that it seemed that they were now ordained to be put to death. Presently Herod carried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus who was there arrived, returning from Rome; unto whom the King first relating what was done at Berytum, he asked him what his friends at Rome thought of his Sons? He answered that they judged the Princes intents impious, and that they ought to be bound and imprisoned; and then after due consideration, if it were thought expedient, to be put to death; left the King might be thought to have given more way to his anger than to reason; yet, if it might please him, they thought it best to acquit them, lest otherwise he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of most of his friends at Rome. Then the King a long time pondered these words, and made no reply, but commanded him to go along in his company. At his arrival in Cesarea all men were doubtful what would become of his Sons, expecting an end of that Tragedy; for they greatly feared that by reason of the old discord, he would cut them off; and notwithstanding they were sorry for them, yet it was dangerous either to speak rashly, or to hear any thing spoken freely concerning them; but in their hearts compassionating them, they concealed their griefs. Only one amongst all the rest, an old Soldier named Tyro, others dissembling their grief, spake

A spake freely what he thought: This Tyro had a Son of Alexander's age, and beloved of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidst the multitudes exclaimed, that truth and equity were banished out of the world, and that in their stead, malice and untruth reigned: Whereby there was such a milt and a fog cauled over the whole world, that no man could see his own errors. This his free Speech, though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moved; for that he had some reason to shew his fortitude in so dangerous a time, and every one was willing to hear his Speech: and though themselves for fear were silent, yet did they not reprehend him for speaking freely. For the expectation of the event of so great mischief was able to have wrested from every one of them words of commiseration. B Tyro with great audacity also came unto the King, and begged of him that he might talk with him alone: which the King granting, he used these words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my King, suppress this my grief, which causeth me so boldly to speak, though with my own peril; yet if it please thee, my King, that which I intend to speak shall be for thine advantage. Where now, my Lord, are thy wits? Where is thy courageous mind ever hitherto able to match all difficult businesses whatever? How happeneth it that thou hast so few Friends and Kindred? For I account not them Kingmen or Friends that permit such wickedness and hatred in thy Court, which was most happy and fortunate. And what art thou unto thy self? Wilt thou not look and see what is done? Wilt thou put to death the two young Princes born unto thee by the Queen thy Wife, who abound in all virtues, and commit thy self now in thy old age unto one only Son, who nourisheth impious Hopes and Designs; and to thy Kindred, who by thy own censure have often deserved death? Dost thou not perceive that the people keeping themselves quiet and still; do both condemn the error of thy Friends, and also pity and compassionate the two Princes? Moreover, all thy Soldiers and the Captains themselves have compassion on them, and curse the Authors of this unfortunate calamity. The King at first took these words of Tyro in good part as being admonished of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his own calamity. But Tyro immediately and Soldier-like urging the King, and for his own simplicity not able to discern what fitted that time, the King at last thought this, rather a turbulent upbraiding him, than a friendly admonition: and asking who those Captains and Soldiers were, he commanded them all, and Tyro also, to be bound and kept in prison. Then one Triptho the Kings Barber, taking hereat occasion, told the King, that Tyro had often solicited him, as he shav'd the King to cut his throat with his razor, promising him for recompence great rewards, and that he should be one of Alexander's chief Friends. Having spoken these words, the King commanded him to be apprehended, and the Barber, and Tyro and his Son to be tortured. Tyro his Son seeing his Father in most miserable torments, and that he still persisted in them (and by the Kings displeasure, conjecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his Father, that he would confess all the truth, conditionally that his Father and himself might be no more tormented: and having his request granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand should have killed the King: for he could get opportunity to come unto the King when no man else was with him, and so he would kill him, and for Alexander's sake endure any torments whatsoever. This spoken, he delivered himself and his Father from further tortures: but it is uncertain whether the tale he told was true, or whether he devised it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aside (if before he were in any) thought what death his Sons should die, and leaving no place to repentance and mercy, he hastened to execute his purpose: and producing 300 Captains, and Tyro and his Son, and the Barber his accuser; he accused them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they killed them every one. And Alexander and Aristobolus was carried unto Schafse, and there by their Fathers command were strangled: and their bodies carried by night into the Castle Alexandrium, where there Grand-father by their Mothers side, and many of their Progenitors lay buried. But perhaps some will not marvel, that a hatred so long breeding should in the end so prevail, that it overcame natural affections. But one may justly doubt whether the fault were in the young Princes, who exasperated by a hard Father so long time, fell into such a hatred of him, or whether it is to be imputed unto his unkindness and immoderate desire of Honour and Rule, who could not abide any to be his equal, but rather chusing to do all at his own pleasure: Or rather unto Fortune, whose power the wisest living is not able to resist. Wherefore I am perswaded, Fortune hath predestinated all humane actions, so that they must have a necessary event. And this inevitable force we call Fate, or fatal Destiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it sufficeth briefly to have touched this high matter, which of it self is very difficult, which attributeth something unto our actions, and examineth the causes of the variety of our actions, which speculation is already comprised in the two Volumes of our Law. Furthermore, touching the Princes fault, we may accuse their youthful arrogance, and their pride, who did give too great ear to their Father's accusers; and for that they were unjust searchers into his life and actions; and that they maliciously suspected him, and could not rule their tongues; but hereby gave double occasion to their Adversaries, and matters unto those tale-bearers that fought to get the King's favour. But their Father's shameful fault cannot be excused, who suffered himself so to be over-ruled with passion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proof or argument of the crimes laid unto their charge; yea, two young Princes of excellent feature of body, not only beloved of their own Nation, but also of strangers; they were dextrous in all Exercises, and commendable in Military Affairs, and eloquent in Civil Discourses. For, in all these things they were excellent, and especially Alexander the eldest of them. It had been enough for him, suppose he had condemned them, either to have kept them in perpetual Prison, or banished them into some far Countrey; seeing that he was assured of the Roman Power, under whose protection he neither needed to have feared invasion, nor secret Treason against him. For to put them to death, only to satisfy his own furious will, what else doth it argue, but only an impious liberty casting off all Fatherly humanity and kindness? especially seeing that he was aged, whose years could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excused by the delay he used; nay, it had been a less offence, if amazed with some sudden news, he had been incited to so heinous an offence: But after so long deliberation, at last to effect such a matter, betokens a bloody mind, and hardened in wickedness, as he shewed afterwards, not sparing the rest, whom before he held most dear: Who, though they were left to be pitied, in that they justly suffered; yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he obtained not from their deaths also: But we will speak of this hereafter.

Herod & Rufinus, chap. 1. Antipater, after he had made away his Brothers, grew hateful both to the Soldiers and the people. Antipater governed the Kingdom with his Father.

After that Antipater had made away his Brothers, through the extreme impiety and unbridled fury, wherewith Herod their Father was incensed against them; yet he did not immediately obtain that which undoubtedly he hoped for. For being freed of K that fear he conceived, left his Brothers should be partakers with him in the Kingdom, he found it a difficult and hainous matter to find the means how to obtain it; so strange and hainous a hatred had all the Nation conceived against him. On the other side, in shewing himself proud and lofty, he more and more increased that hatred which the Soldiers had conceived against him, in whom the security of the Kingdom consisted, if it should fortune to fall out that the people should attempt any alteration. All which mischiefs were procured by his own sins, and the unnatural murder of his Brothers. Nevertheless, he governed the Kingdom with his Father, living only in less Authority than himself: Herod also reposed more confidence in L him, even in those things, for which he was worthy to lose his head. For the King conceived that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accused his Brethren, to continue his Father in security, and not for any hatred he bore unto them more than to his Father; though indeed he hated them for his Father's sake, being transported with fury. But all these were but as so many stratagems to insinuate himself into Herod's Counsels and Favours; and these did he craftily make use of, to cut off the occasion left any should prevent or accuse him of that which he pretended to do, and that Herod might be deprived of all relief, if so be that Antipater should bend his Forces against him. For the Treason he plotted against his Brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare unto his Father: But at that time he was the more egged on to prosecute his intended purposes without any delay. For if Herod should happen to die, it was most sure that the Kingdom should be his; and should his life continue any longer time, and the practice Antipater went about should be discovered, seeing himself environed with these dangers, he should be enforced to make his Father his Enemy. For which cause he was very liberal to all those that were about his Father; and through the great gifts he bestowed upon them, he extinguished that hatred which all of them bare unto him: and above all things he continued himself in credit with those friends which Herod had at Rome, by sending them divers Presents; and namely Saturninus, who was Governour of Syria. He hoped also, by bribes and rewards, to draw his Father's Brother into his faction, and to corrupt the King's Sister also, who was married to one of the King's most esteemed friends in Court. He was a subtil and politick man in entertaining those men with colourable shew of friendship with whom he conversed, and to draw himself into credit with them: he was sufficiently dexterous to dissemble his malice and discontents, which he had conceived against any man. Notwithstanding all this, he could not deceive Salome his Aunt, who of long time before had founded his inclinations, and who was not so simple as to suffer her self to be deceived; but had already, by all cunning means that might be, prevented his malice, although he had a Daughter married unto his Uncle by the Mother's side. This Daughter was first of all wedded to Aristobolus, and afterwards by Antipater's means to his Uncle: For Calceas her Husband's Son had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter so much, but that his malice was discovered; neither could that former confanguinity extinguish the deserved hatred conceived against him. Herod constrained Salome (who

A (who through amorous passion had thought to have married her self to Syllenus the Arabian) to marry, with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perswasion of Julia Cæsar's wife, who advised Salome not to refuse that Marriage, lest he should prove her mortal enemy; for Herod had made an Oath, that if Salome condescended not to marry Alexas, he would never make account of her: For which cause the followed Julia's advice, who was Cæsar's wife, and counsell'd her also to her profit and preferment. At the same time Herod sent his Daughter Glaphyra to King Archelaus, who had been married to Alexander, presenting him a Dowry out of his own Treasury, lest there should any difference arise between them, and he himself most carefully brought up B his Sons Children. For Alexander had two Sons by Glaphyra, and Aristobolus begat on Bernice, Salomes Daughter, three Sons and two Daughters. Sometimes he would recommend them unto his Friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his Sons, would beseech God that no such ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might increase in virtue, and acknowledge their education and bringing up, with all dutiful respects unto their Parents. He provided them also each of them with a wife, when they were ready for Marriage; Namely, the Daughter of Pheroras for the eldest of Alexander's Sons; and the Daughter of Antipater for Aristobolus's eldest Son: and his own Son, whom he had begotten of the Daughter of the High Priest. For it is time C lawful in our Countrey, and according to our custom, to have divers Wives at one time. The King procured these Marriages through the compassion he had of those Orphans, thinking by this mutual Alliance to cause Antipater to be their Friend. But Antipater conceived no less hatred toward the children, than he had done malice towards their Fathers: For the care that Herod had of them, increased his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greatest among the Brethren; and he especially feared lest when they should grow to mans estate, they would resist his power, being assisted by King Archelaus, as his Sons in Law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrarch should do like, for that he had married his Son to Alexander's Daughter. And so much the more was he incited, because all the people had compassion of those Orphans, and had conceived a hatred against him, who never ceased to express his malice against his Brethren. He therefore devised all the means that were possible to disanul the Decrees which his Father had resolved upon to this effect, being very loath that they should ever live to be partners with him in the Kingdom. So that at last Herod condescended to Antipater's demand, which was, that he might marry Aristobolus's Daughter, and his Son to Pheroras's Daughter: and thus were the forementioned Marriages wholly cut off; yea, even against Herod's former Decree. At that time Herod had nine Wives, namely, Antipater's Mother, the High Priest's Daughter, by whom he had a Son that bare his name, and a Daughter of his Brothers, and a Cozen of his own, by whom he had no children. He had another Wife also, that by Nation was a Samaritan, by whom he had two Sons, Antipas and Archelaus, and a Daughter called Olympias, who was afterward married to Joseph the Kings Cozen. As for Archelaus and Antipas they were brought up at Rome, with a certain private Friend of his. Moreover, he married one that was called Cleopatra, that was born in Jerusalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, which Philip was brought up at Rome. By Pallas he had Phasaelus: by Phedra and Helpia he had two Daughters, Roxane and Salome. As for his eldest Daughters, Alexander's Sisters by the Mothers side, whom Pheroras had refused to take in Marriage, he match'd the one with Antipater his Sisters Son, and the other he wedded to Phasaelus his Brothers Son, and this was Herod's Progeny.

After this, intending to assure his Estate in the Countrey of Trachonite, he resolved to build a Borough of the bigness of a City in the midst of the Countrey, as well to secure his Countrey, as to be in better readines to repulse his Enemies, with more expedition. And having intelligence that a certain Jew was come from Babylon with five hundred Archers on Horseback, and about one hundred of his kindred men, and had adventured to pass Euphrates, and was in the Countrey adjoining to Antioch near unto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine General of the Roman Army had given him a Cattle, called Valatiba, to inhabit, he sent for him and his followers, therein promising promising to give him both Lands and Lordships in the Segniory of Batanea, which <sup>The year of the</sup> bordereth on Trachonite, intending that he should make head against those that would <sup>World, 3961,</sup> assail him; and promising him that both his Lands and his Souldiers should be exempt <sup>before Christ,</sup> from all Tributes, and payments of Customs. This Babylonian Jew was induced by <sup>Nativity, 3.</sup> these offers to come, and take possession of the place, where he builded a Borough, called Bathra. This man opposing himself against the Trachonites, defended the Countrey, and those Jews that came from Babylon to Jerusalem to offer Sacrifice, from all Incurfions and Robberies of the Trachonites; and divers that observed the Religion of the Jews, resorted unto him from all places; so that this Countrey was very well peopled, by reason of the exemption of the Tribute, which continued during Herod's life-time.

But Philip who succeeded him, exacted afterward some small Tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the Great, and his Son of the same name, charged them with great Taxations; yet permitted them to enjoy their Liberty; whose Successors, the Romans imposed many grievous Tributes upon them, yet continued their Freedom; of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely discourse in due place, and in process of my History. Now this Jew Zamaris, to whom Herod had given the Possession of his Countrey, died, after he had lived virtuously, and left a virtuous Offspring behind him; amongst whom was Jacim, renowned for his dexterity on Horseback; who, with his Troop of Horse, was of the King of Babylon's Guard. This Jacim died when he was very old, and left his Son Philip to succeed him; a valiant man, and addicted to all sorts of Virtue, as much as any one that hath been renowned in History; for which cause King Agrippa loved him, and put his trust in him, and committed the trust and training of his Souldiers unto him, who led them also forth, if occasion of service was proffered.

C H A P. III.

Antipater, Pheroras and his Wife conspire against Herod, Salome acquainteth him with it, he causeth some Pharisees who were of his Conspiracy, to be put to death: He endeavoureth to make Pheroras repudiate his Wife, but he cannot be persuaded to it.

<sup>Helio & Rufinus, chap. 3.</sup> WHilst Herod's Affairs were thus disposed, all men's eyes were fixed upon Antipater, after that Herod had given him full power; which was granted him, in hopes that his Father had, that he would behave himself faithfully and affectionately towards him: But he abused his Authority more audaciously than could be expected; for he treacherously coloured his conceived malice, and easily drew his Father to believe him in whatsoever he said. He was feared by all men, not only for his Authority, but for his subtilties and policies. But above all the rest, Pheroras respected him most, and was in like manner, as greatly esteemed by him. For Antipater circumvented him by the means of certain women, who favoured his Faction; for Pheroras was commanded by his Wife, his Mother, and Sister-in-Law, notwithstanding that he hated them, by reason of the abuse they had offered to his Daughters who were unmarried; nevertheless he was enforced to dissemble all things, because he could do nothing but what they were always privy to, and had such power of his Affairs, that they obliged him to perform whatsoever they pleased. Antipater was also very intimate with them, both on his own account and his Mother's; for these four women were of one mind in all things, and spake, as it were, by one mouth: Yet was Pheroras at odds with Antipater, upon some slight distastes; and the that wrought this debate betwixt them, was the King's Sitter Salome, who had a long time spied all their drifts; knowing well, that their mutual friendship tended to the overthrow of Herod, which she was ready to acquaint him. And they knowing well that the King disliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was privy to that which they pretended, which was his utter ruine; resolved between themselves to refrain their public familiarity, and to make a show that they were at odds one with another; to which intent they reproached one another, especially at such time as they were either in Herod's presence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would acquaint him with it. But in secret they intermitted not their accustomed friendship, and continued their correspondence with more privacy; yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they first detected this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution; for she diligently things, and aggravated the same by report to her Brother, whom she informed of

A of their secret meetings, banqueting and secret consultations, which (as we said) had no other scope but his ruine, if he did not prevent them in time; shewing that for the present they behaved themselves like enemies in outward shew, and all their speeches tended to disgrace one another; but that in secret they were friends, and entertained their amity, and promised each other their mutual assistance, to strengthen themselves against those, to whom they were loath their friendship should be discovered. But he durst not make shew thereof, because he knew that his Sister was a woman too much addicted to reproachful Accusations. There was among the Jews a Sect of people that were called Pharisees, who were too much addicted to self-opinion, and boasted themselves to be the exactest observers of the Law in all the Countrey; to whom these women were very much addicted, as to those who were much beloved of God, as in outward appearance they made shew for. These were such as durst oppose themselves against Kings, full of Fraud, Arrogancy and Rebellion; presuming to raise War upon their motions, and to rebel and offend their Princes at their pleasures: Whereas therefore, all the Nation of the Jews had sworn to be faithful unto Cesar, and to the estate of the King, these only refused to take oath; and of this Sect there were to the number of six thousand. For which cause the King having imposed a penalty upon them, Pheroras would use force, but were esteemed for such as were skilful in foretelling such things as were to come, by reason of their often communication with God, foretold her, that God had decreed to bring the Kingdom of Herod and his Posterity to an end; and would bring to pass, that the Crown should descend to Pheroras and his Sons. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no less: And how they likewise corrupted every one of his Courtiers; for which cause he put those to death amongst the Pharisees, who were the principal Authors of this Advice, and with them also the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the finest men of that time. He afterwards cut off all those amongst his household Servants, who were of the Pharisees Faction; for the Pharisees had perswaded Bagoas, that this new King whom they prognosticated, would not only consider him as his Benefactor and Father; but that he himself should also marry, and find himself capable to beget Children.

D But after that Herod had punished those amongst the Pharisees, who were convicted to have been of the Conspiracy, he assembled a Council of his friends; before whom he accused Pheroras's Wife, and ripped up the injuries that were done unto his Daughters, as it hath been declared, ascribing the same to the pride of this woman, objecting it for a crime against her, for having injured his Honour. Besides this, he accused her that she had of set purpose, stirred up Mutinies, and by all means possible, both in words and deeds, contrary to all Law of Nature, stirred up debate betwixt him and his Brother; and that the Fine that he had imposed upon his Adversaries, was satisfied at her charge; so that no jot of that Conspiracy was contrived without her consent. For which causes (said he) Brother Pheroras, it shall not be amiss for you of your own accord, to drive such a wretched woman from you, before you be requested, and the Sentence be pronounced against her; otherwise she will be the cause to kindle a War betwixt you and me. For if you will continue the Friendship and Brotherhood betwixt you and me, separate your self from her: In so doing, I will account you for my Brother; and you shall lose nothing by the affliction which I bear unto you. For the bond of Brotherly love cannot continue safe and inviolable, unless you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moved with the importance and weight of this discourse; yet he said, that for the love he bare unto his Wife, he would forget nothing of that duty which Confraternity required at his hands in regard of his Brother; but that he had rather die, than live without her company, whom he loved more dearly than his life. Herod, although he took this answer of his Brother's for a most grievous injury, yet forbore he to discover his displeasure towards him: He only forbid Antipater and his Mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. He commanded the women likewise, that they should give over their familiar entertainments the one with the other, which all of them promised to perform. Yet this notwithstanding, upon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another; and Antipater and Pheroras feasted one another by night. The report also went, that Antipater had the company of Pheroras's Wife, and that his Mother was the means and instrument of their privacy meeting.

Antipater suspecting his Father's dislikes, and fearing lest his hatred should bring him into hazard, he wrote unto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their Letters unto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater unto Cesar, with all expedition as was possible. Which being brought to pass, Herod sent him thither with divers Royal Presents, and gave him his Testament and Will with him, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then he bequeathed the same to his Son Herod, whom he had by the High Priest's Daughter. About the same time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding he had neglected those things which Cesar had commanded him. Antipater accused him before Cesar, for the same faults wherewith he was charged by Nicobolus. Syllæus also was accused by Aretas, for murdering divers of the best account in the City of Petra, contrary to his mind; amongst the which was Sohemus (a man of much virtue and honour) and Probatus, Cesar's Servant; of which Crimes Syllæus was accused upon this occasion which ensueth: There was a certain man of Corinthus, who was one of the King's Guard, and one he put very great trust in: Syllæus perswaded him by store of money and Bribes, to kill Herod; which he promised to perform. Probatus made privy to Syllæus's mind, he presently told it to the King who caused him to be apprehended and tortured, who confessed the whole matter: He laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthian's confession; one of which was a man of Command in his Country, and the other was Syllæus's chief friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to solicit, with many exhortations, the Corinthian to execute the murder; and to assist him, if he stood in need of them. Which being fully proved by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

Pheroras in his Sickbed is visited by Herod; and being dead, is honourably buried by him.

Herod perceiving that his Brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his Wife, he commanded him to retire himself into his own Dominions; whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy; protesting by many solemn Oaths, that he would never more return into the City, unless he were assured that Herod was dead. Not long after it happened, that the King fell sick, he was sent for to receive certain secret instructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his Oath. Notwithstanding, Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his love and affection towards him; for he came to Pheroras, as soon as he heard of his first Sickness, without being sent for: And after he was deceased, he sent his body to Jerusalem, and honourably entombed him in that place, and grievously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipater's mis-haps, who at that time was gone to Rome. For it was God's pleasure, that at last he should be punished for the murder of his Brethren. I will discourse of this at large, that it may serve for an example to many Kings, how they ought to practice and follow Virtue in all their actions.

C H A P. VI.

Pheroras's Wife is accused, and Herod is advertized of Antipater's Conspiracies.

*Herod & Rufinus, chap. 5.
Pheroras's Free-men accuse his Wife make diligent enquiry of that unfortunate and unexpected dislike. Herod gave ear to for poisoning their suit, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible*

After Pheroras's death, two of his Freemen, who were Taphnites by birth; and such as Pheroras in his life time, both only trusted, and dearly loved, came unto Herod; requiring him not to suffer his Brother's death to pass unpunished, but to accuse his Wife make diligent enquiry of that unfortunate and unexpected dislike. Herod gave ear to for poisoning their suit, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible

A credible. Whereupon they told him that Pheroras, the day before his unexpected sickness, had spt with his Wife; and that having received an unaccustomed Poyson with his meat, he was dead. That this Poyson had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her speech protested that it was some Potion to encrease love, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others are skillful in Poysons, and are great Sorcerers; and the that was charged with Pheroras's Mother and his Wife's Sister went into those Quarters, on purpose to buy the Supper. The King moved by these words of theirs, tortured both those Maid-servants of theirs, who were their Bond-women; as also certain other of their free servants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed it; at length, the that was last of all put to her trial, overcome by the pains endured, said nothing else, but that the prayed God that Antipater's Mother might feel the like torments, since she was the cause of all these mischiefs which they endured.

These words of hers made Herod the more eager and inquisitive, so that by force of tortures he wrought out all the secrets of these women; so that by force of Assemblies, and those very words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his Son and himself, which had been reported unto the women that Pheroras entertained; namely, C that he would give him one hundred Talents provided that he would use no conference with Pheroras. Moreover, they reckoned up the hatred that Antipater bare unto his Father, the complaints that he made unto his Mother, of the too long life and continuance of his Father; for that in regard of himself, he was already grown old; so that although the Kingdom should fall into his hands presently, yet he could receive but very little contentment thereby. Moreover, he alleged, that divers Brothers and Brothers Children were brought up together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing; for that already, if he should fortune to die, the Kingdom was to descend not to his Son, but to his Brother: Besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the King of divers cruelties committed by him, and of that murder which he executed upon the persons of his Children. That for fear lest he should practice his Tyranny against those that remained, Antipater had found out the device to be summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himself into his Tetrarchy.

E These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his Sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that being pressed with the malice of Antipater, he sequestered Doris his Mother from his presence, robbing her before her departure of all her Jewels, which were valued at many Talents; and from that time forward he shewed himself more favourable towards those women of Pheroras's household. But nothing did more whet Herod's displeasure against Antipater, than did a certain Samaritan, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the Affairs of Antipater the King's Son. For he being brought in question, and delivered the same to Pheroras his Uncle, commanding him to practice the King's death in his absence, and by that means least suspected. That this Poyson was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipater's friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipater's Mother's Brother. That this Poyson was kept by Pheroras's Wife, and was committed by her Husband to her custody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confessed no less; and hastening forth, as if she intended to fetch the salt her self down headlong from the top of the house; yet she did not kill her self because she fell upon her feet. After she was recovered out of her swoon, and the King had promised all security both to her self and her Family, if so be she would discover the truth; and contrariwise, threatened her with extreme torments, if she obstinately continued in concealing these Treasons: She swore she would discover all things according as they were acted; and as many men thought at that time, she told nothing but the truth. That Poyson (said she) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, Theudion brought it to our house of a Brother of his, who was a Physician. After this, kept the same, but bought by your Son Antipater, to poyson you that are his Father. Now therefore, after that my Husband fell sick, and you in kindness came to visit and comfort him, he being moved with compassion, and conquered by your brotherly kindness, and by your good affection and loving care in giving order for his health, called me unto him, and said; O Wife, Antipater hath circumvented me, whilst by his pestilent counsels, and poysoning practices he desireth to cut off his Father, and deprive me of a kind

Antipater the Samaritan declared how Antipater the King's Son had provided Poyson for his Father.*

 After the had spoken thus, the brought forth before them the Poyson, and the box wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antipholus's Brothers, and the Mother to them both, confessed no less, being constrained thereto by force of violence and torture, and acknowledged the Box. The King's Wife also, who was the Daughter of the High Priest, was accused of confederacy and concealment of all these Treasons.
 For which cause Herod put her away from him, and cancelled his Sons name out of his Testament, wherein he had bequeathed him the Kingdom after his decease. He di-placed also his Father-in-law Simon the Son of Boethus from the Priesthood, and placed Matthias the Son of Theophilus, who was born in Jerusalem. In the mean time Ba-thillur, Antipater's Freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confessed that he brought a Poyson with him, to deliver it to Antipater's Mother and Pheroras, to the end, that if the first Poyson were not effectual enough to dispatch the King, they might make use of this other, to cut him off speedily. There came Letters also to Herod's hands from his friends at Rome, written and devised by Antipater's means, to accuse Archeclaus and Philip, for very often they had refreshed the memory of Alexander and Aristobulus's death, contrived by their Father; and for that they lamented the miserable fate of them, who were innocently betrayed; and that now also they themselves were called back unto their Country for no other cause, but upon their arrival to be made partakers of their Brother's miserable destiny. These things did Antipater's friends certify Herod of, in that by many and mighty Presents he wrought them there-unto. He himself also wrote unto his Father colourably, after a manner excusing the young men, and imputing their words unto their indelicacy and young years. L Mean while, he busied himself in accusing Syllanus; and courted the chiefest Romans, buying divers Ornaments and Jewels to present them with, to the value of two hundred Talents. And it is to be wondered at, that so great matters being in agitation against him, seven months at least before his return into the Country of Judea, that no inking thereof came unto his ears. But the cause partly was the diligent search and watch that was kept upon the High-ways, and partly the hatred that all men had conceived against Antipater. For there was not any that would put themselves in hazard to procure his security.

C H A P. VII.

Antipater, being returned back into Judea from Rome, is convicted in the presence of Varus Governor of Syria, for having endeavoured to poison the King his Father. Herod causeth him to be imprisoned; and writeth to Augustus on that Subject.

Hedus & Ruf- inus, chap. 6. Herod writeth friendly Let- ters to An- tipater, and cal- leth him home from Rome.
 Herod concealing his displeasure, answered Antipater his Son's Letters; giving him a strict charge (as soon as he had dispatched his affairs) to hasten homeward, left his long absence should prove hurtful to him. He likewise, after a temperate manner, complained unto him of his Mother, promising notwithstanding to remit the fault upon his return; and by all means he made shew to him of much kindness, fearing lest he, apprehending any suspicion, should defer to hasten his return; and lingering too long at Rome, should contrive some treacherous stratagem, to the prejudice of himself, and the overthrow of his Kingdom. Antipater received these Letters in Cilicia, and had already received others at Tarentum, by which he understood of Pheroras his Uncle's death, wherewith he was sore grieved; not for the love he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before he had murdered his Father, according as he had promised him. As soon as he came to Celsenderis a City of Cilicia, he grew doubtful whether he should return or no, and was grievously troubled at his Mother's disgraces, who was banished from the Court. The opinions of his friends in his behalf were various; for some of them counselled him to stay and expect the event of these troubles
 in

The year of the World, 3962. before Christ's Narcissus, 2. Celsenderis in Cilicia. Sebastus a Na- ven builded by Herod in honour of Ce- sar. Antipater upon his re- turn is saluted by no man.
 A in some place: others on the other side, advised him to delay no longer his return into his Country, for that upon his arrival he might easily satisfy all those objections and accusations that were forged against him, because his accusers had nothing else to strengthen their cause with, but his absence. This later advice pleased him best; so that he betook himself to Sea, and at last arrived in the Port of Sebaste, so called, and builded by Herod to his great charge, in honour of Caesar.
 And now already it manifestly appeared that Antipater was upon his downfall: For no man came out to salute him, no man entertained him, as they did upon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations; but contrariwise they boldly and openly spake against him, and bitterly cursed him, telling him that he was justly punished for the wickedness that he had committed against his brothers.

About the same time Quintilius Varus, who was sent to succeed Saturnine in the Government of Syria was at Jerusalem, and drew thither at that instant upon Herod's request, to assist him with his Counsels in his present and weighty occasions: Now whilst these two fate and consulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and Royalty that he was accustomed to use, entered the Palace. The Guard of the Gates suffered him to enter in, but they excluded all those that were with him. This first of all affrighted and appaled his Spirits, in that he already perceived into what calamity he was fallen; and now also when he drew near his Father, he thrust him from him, accusing him of the murder of his Brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poison him, telling him that the next day Varus should both hear and judge all his misdemeanors.

He altogether daunted at the greatness of that unexpected mischief, which he both heard and saw, departed presently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his Mother and his Wife (which was Antigonus's daughter, who had been King of the Jews before Herod) by whom he was advertised of all that which had happened, and for that cause more diligently prepared himself for his trial. The next day Varus and Herod fate in judgement, accompanied by their friends on both sides; thither also were cited the Kings kindred and his sister Salome; and certain others, who could discover his secret practices; some of which had been tortured, and namely Antipater's mothers servants, who a little before his arrival, had been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he should take heed that he returned not into the Country, because his Father was made privy to all his practices, and that for the present he had no other refuge but only to Caesar, and to take care likewise lest he should fall into his Father's hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himself on his knees before the King his Father, besought him not to condemn him before his cause was heard, but to suspend his judgment until such time as he had heard his justifications. But Herod after he had commanded him to withdraw himself into the midst of the Court and Assembly, deplored his infelicity in begetting such Children, and bewailed his misstep, that in his old age he was reserved for an Antipater. After this he reckoned up his cares in their education and institution, and Antipater how bountifully he had bestowed upon him as much riches as he required: he added that none of all these favours could preserve him from falling into the hazard of losing his life by their policy, that they might unjustly possess the Kingdom, before either the Law of Nature, or the will of their Father, or their own rights could challenge the same. But above all the rest, he wondered at Antipater, with what hope he could possibly be puffed up to attempt so audacious and wicked an enterprise. For by his Testament he had made him the Heir of his Kingdom, and in his life time also had made him his equal in Dignity, Glory and Power: That he received yearly fifty talents of revenue, and to furnish his voyage for Rome had three hundred talents given him. Moreover, he accused him for his slanderous accusations against his murdered and slaughtered Brothers: Who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? But if they were innocent, why without cause produced he is slanderous accusations against those, who were his natural Brethren? For in his own respect he had never found any thing against them, but by his report, neither had he given Sentence against them, but by Antipater's advice, who for the present were abetted by him, because he was become the Author of their Parricide. In uttering these words he began to weep, being unable to inflict any further; for which cause he besought Nicholas Damascene, who was his dear friend, and converted or dimly with him, and was privy to all that which had passed, to prosecute the rest of his Indictment.

But Antipater turning himself towards his Father, began to justify himself, urging

the same Testimonies, and Favours that his Father had shewed unto him, and the H honours he had received at his hands, which he would never have shewed him, if he had been unworthy of the same, and had not by his virtue deserved these favours. He alleged also, that by his virtue he had prevented all that which might have happened; and that where the cause required his labour or diligence, he dispatched all things with his own industry; that it was unlikely that he, who had delivered his Father from those Treasons which were intended against him by other men, should himself attempt the like: And as far from probability that he should go to extinguish that virtue (whereof even until that day he had given testimony) to the end that always hereafter he might be defamed for such baseness. For long before this time he was named and entitled to succeed him, and to enjoy those very honours, whereof already he enjoyed no small part; whereby he I intended that it was unlikely, that he, who might enjoy the half of all that his Father had, in all security, vertue and honour, should desire the whole with infamy and danger; yea, and with an uncertainty to obtain the same; that the punishment which had befallen his Brothers (whom he had disclosed and accused at such time as they were hidden) was procured by him, who, if he had pleased, might have concealed them; and whose wickedness towards their Father (after it was proved) he himself had revenged upon them: Neither (as he said) repented he himself of that which he had done; so for that action of his might he have an argument to prove how incorruptly he loved his Father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Caesar himself was witness thereof, who could be no more deceived, than God himself; whereof those Letters bore record, which were written by him; which in K equity, should be of no less force, than the slanders of those who sought to set them at odds: The most part of which objections and reproaches had been completed and devised by his enemies, who have had the leisure to pursue the same during his absence, which they could not have performed in his presence. At length he pleaded, that all those Confessions were false which were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that such as are put to the trial, confess many things by force of torment, that are untrue, to satisfy them that put them thereto: Briefly, without all favour, he offered himself to the Rack in justification of his Innocency. Upon these Protestations, all the Council and Assistants were confounded. For all of them had great compassion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his tears; so that his very enemies began to pity him. And Herod himself L made it appear, that he seemed in some sort to be altered in his opinion; so notwithstanding he endeavoured to conceal the same.

But Nicholas, according as he was requested, prosecuted that Accusation which the King had begun; urging all things to the uttermost, and producing all the Witnesses, and those manifest Proofs, that were gathered from their Examinations that were tortured. Especially he discoursed at large of the King's Virtue, which he had fatherly expressed in the education and instruction of his Children; for which he had been so unkindly and unnaturally requited. Moreover, that his first Children's foolish rashness was not so much to be wondered at; for that being young, they had been corrupted by the malice of their Counsellors, and had blotted out of their hearts all the Laws of Nature, rather through ambition of Rule, than desire of Riches. But that Antipater's boldness was both wonderful and wicked, who, more cruel than the cruellest Beasts (who towards their Benefactors acknowledge each good turn) was nothing mollified by his Father's so great indulgence, nor terrified by his Brother's calamity; but must needs emulate them in their cruelty. And thou thyself (said he) O Antipater, wert the Judge of their attempted Treasons, by thy inquiry they were indicted, thou didst execute the justice against them being convicted. Neither do we disallow that thou didst prosecute them with just indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitatest their intemperance: And we easily gather, that those acts of thine were not attempted for thy Father's security, but intended for thy Brother's overthrow, that by despoiling their malice, thou mightest insinuate N thyself into the favour of their Father and thine, that afterwards thou mightest more cunningly and securely bring him to his end, which at length thou hast attempted to perform. For whilst thou adjudest thy guilty Brothers to death, and sparest their Confederates, thou makest it manifest in all men's eyes, that thou hast a kindness for them, whose assistance thou mightest hereafter use in oppressing thy Father. Thou hast therefore enjoyed a double pleasure: the one openly, as if rejoicing and glorying, that by thy Brother's death thou hast achieved a matter of honour; the other secretly, with endeavouring by greater wickedness, but more secret fraud, to make an end of thy Father; the revenger of whose injuries thou pretendest to be. For if thou hadst truly detested their malice, thou hadst never esteemed the same to be worthy of thy imitation; for thou hadst not cut them off for committing such Capital offences as were answerable unto thine, but for that they had a more just Title to succeed in the Kingdom than thou hast. And thou hast thought good to mix the murderer

A murder of thy Father with the massacred bodies of thy Brothers, lest thou shouldst be suddenly convinced in thy conspiracies against them, and to the end that the punishment that thou wilt deserve to suffer, should light upon thy unfortunate Father, projecting with your self such a parricide, and so unusual and heinous a murder, that to this day the like thereof hath not been heard of amongst men. For thou being his Son hast praised these Treasons, not only against thy Father, but against him that loved thee above measure; and didst thee good beyond expectation, with whom thou hast actual participation of the Government of the Kingdom, and who had appointed thee his Heir in the same, being no ways hindered, either for the present, or in times past, to participate the pleasure of Sovereignty, and being assured of the hope of Succession, both by the will and writing of thy B Father. But you have measured the course of your affairs, not according to Herod's virtue, but according to your own appetite and malice, intending to deprive such a Father of his part, who granted you the whole; and seeking in effect to murder him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from injury. And not content your self to practise these treacheries, you have infected your Father also with no less corruption, and instead of love that should have been amongst Brethren, you have filled your Family with mutinies and hatreds: And besides all these things, thou hast been so audacious, as to call thy Father beast, being of thy self more malignant than those beasts which are most venomous, using thine own venom against thy dearest friends, and such as have best deserved to satisfy thy hands, strengthening thy self with thy Guard, and divers treacheries both of men and women against one another, as if thy cursed mind alone were not sufficient to satisfy thy hatred. C And now after so many men and women, Slaves and Freemen tortured for thy cause, after the open and manifest testimonies of thy parties in the conspiracy, thou art so impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedst to deprive thy Father of his life, dost now as much as in thee lieth, endeavour to abolish that Law that was instituted against Malefactors in thy kind, and berewhail, O Vassus, equity, and all whatsoever is Justice in the world. Dost thou therefore accuse them of falsehood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mightest endanger their credit, who were the preservers of thy Father's life? Shall we believe thee more than them in their torments? Willst thou not, O Varus, deliver the King from the injury of those, who are his own flesh and blood? Willst thou not put this wicked beast to death, who hath murdered his Brothers, to pretend a love towards his Father, and who hath at last been discovered to be the most mortal enemy of them all, to the intent that at one instant he might establish the Kingdom in himself? Thou knowest that Parricide is no private crime, but a publick injury to life and nature, which is no less loathsome in the thought, than it is in the act: which publick injury Parricide that who so punishest not, is of himself guilty of an injury offered to our common mother nature.

After these Speeches, he added certain points concerning Antipater's Mother, which through feminine frailty had been blabbed out by her, to wit, that she had asked counsel of Soothsayers and Conjurers, to whom the Kingdom should befall: and that she had offered Sacrifices, and made Prayers for the death of the King. And moreover, he declared what lascivious pranks Antipater had played with Phorara's women, in banqueting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewise that were presented by such as were tortured, with sundry testimonies of divers men; some suborned, the other found out to be immediately produced and confirmed. For each man seeing that Antipater was exposed to the accusations of those men, who had the Government in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long accompanied him, had openly delivered him into the hands of his enemies, they immediately discovered the insatiable hatred which they had conceived against him, whereas before the fear that they had of him enforced them to be silent: yet he was not so much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickedness; namely, his deadly hatred against his Father, his breach of amity amongst his Brethren, whereby he filled the Kings Household with seditions and murders, of some comploted, and acted by others; neither giving place to hatred according to Justice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might stand with his profit. Which because divers men perceived long before that time, they judged of events according as they had reason, and the rather because that being void of hatred, they spake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice against him, at such time as they were hur up; at this time when they were deprived of their fear, they declared all things that they knew. And whereas there were produced divers of the mischief committed by him, yet there seemed nothing to be feigned, for that the accusers neither spake in favour of the King, neither concealed any thing for fear of danger, but condemned all Antipater's wicked actions, and judged him worthy of death and punishment, not so much for his Fathers security, as for his own demerit. Neither did they only accuse him, who were by justice tied thereunto, but divers voluntary witnesses also brought in their evidence; so that although he was a very cunning dissembler, and colourer of his lies, and most impudent in their assertions, yet he durst not once open his mouth, or mutter against the fame.

As soon as Nicholas had finished his discourse and accusations, Varus commanded Antipater to answer to those crimes that were objected against him, if he had any thing to allege, that he was not guilty of those forfeits or heinous crimes that were laid unto his charge. For of himself he desired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his Father desired no less, than that he should justify himself, and maintain his innocence. But he humbling himself upon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, besought God, who was the searcher of all hearts, to approve his innocence by some eminent sign, how he never had attempted any thing to his Fathers prejudice. For this is the custom of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any heinous act, they engage themselves in all wickedness, without any respect of Gods Justice; and when as by their misdeeds they are fallen into danger, then they call upon God, by whose invocation and testimony they desire to be delivered: making a shew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof in this time happened in Antipater, who, whereas before he disposed all his actions so, as if there had been no God that had the overway of humane affairs; at such time as Justice overtook him, and he was deprived of the benefit of the Law, had his recourse to Gods power, alleging that he was relieved by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his Fathers safety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often questionings he could wrest nothing from him, but that he only cried upon God, seeing that otherwise there would be no end of these debates, he commanded the poyson to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being presently brought unto him, and given to one that was condemned to die, it presently killed the man. Which done, he arose and departed out of the Council, and the next day went unto Antioch, where for the most part he was wont to have his residence, for that it was the chief City of the Assyrians. But Herod presently commanded his Son to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talk had been between him and Varus upon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in imprisoning him, but by his counsel. When as therefore he had fast bound him, he sent unto Cesar, and wrote his Letters unto him, as touching Antipater, sending certain appointed Messengers, who by word of mouth might assure him of his cursed treasons.

At the very same time there was a Letter intercepted, sent by Antipater to Antipater, which Antipater remained in Egypt: which Letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: *I have sent you Acme's Letter, bazarizing thereby my own life: For you know that I am in danger of the displeasure of two mighty Families, if I should be discovered. As for your self, betink you well of your affairs in this respect. Such were the Contents of this Letter. The King made diligent search for others also, but he could find none, for Antipater's servant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his servants and friends perceived that the inside of the Messengers under coat was newly sewed: for he had two garments the one upon the other: and conjecturing that the Letters might be hid in the folds thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the fame, and found them. The Tenour whereof was this: *Acme to Antipater, Health: I have written the Letters to your Father, according as you gave me instructions, and I have counterfeited the copy of my Letter, as if it had been sent by Salome to my Mistress. I assure my self, that when he hath read the same, he will punish Salome as one that hath practised Treason against him. But that Letter that was supposed to have been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipater's invention, and in Acme's style. The Contents were these: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I have an especial care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy security, having found a Letter of Salomes written against thee unto my Lady, I have not without danger taken the copy thereof, and sent it unto you in which she required that she might have licence to marry Sylaeus. Fear this copy, lest through the knowledge of the same, I come in danger of my life. Now in that which the had written to Antipater, she discovered that the had written these words to Herod, according to that order he had given her, as if Salome had conspired to work some treason against him. She sent also the copy of those counterfeit Letters in the name of Salome, and sent them unto her Mistres to work treason.

A This Acme was a Jew born, and Chamber-maid to Julia, Cesar's Wife, and did that which is above written, for the love which the bare unto Antipater, whom he had hired by great sums of money, to the end, that he should assist him to execute the mischief, which he practised against his Father and against his Aunt. Herod made almost desperate by the great mischiefs of Antipater, was stirred up on the sudden to shorten his days, for that he was the only means that stirred up these great Tempests of Sedition in his Kingdom; and who not only practised against his Father and his Aunt, but against his Sister also; and had in like manner corrupted Cesar's Family. Salome also incensed him the more, beating her breasts, and offering her self to all deaths, if any such like matter might be duly proved against her. For which against his Son Herod sent for Antipater, commanding him to speak freely all that which he had to say, without fear. But he having not one word to answer for his defence, Herod said unto him: Since that on all sides thou art convicted and surprized in thy wickedness, delay not, but discover those that are of thy Confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault upon Antipater, and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded with extreme grief, would have sent Antipater to Rome unto Cesar, that he might receive his judgment from him; but afterwards he feared, lest, by the interest of his friends, he should escape the danger; for which cause he kept him bound and fettered in Prison, as he had done before: And in the mean while he sent certain Messengers with Letters to Cesar, to accuse his Son, and to declare wherein Acme had been his Confederate, producing the Copy of the Letters. These Ambassadors therefore repaired to Rome, instructed in those things they were to answer to, those Interrogatories that should be offered them; and with them he sent these Letters.

The Golden Eagle that Herod had consecrated, and fixed on the Portal of the Temple, is pulled off: The severe Punishment that he inflicteth by it. The King's terrible Sicknes; and the cruel Orders that he giveth to his Sister Salome, and to her Husband.

W Hilst Herod's Ambassadors were on their Journey to Rome with his Orders, he fell sick, and made his Will, appointed his youngest Son to succeed him in the Kingdom; for through Antipater's instigations, he had conceived a hatred against Archelaus and Philip. He sent also a thousand Talents unto Cesar, and five hundred to his Wife, and to his Children, Friends and Free-men. He bestowed also money, Rents and Lands upon his own Children: He gave his Sister Salome an ample Possession, because she had always persevered in loving him, and had never offended him. And having lost all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70 years old, he became very touchy and froward in whatsoever his affairs, with his other Nation took pleasure in those misdeeds, upon this occasion which ensueth: Amongst those that were most excellent Interpreters of the Laws and Ordinances of the Country (and for this cause were in that desire to obtain Vertue, spent all their time with them) understanding that the King's sickness was dangerous, they incensed the younger sort, counselling them to overthrow all those works that the King had caused to be made, contrary to the Law and Custom of the Country; to the end, that they might obtain the reward that attendeth the fame. For in that the King had undertaken that sickness wherewith he was detained, For Herod had done divers things contrary to the ancient Law, against which Judas and Mathias exclaimed openly. For he had erected over the Portal of the Temple, an Eagle of Gold of great value. Now the Law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to live according to the fame, should in any sort erect any Image, or represent any Figures of living Creatures: Great therefore whatsoever. For this cause these Doctors counselled them to pull down that Eagle; telling them, that although the matter seemed very dangerous, yet ought they to prefer an honest death before a pleasant life, if so be it be employed for the defence of their Country-laws and Religion. For in so doing, they should obtain immortal praise for the present, and a memorable and eternal glory in time to come; neither that they should protract the execution thereof for fear of danger, since death was a thing that could not be avoided; so that since by the general course of Nature, they must needs die, it should become them bravely to forsake their lives with praise and honour in embracing Vertue. For to die in the execution of some noble exploit (which cannot be achieved without hazard of danger) their them (of what Sex soever) should reap the fruits thereof, and their other Parents that should outlive them. In these or such like words they encouraged the young men.

About that time there was a rumour spread, that the King was dead, which gave very great furtherance to the Doctors resolution. For at Noon they went up into the Temple, they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their Axes, in the light and assembly of a great number of people that

After this, having changed his mind, he made a new Testament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peraea, whereas before he had instituted him for his Successor in the Kingdom. He created Archelaus King; he gave the Provinces of Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea and Panæda to Philip his Son, and Archelaus's Brother by the Mother's side, to be Tetrarch over those places. He gave his Sister Salome, Jamnia, Azot and Phasela, with fifty thousand Crowns of Gold. He provided also for his other Kin-men, all whom he left rich in money, which he gave them, and revenges which he assigned them. He gave Cesar ten Millions of Drachmes in Silver, amounting to the sum of eleven hundred thousand Francks; besides a great quantity of Gold and Silver Plate, and of precious Moveables. To Julia, Cesar's Wife, and to certain others, he bequeathed five millions of Drachmes, amounting to five hundred and fifty thousand Francks, or thereabout. After he had in this manner disposed all things, some five days after he had caused Antipater to be executed, he departed this life; having reigned after Antigonus's death, for the space of thirty and four years, and thirty and seven years after he was elected and approved King by the Romans: A man without respect, cruel and severe towards all men, Slave to his wrath, Lord of the Laws; yet so favoured by fortune, as no man more; for from a private man, he became a King; and being environed with many dangers, he always happily escaped; and he lived also a very long time. And as concerning his Family and Children, in his own opinion he was happy, in that he overcame his enemies; but in my opinion, he was most unfortunate.

Before the King's death was thorowly known, Salome and Alexas discharged those that were locked up in the Hippodrome, and sent every one of them home unto his own house; telling them, that the King commanded them to depart, and follow their household Affairs, and till their Land; wherein they performed a most noble action, and benefitted the whole Nation with an especial good turn. After the King's death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas caused all the Army to be assembled in the Amphitheatre in Jericho; and first of all they caused Herod's Letters to be read, which were addressed to the Souldiers, in which he gave them thanks for the fidelity and good will which they had expressed towards him; praying them to continue the same to Archelaus his Son, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolemæ, to whom the King had committed the custody of his Seal, recited his Testament, which was to take no effect, except that Cesar approved the same. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. The Souldiers flocked about him in Troops, accompanied with their Captains; promising him to serve him with no less good will and affection, than they had done his Father; praying God to yield him his assistance.

At that time also the King's Hearse was prepared, and Archelaus gave order that his Obsequies should be most royally performed; and bestowed all the Furniture that was requisite for that Funeral and Princely Interment. He was carried out in a Gilded Litter, adorned with divers precious Stones, the Cover thereof was of Azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a Purple Raiment, having a Diadem upon his head over which there was a Crown of Gold, and a Scepter put in his right hand. About this Litter marched a great number of his Children and Kinsfolk; and after them followed his Souldiers, disposed in Bands and Troops, according to the custom of every Nation: The first of these were the Archers of his Guard; after them went the Thracians; and lastly, marched the Germans and Galatians; all of them in their Warlike Dress and Discipline. After them followed all the Army, marching in order, as when they were drawn up in Batalia, each one under his Captain. Next these followed five hundred of his Household Servants, bearing Perfumes. And all these in his Equipage, marched to the Castle of Herodium, distant some eight Furlongs off. For there he was entombed,

A entombed, according to the Tenour of his Testament. Thus died Herod. Archelaus continued his Mourning for seven days (space in honour of his Father. (For the Law of the Country ordaineth no less.) And after he had feasted the people, and laid aside his mourning Apparel, he ascended up into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with Shouts and Acclamations, cried, God save the King; and with Prayers and Praises honoured him to their uttermost: And he being conducted up to a high Throne of Gold, which was made on purpose, entertained the people very graciously, taking pleasure in their Acclamations and Congratulations that they bestowed upon him. He gave them thanks also, "For that they had blotted out of their remembrance, the injuries that his Father had done unto them; protesting in his own behalf, that he would certainly take care to requite their kindness, with an entire affection. He likewise told them, that for the present he accepted not the Title of King, because the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Cesar should ratify his Father's Testament. For this cause, although the Souldiers that were in Jericho, were so kind to set the Diadem upon his head, yet he would not accept of that uncertain honour; because it was not resolved whether Cesar, who was the principal Party in the Gift, would grant him the Government or no.

He protested likewise, that if his Affairs succeeded according to his desire, he would not, in honour, forget their love, or leave their good affection unrequited. And that in the mean while, he would enforce himself, by all means, to further those things that concerned them; and entertain them with more kindness, than his Father had done. But they, according as it is the custom of the common people, thinking that those that enter into such Dignities, declare and open their minds at the first day. The more Archelaus spake kindly and courteously unto them, the more they applauded him; and presented him with divers Petitions, for Grants and Donations from him. Some of them cried out unto him, that he should take off some part of their yearly Taxes: Others cried to him, to deliver those Prisoners that were committed by Herod, of whom divers had pined a long time in Prison: Others instantly urged him to cut off those Tributes which had been imposed by him upon Bargains and Sales, which was to pay the half of the Bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not any ways contradict, striving to the uttermost of his power to please the people; for he knew very well, that their good affection would be no small advantage towards him, in the confirmation of his Kingdom. That done, he sacrificed unto God; and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainment of his Friends.

C H A P. XI.

E Some Jews (who demanded satisfaction for Judas and Matthias and others deaths, whom Herod caused to be burned, for having pulled down the Eagle off the Portal of the Temple) make an Insurrection, which obligeth Archelaus to cause three thousand of them to be put to death: He goeth afterwards to Rome, to be confirmed King by Augustus: His Brother Antipas, who pretends to have a right to the Crown, repaireth thither also; the Cause is pleaded before Augustus.

F M Euan while, some amongst the Jews who were desirous of Revolutions, in their private Conventicles bewailed Matthias and his Confederates, whom Herod had put to death and condemned, for defacing the Golden Eagle; because that after their decease, they had neither been publicly honoured, nor lamented, by reason of the people's fear that the people had conceived of Herod. For which cause, at that time they requited with lamentations and out-cries, that their Obsequies might be solemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received some satisfaction by their tears and exclamations, they uttered many odious and disgraceful expressions against Herod; and assembling themselves together, they requested Archelaus to do them Justice against those, that during Herod's life, were in Authority; and especially they demanded, that the High Priest who was advanced by his Father, should be deposed, and that another more lawful and upright might be placed in his stead, to exercise the High Priest's Function. Now, though Archelaus was sore displeased at these violent proceedings, yet notwithstanding, he conformed himself to their humour, in that he was with all expedition, to repair repair unto Rome, to understand and attend Cæsar's pleasure. Therefore he called H for the General of his Army, commanding him to persuade them not to seek revenge for those men, who were dead, notwithstanding they were their friends; because whatsoever was done, was done according to Law; and that no enquiry might be made thereof, except, to the great prejudice of his reputation, and hazard of his state, in regard of the uncertainty of the time; that it was more expedient for him to study for the maintenance of peace, until such time as being established in the Kingdom by Cæsar's consent, he should return back again unto them, and that then he would consult with them for the common profit, according to their demands; wishing them for the present to contain themselves, and to take heed lest they stirred up Sedition.

When he had thus instructed his General, he sent him unto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not suffer him to speak; but for fear of danger and death, they put him to silence. And if any other were so forward as to speak unto them, and persuade them to some moderation, and to alter their sinister resolutions, he was also in danger: For that they had this persuasion, that all things ought rather to be ordered according to their pleasures, than by the Authority of their Superiours; supposing that although, during Herod's life time, they had been deprived of their dearest friends, it would be now a matter unworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from their privilege to demand their revenge. For they were transported with their own opinions; and held all that for lawful and upright, which was in any sort conformable to their pleasures, without fore-seeing the danger that might happen thereby; they were so desirous to be revenged on those, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas divers were sent by Archelaus to advise them, and divers came unto them not as messengers from him, but as friends and lovers of peace, of their own motion, with an intent to pacify them, they would not permit any of them to speak; and through their rage there arose a great tumult, which had grown to a further extremity, if a great number of people had joyned with them.

Sedition at the Feast of the Passover.

At that time fell the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which is called Pascha, which is a Memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt; at which time all men do most willingly present their Sacrifices; and a greater number of Beasts are killed at that Feast, than at any other time. To this Solemnity also, an infinite number of people assembled from all parts, to honour God; whereby the seditious (supposing that they had gotten fit opportunity) lamented Judas and Matthias, who were the Expositors of the Law, and kept themselves within the Temple, whither they had gathered good store of Victuals, which they were not alamed impudently to beg for. But Archelaus, fearing lest their rage should produce some more grievous effect of mischief, sent out a Captain, with a Regiment of a thousand men, to repress their fury, before the rest of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewise unto him, whom they found to be the forwardest in that Commotion. Against those the Seditious cried out with great clamours, and incensed the people against them, so that all of them rushed in upon the Soldiers, and killed divers of them. The rest of them escaped with their Captain; yet not without divers Wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned again to their Divine Service.

Three thousand Jews
slain.

Now Archelaus supposing that his whole Fortune was endangered, except he suppressed the rage of the multitude; he sent out all his Foot, with a certain number of Horse, to prevent, lest they that were without should yield assistance to those who had taken up their lodging in the Temple; and to put those to the sword, who having escaped the violence of the Foot, supposed themselves to be in security. These Horsemen slew about three thousand men, the rest retired themselves into the Mountains that were near adjoining. Hereupon Archelaus made Proclamation, that each one should repair unto his own house. For which cause they departed, and abandoned the Feast, for fear of greater mischief; notwithstanding they had spleen enough, as it is the ordinary custom of the ignorant multitude.

After this, Archelaus, accompanied with his Mother, took his Voyage to Rome, with Nicholaus and Prolomey, and with divers other his Friends; committing the Government of all his Household and Kingdom to his Brother Philip: Salome, Herod's Sister went also, leading with her, her Children. There went also divers other of his Kindred, who said that they would all of them endeavour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the Kingdom; but in effect, it was to hinder him with all their Power; and especially, to accuse him unanimously, for what was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Cæsar's Viceroy in Syria, posting into Jewry to take charge of Herod's Money, met with Archelaus in Cæsarea. But Varus arriving in the mean while, detained him from finishing that

A that Voyage; for Archelaus had sent for him to come thither by Prolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleasure, would not seize the Fortresses of Jewry; neither sealed up Herod's Treasures, but left them in Archelaus's possession, until such time as Cæsar had given order for the Estate; and after he had made this promise, he stayed in Cæsarea.

Salome repaired to Jerusalem, with an intent to seize Herod's Treasures and Castles. Antipater in hope to recover the Kingdom, followed her to Rome.

After Archelaus had set sail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch, Sabinus went to Jerusalem, where he seized the King's Palace: and calling before him the King's Agents, and the Captains of his Garrisons, he required them to deliver up their Castles into his hands. But they according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the possession in their accustomed manner, according to the King's direction, pretending to keep the same in Cæsar's behalf. At the same time Antipas Herod's Son travelled to Rome likewise, in hopes to be elected King, in regard of Salome's promises; and for that he better deserved the same than Archelaus, considering that in the first Testament, which should be of more force than the later, he had been appointed King. He led his Mother also with him, and Prolomey the Brother of Nicholaus, who had been one of Herod's most esteemed friends, and was well affected to further his Title. But especially he was stirred up to seek the Kingdom by Irenæus, a man very eloquent, and to whose charge, in regard of his sufficiency, the Affairs of the Kingdom had been committed. For which cause, although he was persuaded to give over the Kingdom unto his elder Brother, who was confirmed in the Kingdom by his Father's Testament, yet he would not give ear thereto. But Antipas no sooner arrived in Rome, but all his Kinsfolk revolted from Archelaus unto him, not so much for the love they bare to him, as for the hatred they conceived against Archelaus; and above all, for the desire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themselves under a Roman Governour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the Royalty, should be more profitable to them than Archelaus: Sabinus also, by his Letters, accused Archelaus to Cæsar; but Archelaus by Prolomey, exhibited unto Cæsar a Supplication, containing his Right and Title unto the Kingdom, his Father's Testaments, and the account of the Money which Herod his Father had sealed by, together with his Ring, and expected the issue.

D But when he had read these Letters, and those which Varus and Sabinus had sent him, and understood what sums of money he had left, and what the yearly Revenue was, and how Antipas challenged the Kingdom, and appropriated it to himself, according as his Letters mention, he assembled all his friends, to have their advice thereupon. Amongst them was Cains the Son of Agrippa; and his Daughter Julia, adopted by him, whom he caused to sit in the chieftest place; which done, he commanded the Assistants to speak what they would concerning this matter. At that Antipater, Salome's Son, a man very eloquent, and a great Adversary to Archelaus, spake first, saying, That it was a mockery for him at that time to speak of the Kingdom, considering that before Cæsar had granted it him, he had already seized the Forces of the State, when as upon a Festival day, he had killed so many; who, although they had deserved that punishment, yet ought the Justice thereof to have been referred to a lawful Power, and not to have been usurped by him; for either being King with Cæsar's prejudice, whose Authority he had contemned; or by being a private man, which was a great oversight. For which cause, he undeservedly at this time hoped for his approbation, whom already, as much as in him lay, he had deprived of the Title and Authority of his Allowance. Moreover, he objected against him, that of his own Authority he had changed certain Officers of the Army, and that he had seated himself in the Royal Throne; and like a King, had determined certain causes, and had granted certain demands of the people: That he had left nothing undone, which he might have performed, had Cæsar confirmed his Title. He alleged also, that they who were enclosed in the Hippodrome, were dismissed by him; and divers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambition of young men, who, desirous to govern, do ordinarily commit such things: Besides this, his neglect in mourning for his Father; and withal, his rare Banquets all night long at that very time his Father died; whereas the people began to murmur, seeing the small regard he had of his Father's death, from whom he had received so great Goods and Honours. How all the day long he made a shew of his sorrow and tears in his Pavilion, but all the night he took pleasure like a King; and being such, if Cæsar should grant him the Kingdom, he would behave himself no less unkindly towards him, than he had done to his most kind Father. That it was no less than an odious crime in him, to delight himself with Songs and Dances at his Father's death, as if he had been his enemy: That he now came to Cæsar's Presence, to the intent to obtain the Kingdom by his consent, whereas already he had behaved himself no otherwise, than if he had already been established King by his Authority. But most of all he exaggerated the Slaughter he had committed in the Temple, Temple, and the Impiety perpetrated so near to the Feast of Easter; at which time divers, both Strangers and Citizens had been killed after the manner of Sacrifices, and the Temple itself filled with Carcases, not by a stranger, but by him, who, under the colour of Religion, despoiled the Government of the Kingdom, to the end he might satisfy the injustice of his nature, in exercising each way his Tyranny towards all men; for which cause his Father never thought, nor ever dreamt to substitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and disposition, and by his former Testament (and that of greatest force) had ordained his Adversary Antipater to be King. For he had been allotted the Kingdom by his Father, not when his mind was dead before his body, but when both his Judgment was sound, and his body in health. Yea, although at that time Archelaus's Father had such a conceit of him, as in his later Testament he pretended; yet, that he had already declared what kind of King he was like to be, who condemned Cæsar's Authority in confirming the Kingdom; and being as yet a private man, doubted not to murder the Citizens in the Temple. This said, Antipater (to give greater credit to his words, bringing divers of his Kindred as Witnesses of that he had said) ended his Oration.

Nicholaus ex-
cuseth Archelaus.

Whereupon Nicholas arose, and alledged in Archelaus's behalf as touching the slaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be restrained from their Tumults and Uproars, before Archelaus was enforced to appease them by force; alledging, That they were so much the more guilty, for that they had not only exercised their malice, but also had enforced others to attempt so great a revenge against them; for their insolvency seemed in appearance to concern Archelaus, yet in a sort their contumacy pertained to Cæsar's ruine. For those that had been sent by him to appease and redress their sedition, were, against all Law and right, charged and killed by them, without respect of God, or regard of the solemn Feast: whose defence Antipater was not ashamed of, without respect of equity, so that he might satisfy that hatred which he bare unto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who first of all obtained not from injury, but whetted those Swords, which were drawn in maintenance of the peace, against their own bosoms. He enforced all other things also, whereof they had accused Archelaus, against themselves, saying, that none of those things were done without their consents; and that the offence was not so grievous, as they intended it should be esteemed, to the end they might discredit Archelaus. So great a desire was in them to hurt their Kinsman, a man both well respected, and assisted by his Father; as also kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the Testament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect estate of mind and body, and of greater force than the former, because the Authority and confirmation thereof was ascribed unto Cæsar, the Sovereign of the World.

Further, that Cæsar would not imitate them in that wrong they did unto Herod, who (being, during his life-time, bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, go about to violate his last and true Testament; but that rather like a Friend and Confederate, he would confirm his Will; who, like his faithful and sworn well-willer had committed all things to his trust. For that there must needs be a great difference between their Malice, and Cæsar's Virtue and Faith, which was renowned thorough the whole world. For which cause he would not judge his Decree to be inconsiderately past, who left his Succession to his well-deserving Son, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was unlikely that he should err in the choice of his Successor, who had so discreetly submitted all things to Cæsar's judgment. After this manner Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Cæsar courteously raised Archelaus, who lay prostrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be King, by giving an apparent Testament, that he was constant in his resolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which should be answerable to Herod's Testament, and Archelaus's profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some good hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time; but dismissing the Council, he debated with himself, whether he should ratify the Kingdom to Archelaus only, or divide it amongst Herod's Kindred, especially since they all had need of his assistance.

World, 3964.
after Christ's
Nativity, 2.

A great Rebellion in Judea, whilst Archelaus was at Rome; Varus Governour of Syria stoppeth it. Philip, Archelaus's Brother, goeth also to Rome, in hopes to obtain one part of the Kingdom. The Jews send Ambassadors to Augustus, to free them from their obedience to Kings, and to re-mite them to Syria: They complain to him against Archelaus, and albor the memory of Herod.

BUT before Cæsar had determined any thing certainly in this behalf, Mariabale, Archelaus's Mother died of a Sickness; and Varus the President of the Jews in Syria, had sent Letters, which assured the Emperour of the Rebellion of the Jews. For after Archelaus's departure, all the Nation was in an Uproar. To pacify which, Varus resorted thither, and punished the Authors of the same: and after he had appeased all things, he returned to Antioch; leaving a Regiment of Soldiers in Jerusalem, to restrain the factious Innovations amongst the Jews; yet, he prevailed nothing by his policy. For as soon as Varus was gone, Sabinus, who was Overseer of Cæsar's Affairs, remaining in that place, grievously burthened the Jews, trusting to that power that was left him, and supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed divers Souldiers, and made use of them to oppress the Jews, and to provoke them to Sedition. For he took upon him to surprise their Fortresses, and to force to make search after the King's Treasures, for his private Lucre and Covetousness sake. When therefore, the Feast of Whitsonide was come (which is one of our Festivals) divers thousands from all parts repaired to Jerusalem, not only for Religion's sake, but also for despite and hatred they had conceived against those Violencies and Injuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were those of Judea grievously offended, but divers also resorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Jericho and the Cities situate on the other side Jordan, desiring all of them to be revenged on Sabinus. And dividing their Camp into three Bands after this manner; one part of them took up the Hippodrome; and of the other two, the one seized the Southern Quarter of the Temple, and the other the Eastern, and the third which were in the Hippodrome, were planted to the Westward, where the King's Palace stood; and thus prepared they all things that were necessary to set upon the Romans, whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number and resolution, who were resolved either to die or overcome; sent present Letters unto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the Regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs utterly perish, without his speedy rescue: As for himself, he withdrew into the Tower and Dungeon of the Castle Phasclur, which was a Fortrefs, so called in honour of Herod's Brother, who was killed by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a sign to the Romans, that they should falliey out upon the Jews, being afraid to trust himself to his own Friends, expecting that the rest should expose their lives to danger in maintenance of his safety, which his extreme Covetousness had endangered, and their lives also. The Romans having made this Sally, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans divers ways had the upper hand; yet the Jews were no ways discomfited, notwithstanding they had lost many men; but wheeled about so long, till at last they seized the outward Galleries, and those that encompassed the Temple, and in that place there was a host Assault; for they flung down stones with their hands and slings, and there were certain Archers mixed among them; who having recovered a place of advantage, grievously gauled the Romans which were below, in that they had no means to avoid their shot, but were so exposed thereunto, that their Enemies had the better. And with this disadvantage the Romans fought a long time, till at length, being enraged to see their enemies have such an advantage, they secretly fired the Galleries and Porches, without any discovery of those that were therein; which Fire, brought thither by many, and fed with such matter as would speedily flame, immediately took hold of the Roof, because the Roof was covered with Pitch and Wax, gilded over; so that these great and excellent Buildings were burnt down to nothing in a moment; and they that were resorted thither, were all of them consumed before they were aware. For some of them fell with the Roof of the Galleries; others shot at, and killed by those that stood round about; others departing of their lives, and amazed at the mischief, either cast themselves into the fire, or killed themselves with their own Swords; and all those that retired in hopes to save themselves by that way they ascended, were encountered by the Romans, who killed them them all, because they were difarmed, though furiously desperate: fo that not one of them that ascended the Porches escaped with his life. Afterwards the Romans thrusting forward one another by those ways where the fire was least, entered the Treasure house where the sacred money was kept, by which means a great part thereof was stoln away by the Soldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away four hundred Talents. But the Jews being afflicted with a double calamity, first of all with the loss of their Friends in that fight: and lastly, with the spoil of the treasury; yet they assembled a Troop of the valiantest Soldiers, and besieged the Palace, threatening to burn the same, with Sabinus and all other the Romans that were therein, except they speedily departed; and in so doing, they promised both them and Sabinus all assurance and security: whereby it came to pass, that divers of them that were in the Palace, issued out and submitted themselves unto them. But Rufus and Gratus having three thousand of those valiant Soldiers under their command, who had served Herod, joyned themselves with the Romans. The like did those Horsemen which followed Rufus, who in like manner submitted themselves to their direction: yet for all this, the Jews continued and intended their Siege, undermining their walls, and exhorting the Romans to depart, and not to deprive them of their liberty, which they had long enjoyed under their Predecessors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his Soldiers; yet durst not trust them in regard of their former attempt, and he suspected the too liberal offer his enemies had made him: but neglected it, because he expected Varus.

At the same time infinite other troubles were raised in divers other places of Judea, according as every one either was incensed with a desire of gain, or a will to revenge. For two thousand Soldiers (who had formerly served under Herod, and being at that time cashier'd, lived at home) assembling themselves together, assailed those of the Kings faction, who made head against them, under the conduct of Herod's Nephew Archelaus, who never daring to encounter them in a place of equal advantage, in that they were old Soldiers, and well exercised in war, defended himself in that he held them over, Judas the Son of Ezechias the Arch-thief, whom Herod overcame with so much difficulty at Sepphoris a City in Galilee, gathering unto him a band of desperate men, made incursions upon the King's Dominions. And having taken all those Arms and Weapons, which he might recover in that place, he armed from the first to the last, all those Souldiers that were with him; he took away all that money which was reserved for the King, in that place; and affrighting the Inhabitants round about him, he spoiled all those with whomsoever he met; aspiring to the Kingdom, not that he thought himself well enough qualified for that dignity, but because he had gotten such freedom in wickedness, he took the boldness to do any thing.

Whilst these troubles ranged in every place, Simon also, who had been one of Herod's servants; and both for his shape, stature and strength, was esteemed amongst all men, undertook the Kingdom: and being attended by a mighty Army, and proclaimed King by them, who were a wicked and unbridled multitude, and perswading himself that he was worthy to be King before any other; he first of all set the Palace on fire in Jericho, and spoiled all that was therein. He burnt also divers other Royal Palaces, belonging to the King, which were in divers places of the Country; giving them free license who were his followers in the Action, to bear away the Prey that remained: And far more licentious pranks had he played, had not his praides been speedily and wisely prevented. For Gratus, who with the King's Soldiers, had joyned himself with the Romans, and gathered all the Forces that he had, went out against this Simon. And after a fierce Battel, they on the other side of Jordan, were put to flight; and fighting rather with courage than Military Discipline, they were overcome. And whilst Simon, in crossing a Valley, sought to save himself by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the same time also, the Royal Palace of Amatha, that was hard by Jordan, was burnt by men of as bad disposition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole Nation reigned this raging Rebellion, for that the Country had no King, who by his Vertue, might govern and moderate the people; for that the strangers who were sent to repress these mutinies, did rather incense them through their Violence and Avarice. For a certain obscure and base man (neither esteemed for Vertue, nor worthy of regard for his Riches, but being a Shepherd utterly unknown before, and only famous for his huge stature and strength) called Atabriges, was so audacious to aspire to Royal Dignity, and took pleasure to offer violence, not valuing his life; and exposing himself to all hazards for the only unbridled affection he bare to Sovereignty. He had

The Jews almost engaged in rebellion.
Atabriges though in body and goodly in stature, attempted the Royal Dignity.

A had four Brothers of as goodly stature as himself, who were esteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the means offered them to obtain the Kingdom. Each one of these had the Command over a Company. For a great company of people resorted daily unto them; the charge of whom was committed unto his Brethren, at such time as any occasion of War was offered, and he in the mean while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, countelled and commanded all things. The Power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nothing; for he disposed all things according to his own pleasure; and both he and his Brethren were filled with the slaughter of the Romans, and those of the King's side, whom he hated alike; these, by reason of the insolence they had used during Herod's life-time; the other, in regard of those injuries, which lately they supposed themselves to have received by them. This hatred of theirs daily encreased more and more, and there was no man that could escape their hands, both in respect of the gain sought, and for the custom they had to shed blood. They therefore at that time let upon the Romans, and surprised them on the sudden near to Emmans, at such time as they carried Victuals and Munition unto their Camp, and having enclosed their Centurion Arius, with forty of their most valiant Footmen, they shot him thorough with their Darts: The rest that expected nothing less than death, were saved by Gratus, who came in upon them with the King's Souldiers; whereupon, leaving the dead bodies, they retired. Continuing their War C after this manner a long time, according as occasion was offered, they had done much mischief to the Romans, and far more injury to the Nation of the Jews. At last, they were surprised; the one in an Encounter betwixt them and Gratus, the other in fighting against Ptolemy. The eldest was taken by Archelaus; and the last being disheartened with the Accidents, and seeing no means to escape (for besides his other misships, his Souldiers were afflicted with sickness) he, with the rest, upon Archelaus's Faith and Oath, submitted himself unto him. But this was done some little while after.

At this time all Judea was full of Robberies; and as many seditious Assemblies as drew together, so many Kings were there elected, who were raised to the utter ruine of the Commonweal. Amongst the rest, the Romans were they that smarted least; but the Murthers were executed against those that were out of the Country. But Varus understanding by Sabinus's Letters, in what dangers they were; and fearing the utter overthrow of his third Legion, he took with him the two other (for to the uttermost in Syria there were but three) and with the assistance of the Kings and Tetrarchs, he halted into Jewry, to relieve those that were besieged; commanding those that were sent out before he dislodged, to meet him at Ptolemais; and passing by the City of the Berythians, he received a thousand and five hundred Soldiers at their hands, to attend him in his War. Aretas also, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himself into Confederacy with the Romans, in regard of that hatred he bare Herod, sent him E Horse and Foot. When all these Forces were assembled at Ptolemais, he delivered a part thereof to his Son, and one of his Friends; commanding them to make War against the Galileans, who bordered upon that City; who entering that Country, and putting all those to flight, whosoever durst make head against him, he took Sepphoris; and selling the Inhabitants under the Spear, he consumed the City with fire, Varus himself marching towards Samaria with his Army, violence not the City, in that he knew it was free from the Contagion of the Seditious; but he pitched his Camp in a certain Village, which was Ptolemy's Possession, called Arus. The same did the Arabians burn, revenging themselves on Herod's Friend for his sake; and marching forward, the Arabians spoiled also another Village called Sampho; and for that it was F strongly fortified, burned it. Besides, in that journey nothing escaped their hands, but they put all to Fire and Sword: For both Emmans was burned by Varus's Command, and in revenge of his Soldiers that were killed in that place, it was left desolate and void of Inhabitants. From thence, drawing near to Jerusalem, those Jews that besieged the Legion of that side, upon the sudden view and approach of the Army of the Romans, fearfully fled, giving over that Siege which they intended. But those Jews vereth the Legion of Jerusalem, being sharply reproved by Varus, alledged in their excuse, that the people, in regard of the Feast, were assembled in that place; and that the War was not begun by their consent, but undertaken by their boldness who resorted thither from divers places; and that they were so far off from assailing the Romans, that they rather seemed to be besieged by them. And long before this, Joseph, King Herod's Nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their Soldiers, were gone out to meet Varus, and those Romans that had sustained the Siege, had done no less. But as for Sabinus, he would not appear in Varus's presence; by stealing away privily out of the City, he fled towards the Sea. Then Varus sending a part of his Army thorough the whole Country, fought out those Authors of this Sedition, and those that were noted men in the action; some of which who were most guilty, were punished; the rest were delivered. Of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified, and that done, seeing that this Army stood him in little stead, he dismissed them. For divers disorders and injuries, contrary to Varus's express Command, were acted by his Souldiers, who fought after nothing more than to encrease their means by other men's miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Jews were assembled together, he hasted to apprehend them; but they, not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Archelaus's advice submitted themselves. But Varus having pardoned the people for their Rebellion, sent all those that were the Ring-leaders thereof to Cesar, who pardoned divers of them. But he chastised certain of Herod's Allies, and such as bare Arms with them; for that neither in regard of Kindred, nor respect of Justice, they had abstained from Insurrection. After that Varus had thus appeased all the troubles in Jewry, and left the first Legion in Garrison in Jerusalem, he returned to Antioch.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another Occurrent, that arose upon this occasion: Certain Ambassadors of the Jews resorted thither by Varus's permission, requiring that it might be lawful for them to live according to their own Laws; these presented themselves to the number of fifty, and were back'd by eight thousand Jews that inhabited the City. And when Cesar had assembled the Council of his Friends, and chief Citizens in Apollo's Temple, which he had builded to his mighty charge, thither resorted the Ambassadors, who were followed by a Troop of Jews; and Archelaus also, attended by his Friends. But the King's Kindred neither flood by Archelaus, in regard of the hate they bare him; and yet disdained to assist the Ambassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cesar's presence to oppose themselves against their nearest Friend and Kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus's persuasion, resorted thither out of Syria; especially to plead for his Brother, to whom Varus wished all good fortune: Besides that, hoping not a little, that if the Jews should obtain the liberty to live according to their Laws, it might come to pass, that the Kingdom being divided amongst Herod's Children, he might also light on some part thereof. Therefore, after the Ambassadors of the Jews had obtained Licence to propose their demands, pretending with themselves wholly to extinguish the Royalty: They began to rip up Herod's disgraces; alledging how only in name he had been a King, whereas otherwise he had used all the Tyrannous practices, that the wickedest person could have invented, towards the destruction of his Nation; and that not content with these, he had of his own head practised and invented new. Neither that it needed to reckon up how many he had deprived of life, when the estate of those that were alive was far more desperate; whom he not only frightened with perpetual terror and severity, but also with injurious hands had not obtained from their Goods. By which means it came to pass, that he not only builded, but beautified Foreign Cities, inhabited by Foreign Nations, to the end he might the rather utterly spoil those by exaction, who were situated and seated in his own Country: And that he enforced his Nation to extream Poverty, which he received in most happy Estate; whilst he spoiled those Nobles of their Estates, who upon weak probabilities were condemned to die; or granting them Life, deprived them of their Possessions. And, whereas yearly Tributes were imposed on every one, yet severally were the ravenous and covetous desires of his Friends and Courtiers to be satisfied; yea, and of his servants also, who had the Authority to exact these things; and by this means they might redeem their injurious wickedness. As for the deflowering of Virgins, and the shameful betraying of a Matron's chastity, they covered them under silence; for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such abuses, if their disgraces be but known to a few. In short, that Herod had no other ways governed, than as if the Government had been committed to a most wild Beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that Nation had been afflicted with many Calamities and Murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongst their Monuments of Antiquity, that may be compared with their present Calamity under Herod. For which cause, upon just respects, they had with one consent, named Archelaus their King; supposing that whatsoever King might befall them, he would always demean himself more affably than Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus, they had mourned with him for his Father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might obtain his good affection. But he without delay, and all at once, had made manifest to the whole Nation, what opinion they were

A to conceive of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed King (for that it lay in Cesar's hands to grant it) and as if he had been afraid, lest he should assuredly be acknowledged for his Father's Son, he had shewed an example of his Vertue, Moderation and good Government, that he would use towards his Subjects, by the first Act which he had committed, not only against God, but also against men. For in the Temple it self he hath caused three thousand of his Country-men to be killed in stead of Sacrifices. And how can he chuse but be justly hated, who besides his other cruelties, objecteth against us the Crime of Rebellion and Mutiny? The effect of their request therefore was this, that they might not any more be governed by a King, nor any such like Government; but that they might be united unto Syria, and submit themselves under their Governours that should be sent thither: That in so doing, it should truly appear whether they were feditious and addicted to changes, or whether they would live in peace, when they had favourable Governours. After the Jews had spoken to this effect, Nicholaus discharged the Kings of those Acculations that were objected against them, and namely Herod, who (as he said) had never been accused all his life-time; and that it was no reason that they who justly accusing him, might have caused him to be punished during his life-time, should now address their Acculations against him after he was dead. And as touching those things which were objected concerning Archelaus's actions, it ought to be imputed to their infolence; for that engaging themselves in matters contrary to Law; and having begun to murder those who sought to appease the tumult, they accused such as had kept them in obedience. Besides this, he objected against them, that they were addicted to alterations, and took pleasure to stir up Seditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey Justice and the Laws, and that there was no Nation in the World so head-strong as that of the Jews; for that they would have the upper hand over all. Thus spake Nicholaus.

CHAP. XIII.

D When Cesar had heard these things, he dismissed the Assembly. But some few days after, desirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of half that Government that appertained to Herod's; promising him to bestow Royal Dignity upon him, if so be he behaved himself virtuously, according as it became him. As for the other Moyety, he divided it between two of Herod's Sons, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his Brother Archelaus for the whole Kingdom. The same Antipas also, had the Country on the other side Jordan, and Galilee, with two hundred Talents of yearly Revenue. As for Philip, he had Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, and part of the Palace that was called by Zenodorus's name, with one hundred Talents. As for Archelaus, he had Idumaea, Judea and Samaria, which were discharged of the fourth part of the Tributes by Cesar, for that they had joyined themselves with the rest of the people, during the time of the Sedition. Besides that, Archelaus had the Tower of Straton, Schafis, Joppe and Jerusalem. For Gaza, Gadara and Hippus were Cities of Greece, which Cesar had separated, and adjoyined to Syria. Archelaus had five hundred Talents of yearly Rent out of his Country. Thus was the Patrimony divided amongst Herod's Sons. As for Salome, besides that which her Brother had given her in his Will, which were the Cities of Jamnia, Azot, Phaselis and half a Million of money, Cesar granted her a Royal house in Ascalon; so as the received in the whole, sixty Talents of yearly Revenue, and had her house allotted her within the Dominion of Archelaus. All Herod's Kindred received that which was bequeathed unto them by his Testament. Two of his Daughters that were unmarried, were endowed by Cesar with a quarter of a Million of money which he gave them, besides their Father's Portion, and they were married to Pheroras's Sons. Moreover, he gave Herod's Sons, all which he had given him by the Testament, amounting to the sum of one thousand and five hundred Talents; contenting himself only to receive some few movables, not so much for the value, as in remembrance of the King, who had given them.

neglected my love, thorough the desire thou hast had to be married the second time. H
Neither wast thou contented to have done me this wrong, but hast taken unto thee likewise a third Husband, lewdly intruding thy self into my Family; and being married to Archelaus, thou art content to admit my Brother for thy Husband. Notwithstanding this, I will not forget the love that I have born thee, but will deliver thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine own, as heretofore thou hast been. After that he had told this Vision to some women that were her Familiars, she died very shortly after. Which accident I have thought good to register in this place, in that I was to treat of those things; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a notable example, containing a most certain argument of the Immortality of Souls, and God's Providence. And if any one think these things incredible, let him keep his opinion to himself, and no ways contradict those, who by such events are incited to the study of Virtue. Now when the Government of Archelaus was united to Syria, Cyrenius who had been Consul, was sent by Caesar to tax Syria, and to dispose of Archelaus's house.

Cyrinus the Roman Senator having passed through all Degrees, Offices and Dignities, until such time as he obtained the Consulship, (a man of great account) was sent into Syria by Cesar's order, to do justice among the people, and to sell and tax every man's goods: Cyprian a Captain of Horse was sent with him, who was appointed to be Governour of all Jewry. Cyrinus therefore came into Judea, which was already united to Syria, to tax the Goods of the Inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus's Substance. And although at the first the Jews thought this Tax very unreasonable, yet notwithstanding K without contradiction they submitted themselves, being persuaded thereunto by the counsel of the High Priest Joazar the Son of Boethus. But after this there arose a certain Jew called Judas the Gaulanite, born in the Town of Gamala; who having a certain man called Sadoc the Pharisee, Confederate with him, laboured to stir up the people to Rebellion: alledging that the Sects was no other thing, but a confession of their servitude; exhorting all the Nation to maintain their liberty, and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enjoy their goods with security; and besides this, obtain both honour and glory in prosecution of such an enterprise. Moreover, that God would not afford them a more assured way to settle their Fortunes, than by this means; namely, if they would employ themselves L in the execution of their designs; and if having conceived in their minds high and noble attempts, they forbore not to accomplish the same, notwithstanding the execution cost them their lives. These speeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleasure, and by the same they were the more confirmed and heartened to Rebellion. So that there was no kind of evil which these men set not abroad; yea, the whole Nation was so full of miseries, that it was impossible to relate them: For the Wars went on with such fury, that it was impossible to restrain the violence thereof, so that they neither spared friends nor enemies, but were wholly given over to the spoil. There was nothing but Robberies and Murders of the Nobility, under pretence to establish the state of the Commonwealth, but in effect for their private profit sake; whereby the Cities were ruined with Seditions and Murders, in which the Inhabitants killed one another, after a strange manner of fury, and desire they had not to spare any that was not of their Faction. They were afflicted with Foreign Enemies and Famine; yet none of these could pacify their fury, nor make them forbear to destroy Cities, and shed innocent Blood; till at length the horrible mischief took such a head, that they consumed the Temple of God, and burned all the stately buildings. So dangerous a thing it is to change the Customs and Manners of a Country.

For Judas and Sadoc having introduced and raised a fourth Sect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole Commonwealth with many troubles; and planted the roots of those mischiefs, which afterwards spread abroad from this uncustomed Sect. For which cause I think it not amiss to discourse briefly of these Sectaries opinions, whereby so many evils have fallen upon our Nation.

C H A P. II.

Of the four sorts of Sectaries that were among the Jews.

T Here were three Sects among the Jews of long continuance and Antiquity; that of the Essenes, that of the Saducees, and that of those who were called Pharisees.
Of these we have spoken in our second Book, of the Wars of the Jews; and yet now
I think it not amiss to speak somewhat of them in this place also. The Pharisees use a very austere and strict kind of life, and addit not themselves to any delicacy, but diligently follow that which their reason induceth them unto. They honour their Elders; neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things unto fate, and yet they take not an assent of will from man; supposing that God tempereth all things in such sort, that by his Ordinance and man's will all things are performed, good or evil. They believe also, that the Souls of men are immortal; and that after death they receive their reward, according as they have additied themselves to virtue or vice in their life times; the one to lie in perpetual Prison, the other to rise again very shortly. For which cause they are in great esteem among the people; and all that which appertaineth to the service of God, whether they be Prayers or Sacrifices, all things are done according as they give direction. So ample a Testimony do the Cities yield of their wisdom, temperance and honest life. But the Saducees are of that opinion, that the Souls of men perish with their Bodies. They observe no other thing but that which is in the Law; and hold it a Virtue to dispute with their Masters, concerning the Decrees of their Sect. Their opinion is entertained by very few; yet such, who for the most part are men of the best account; there is hardly any thing done without their advice: And when they are advanced to any honours, they are enforced to allow of that which the Pharisees shall propose; otherwise the common people will not endure them. The Essenes attribute unto God the Government and disposition of all things. They say that the Souls of men are immortal; and all the uttermost of their endeavour and delight is, to maintain Justice and Equity. They send their Offerings unto the Temple, yet sacrifice they not with other men, by reason they use more sacred and different Ceremonies; for which cause they are secluded out of the common Temple, and sacrifice a part. Otherwise, they are men of most reconciled behaviour, and such as are wholly additied to cultivate their Land. They have one custom which is worthy admiration, and such a one as is not to be found amongst any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make account of virtue, which they have practised from all Antiquity; which is, that they possess their goods in common; neither doth the richest amongst them make more use of his possessions, than he that hath least of all. They are at least four thousand in number, who have neither Wives nor Slaves;

supposing that Women are the occasion of injustice, and Slaves do cause insurrections;
and living apart by themselves, they serve one another; and chuse out certain upright men among the Priests to gather the Fruits and Revenues of the Lands, to the end they may be maintained and nourished thereby: In a word, they follow the same course of life that they do, who are called Plisiti among the Danes. The fourth Sect was founded by Judas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Pharisees, but they are extremely zealous of their liberty, acknowledging but one only God, Lord and Master of all things; and had rather both themselves with their dearest Children and Kindred, should endure the most grievous and bitter torments that may be imagined than call any mortal man their Lord. Of which constancy of theirs I forbear to discuss any further at this time, for it is sufficiently known unto divers, who have been eye-witnesses thereof; neither do I fear lest any one should suppose those things to be incredible, which I have said of them; but rather, that I have spoken less than they themselves make evident, in contemning their grievous tortures and punishments; which courage and magnanimity of theirs encreased very mightily amongst our Nation, being kindled by the most grievous injuries which were offered us by Gessius Florus our Governour, by which means at length it came to pass, that they revolted and rebelled against the people of Rome. Thus much concerning the Sects among the Jews.

After that Cyrenius had confiscated Archelaus's Goods, and finished the valuation of I every man's Estate (which happened thirty seven years after Antonius overthrow by Caesar in the Actian Battel) he deposed Toazar from the Priestly Dignity, by reason of that Sedition which the people stirred up against him, and established Ananus the Son of Seth in his place. But Herod and Philip took each of them the possession of their Tetrarchy, and disposed of the Affairs thereof. Herod inclosed Sephoris with a strong Wall, and made it the chiefest City and Ornament of Galilee: He fortified also another City called Bataramphiba, and named it Julius, in honour of Julia the Emperor Caesar's Wife. Philip repaired Paneada, situated near unto the head of Jordan, and called it Caesarea; he repaired also the Borough of Bethsaida, near unto the Lake of Genesareth, and gave it the dignity of a City, both for the number of the Inhabitants, as for other pre-eminences, and called it Julia, by Caesar's Wives name. As for Coponius the Governour in Judaea, who (as we have said) was sent with Cyrenius, in his time there happened that which followeth. At the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which we call Pascha, the custom was that the Priests opened the Temple Gates about midnight, at which time certain Samaritans, who secretly entred into Jerusalem, as soon as the Gates were open, spread men's bones amidst the Porches, and over all the Temple; whereby it came to pass, that the Priests began to keep a more diligent watch, than they had done before.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambivius succeeded him in the Government. In his time Salome, King Herod's Sister, departing out of this life, bequeathed unto Julia the City of Jamnia, and all the Lands and Countrey round about; she gave her also Phaselis, situate on the Plain; and Archelaus, where there are divers Date Trees, bearing most excellent fruit. After Ambivius, Annus Rufus had the Command, in whose time died Augustus Caesar, the second Roman Emperor, after he had reigned fifty seven years, six months and two days; and had Antonius his Co-partner in the Monarchy for the space of fourteen years. He lived in the whole seventy seven years.

After Caesar succeeded Tiberius Nero, the Son of Julia his Wife, who was the third Roman Emperor. He it was that sent the fifth Governour into Judaea, whose name was Valerius Gratus, who succeeded Annus Rufus. This Gratus deposed Ananus, and appointed Ismael the Son of Fabius High Priest; and after his decease (for he lived but a little while after) Eleazar the Son of Ananus was made High Priest. A year after, this Eleazar was also deposed, and the Priesthood was given to Simon the Son of Camithus; who continuing in this dignity for a year's space and no longer, Joseph called Caiaphas succeeded him. After Gratus had behaved himself thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Judaea for the space of eleven years. After him came Pontius Pilate, and succeeded him in the Government. But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius's Friendship, builded a City in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfulest part of Galilee, hard by the Lake Genesareth, and near unto the natural Baths in the Borough called Emmanus. This City was peopled by strangers, who resorted thither from all parts, and by divers of the Countreys of Galilee; some of which were constrained to inhabit the same. Some of those likewise, who were in authority repaired thither; and from all Countreys, many flocked thither, who were not all assuredly held to be Free-men; all which he made free, and gave them great gifts, on that condition, that they should not abandon the City. To some of them he gave houses already builded, to others Lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the inhabiting of such a place was contrary to the Laws and Customs of his Countrey, and the Ordinances of the Jews; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of Sepulchres; and our Law saith, he that converteth in those places, is held unclean and defiled for the space of seven days.

At that very time Phraates King of Parthia died, being treacherously killed by his Son Phraates, for this cause: After that Phraates had begotten many lawful Children, he took an Italian woman to be his Concubine, called Thermusa; whom with other

Presents

A Presents Julius Caesar had sent unto him. After he had begotten on her his Son Phraates, he was so much befot with her beauty, that he took her to his Wife, and held her in high esteem. She that might persuade him unto all that the pleased, enforced her self to the uttermost, to make her Son King of Parthia; and seeing that the might not attain thereunto, except he first found out the means to deliver her self of Phraates's lawful Children, the persuaded him to send them Hostages to Rome. In a word, they were presently sent away, because Phraates had not the power to contradict Thermusa's Will, and only Phraates was brought up in State Affairs; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he should expect the Kingdom till his Father was dead, conspired against him by the instigation and furtherance of his Mother, with whom (as it was thought) he committed Incest. In effect, being equally attainted of those two enormous Crimes, both for the murder of his Father, and Incest committed with his Mother, he was generally hated by his Subjects, who rebelled against him before he was setled in his Kingdom. By this means his Fortune was overthrown, and he died. The Noble men among the Parthians, perceiving that it was impossible for them to maintain their State without a King, and that their King ought lineally to be descended of the Race of the Arsacians (because by custom they might not chuse any out of another stock) and supposing that their Ordinances had too much already been broken, and that it would redound to their great dishonour, if the Kingdom should be continued in the hands of such a man, who was descended from an Italian Concubine, they sent Ambassadors to require Herod to come and be their King; who otherwise was hated of all the people, and accused of extreme cruelty: In a word, he was an unfociable man, and extremely choleric, notwithstanding he was of the Blood of the Arsacides; they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a Banquet made at a certain Sacrifice (for the custom of the Parthians was, that every one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was killed when he was hunting. For this cause they sent Ambassadors to Rome, requiring that one of those that were Hostages there might be their King; and one Vonones was sent unto them, who was preferred above all his Brethren. For he seemed to be capable of that high Degree of honour, as to command two of the greatest Sovereignities that were under the Sun; the one of his own Nation, the other of a Foreign Dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature inconstant, and most insolent, shortly after repented themselves; for they didained to execute the Command of a Slave (for so called they a Pledg) saying, that the Parthians had not a King given them by right of War, but that which was the greatest abuse that could befall them, by an injury offered them in the time of a shameful Peace. For which cause they speedily sent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the Race of the Arsacides. To this request of theirs he willingly condescended, and came unto them with his Army, and Vonones marched forward against him. At the first encounter, although the common fort among the Parthians favoured Artabanus, yet he was overcome, and fled to the Mountains of Media. But not long after, having assembled a greater Army, he once more set upon Vonones, and defeated him; at which time Vonones retired himself with some Horse-men of his, into Seleucia. But Artabanus having made a great slaughter of those that fled, and wholly abashed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired to the City of Ctesiphon, with those people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arrived in Armenia, and at the first, fought to make himself King over that Nation, sending to this effect certain Ambassadors to Rome; but Tiberius repulsed his suit in respect of his Cowardice; but the rather because Artabanus, by an express Embassage, had threatened him with War. For those of the greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the Flood Niphates) maintained Artabanus's Title; and Vonones, destitute of all hope to obtain the Kingdom, yielded himself to Syllanus, who was Governour of Syria; and in regard that he had been brought up at Rome, he was kept in Syria; and Artabanus gave Armenia to Ordes, one of his Sons. Antiochus King of the Comagenes died also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the Commons and the Nobility; so that both parties sent their Ambassadors to Rome. The Nobles demanded that the Kingdom might be reduced into divers Provinces; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a King, as they had been accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affairs of the East, Fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, when he arrived in the East, and orderly disposed all things he was poisoned by Piso, whereof he died; as is declared in another place.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sorely troubled the Jews; and in the Temple of Isis at Rome, there were many shameful acts committed. But I will first of all relate the accident in the Temple of Isis; and then I declare that which befell the Jews. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowned both for the Nobility of her house, as also through her study and exercise of Virtue. Besides this, she was very rich, and with her Riches beautiful, and in her flourishing years; and notwithstanding, a very Mirrour of chastity. She was married to a certain Noble man called Saturnine, that equalled her in all those her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the Knights of greatest account at that time, fell in love with her. But he was of that disposition, that it was impossible for him to corrupt her by Presents; and the more she refused those infinite Presents which he sent unto her, the more was Mundus's heart enflamed with ardent affection; so that to enjoy her but one only night, he offered her two hundred thousand Drachmes,

A Drachmes, amounting in our English money to some six thousand pound; yet, for all this, he could not overcome her. For which cause, being unable to endure this violent passion, he thought best to pine himself away for want of food, thereby to deliver himself from the Tyranny of that Passion, wherewith he was afflicted. But there was a certain Free-woman that belonged to Mundus's Father, whose name was Ida, expert in all sorts of subtilties; who being sore grieved to behold the young man's resolution, whom she saw wholly addicted to a desperate death; she addressed her self unto him, and encouraged him with hope; promising him to bring him to Paulina's speech, by the means of a certain Bribe which she intended to offer. He rejoicing very much at her motion, demanded what sum should serve her: who, requiring nothing more than fifty thousand Drachmes, to obtain Paulina; he furnished her presently. When by this means she had quickened the young man's spirit, and received all that which she demanded, she steered not the same course which others had kept, that had the solicitation of the matter before, seeing the law that money would not tempt her; but knowing that she was deeply devoted to the service of Isis, she practised this subtil and unexpected policy. She addressed her self to certain Priests of the Temple; and upon great hopes, and offer of great Presents, and paying them down at present twenty and five thousand Drachmes, and promising them as much more upon the performance of the bargain; she disclosed unto them the passionate love which the young man bare unto Paulina, exhorting them to work so wisely that he might enjoy her. They bewitched with this huge Present they had, and hoped to receive, promised her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldest among them resorted to Paulina; and having free access unto her presence, he required that he might have conference with her in secret; which when he had obtained, he told her that he was sent unto her by God Anubis, in that the God was surprised with her love, and desired that she would come unto him. Paulina took great pleasure in this his discourse, and told her Familiars how she had been honoured with the amorous solicitation of a God, and certified her Husband, how God Anubis would lie with her: Whereunto he consented, knowing how great his Wife's chastity was. She therefore repaired to the Temple; and after the had rest, and the time was come wherein she was usually accustomed to lay her down to rest, and the Gates were locked up by the Priests that were within, and the lights likewise were taken away; Mundus, who lay hid within, failed not to accost her: who, thinking that it was God Anubis, satisfied his desires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the Priests, who were privy to this Treachery, were stirring, he retired himself: Paulina also, early in the morning repaired to her Husband, and acquainted him how Anubis appeared unto her; and boasting among her Familiars, what conference he had used with her: But some of them believed her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the rest were altogether amazed, supposing those things to be no ways incredible, when they bethought themselves of the Ladies chastity. Some three days after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, said unto her: You have saved me two hundred thousand Drachmes, wherewith you might have augmented your Treasure; and this notwithstanding, you have not failed to satisfy my request: Neither am I grieved that you have contemned me under the name of Mundus; since that undertaking Anubis's name, I have accomplished my desire; and this said, he departed. But she, presently amazed with the man's audacious impudence, tore her Garments; and having told her Husband of all this subtil circumvention, she requested earnestly his assistance, and that he would not forsake her in the prosecution of her revenge; who presently acquainted the Emperor with every particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently understood how all things had happened, by the inquiry and examination of the Priests, he condemned them and Ida, who had been the inventor and comploter of this Treason against Paulina, to be hanged: He pulled down the Temple also, and cast Anubis's Statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus; supposing that he ought not to be more grievously punished, considering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreme love: Behold here the infolence committed in the Temple of Isis, by the Priests that appertained to that Temple. Now I intend to declare that which happened to the Jews that were at that time in Rome, according as both purposed and promised.

Tiberius causeth all the Jews to be banished from Rome. Pilate punisheth the Samaritans, for having drawn themselves together in Arms: They accuse him to Vitellius Governour of Syria, who sends him to Rome to clear himself.

There was a certain Jew, that having been accused for the breach of the Laws of his Country, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being a man of a most mischievous behaviour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himself to be an expounder of Moses's Law; and drawing to him three other, or less Reprobates than himself, he followed his ordinary Profession. Fulvia, a Lady of much honour, became their Scholar, and had embraced the Religion of the Jews; whom they had persuaded to send certain Purple and Gold to the Temple of Jerusalem; which after they had received, they converted it to their own uses; which, when Tiberius knew, he commanded all the Jews to be thrust out of Rome.

The Samaritans assembled at Tirathaba, to ascend the Mountain Gerasinus; Pilate's charge, and overcame them, and put them to flight.

The year of the World, 3999, after Christ's Nativity, 17.

Neither was the Nation of the Samaritans exempt from this trouble: for a certain subtil Companion, who sought by all the means he might, to encroach upon the peoples favour, persuaded them to withdraw themselves with him to the Mount Gerasinus (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their Mountains) in which place, he promised he would then them the Sacred Vessels buried in a certain place, where Moses had laid them: And at that time they being gathered together in Arms, by his persuasion, encamped themselves in a Borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither, to joyne themselves with them, to the end, they might ascend the Mountain with the greater Company: But Pilate prevented them, and got up before them with Horse and Foot; who, charging those that were assembled in the Borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them Prisoners with him: Pilate executed the chiefeft Ring leaders amongst them. The tumult of these Jews being published abroad, and their misfortune made known, the Senate of Samarita addressed themselves to Vitellius, who had been Consul, and who at that time governed Syria; before whom they accused Pilate, for the murder of those whom he had killed, saying, that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebel against the Romans, but to secure themselves against Pilate's Tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Marcus his Friend to take charge of Judea, commanding Pilate to return to Rome, and to satisfy the Emperour of those things whereof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had remained ten years in Jewry, repaired to Rome, having no means to contradict that Command that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was dead.

As soon as Vitellius came into Judea, he went up to Jerusalem, and celebrated there the Feast of the Passover; and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the Citizens all the Tribute of those Fruits which were sold. He delivered them also the Ornaments of the High Priests, with all the rest of the Priestly Furniture within the Temple, committing the charge thereof unto the Priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were

A were laid up in the Castle of Antonia, for this cause which followeth: Hircanus the High Priest, the first of that name, having builded a Tower near unto the Temple, did for the most part make his Residence therein, and there kept his Vestments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he only had the Authority to put them on, and return them into their place at such time as he came down into the City, and put on his accustomed Raiment. His Successors did the same, till Herod being exalted to the Kingdom; and seeing this Tower to be strongly situated, builded the same most magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony his great friend. And having found these Vestments in the place, he retained them with him, assuring himself, the people would attempt nothing against him. Archelaus his Son, and Successor in the Kingdom, kept the same course that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the Sovereignty thereof, they kept the High Priest's Ornaments in their hands, and reserved them in a place builded for that purpose, under the Seal of the Priests; and the Governour of those that kept the Sacred Treasure, lighted the Lamp every day in that place: Every seventh day before the Feast, the Governour delivered them into the High Priest's hands; and after they were purified, he put them on to do Divine Service, and the next day after the Feast he returned them again to the same place where they were kept before; which custom was observed thrice every year, in the time of a Fast. But Vitellius returned those Ornaments into the hands of the Priests, according to the ancient Orders; leaving them to be used when need required; commanding the Governour, to trouble himself no more about the place where they should be kept. After he had done this favour to the Nation of the Jews, he deposed the High Priest, Joseph, surnamed Caiphas, and advanced Jonathan, the Son of Ananus, to that Dignity, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

At that time he received Letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a Friendship with Artabanus, the King of the Parthians (whose hatred he suspected and feared, left, seizing on Armenia, he should work farther mischief against the State of Rome) desiring him to assure the League by Hostages, and namely, with Artabanus's Son. After Tiberius had written these Letters above mentioned unto Vitellius, he persuaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great store of money, that with all expedition they should make War against Artabanus: But the Iberians would not be drawn thereunto; yet they suffered the Alanes to march thorough their Country, and opened them their Gates of the Mount Capinus, to give them passage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the Country of the Parthians was invaded, whereby the chiefeft among them were killed. The King's Son also was killed in those Conflicts, with divers Thousands of his Army. Moreover, Vitellius having sent money to a Kinsman and Friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him, to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiving the Plot that was intended against him; and seeing that he could not escape, because it was attempted by a great number of the best accounted Nobles within his Court, ceased to pass any further: And seeing himself most apparently envired, and thinking that under the colour of Friendship, he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himself into the Provinces of the higher Country, and there to save himself, rather than to put himself in hazard, and resort unto them who had already betrayed and forsaken him. Arriving in that place he assembled a great number of Soldiers of the Countreys of Danes and Swedes; and having fought against them who had opposed themselves against him, he recovered his Kingdom. When Tiberius had tidings hereof, he endeavoured to draw Artabanus into Friendship with him; which when Artabanus had notice of, he willingly admitted; so that Artabanus and Vitellius met together near Emphrates, and, by the means of a Bridge that was builded upon the River, they debated the matter together; being each of them attended by their Guards. After that they had concluded the Peace, Herod the Tetrarch feasted them in a very magnificent Pavilion, erected in the midst of the River, with great cost. And not long after, Vitellius sent Darius, Artabanus's Son, in Hostage to Rome, with divers Presents, amongst which there was a man seven Cubits high, a Jew born, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Giant, by reason of his stature. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herod, desirous to be the first that should advertise Cesar of the receipt of these Hostages, sent an express with Letters, by which he fully satisfied him of all that which had happened, omitting nothing for the Consul to acquaint him; so that after Vitellius's Letters were brought unto him, and that Cesar had already assured him of the true information that Herod had given him, Vitellius was much troubled: and suspecting, lest he had received a greater injury, than the matter made shew for; he conceived in his heart

At that time also Philip, Herod's Brother died, in the twentieth year of Tiberius's Reign, after he had reigned himself for the space of seven and thirty years, in Trachonitis, Gaulanitis and Bathanea. During all the time of his Government, he behaved himself very peaceably; for he made his abode within his own Dominion. He walked, being accompanied with a small number of his chosen servants, and had that seat carried after him, wherein he was accustomed to sit and do justice; to the end, that if any one presented himself, and required his assistance, he might, without delay, do him right. For upon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part wherein the Plaintiff met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absolving the innocent. He died in Julia, and was buried in the Sepulchre which he himself had caused to be built; and his Obsequies were performed with great Solemnity and Majesty. And for that he left no Heirs Males behind him,

Tiberius seized on his Estate, which he united to the Government of Syria; ordaining that the Tributes that were gained in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same Countrey.

Marianne, Olympias's Daughter, who was Herod the Great his Daughter, and of Joseph, Herod's Brother; by her he had his Son Aristobolus; Aristobolus, Agrippa's third Brother married Jotape, the Daughter of Samsegeram, King of the Emefeniens; They had a Daughter which likewise was called Jotape, which was deaf. These were the Children begotten by Herod's three Sons. But Herodias their Sister married Herod, the Son of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Marianne, the Daughter of Simon the High Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias, in contempt of the Laws of the Country, married herself with Herod, her Husband's Brother, begotten of the same Father, being separated from him during his life time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His Daughter Salome was married to Philip, the Tetrarch of Trachonitis, Herod's Son: Who dying without Children, Aristobolus married her, who was Herod's Son, and Agrippa's Brother: They had three Sons, Herod, Agrippa and Aristobolus. See here the Posterity of Phasaelus and Salampson. Antipater, by Cypros, had a Daughter that likewise was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius, the Son of Alexas; of whom he begat a Daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipater's Brothers, they died without Issue. Alexander, Herod's Son, who was killed by his Father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the Daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia: Tigranes being King of Armenia, died without Issue, after he had been acculed at Rome: Alexander had a Son called Tigranes, after his Brother's name, who was sent by Nero, to reign in Armenia, who had a Son called Alexander, who married Jotape, the Daughter of Antiochus, King of Comagena: This Alexander, by Vespasian, was elected King in Lefis, a City of Cilicia. As soon as Alexander's Posterity began to multiply, they fell from their Country-Religion, to follow the customs of the Greeks. All the rest of King Herod's Daughters died without Issue. Having after this manner reckoned up Herod's Posterity, which continued until such time that Agrippa the Great began to reign: It remaineth at this time to declare what adventures befel this Agrippa; and how he escaping his dangers, obtained at last so great Power and Dignity.

CHAP. VIII.

By what several Accidents of Fortune, Agrippa, surnamed the Great, who was Aristobolus's Son, and Herod the Great's Grand-child and Marianne's, was made King of the Jews by the Emperor Caius Caligula, as soon as he had succeeded Tiberius.

Some little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa was gone to Rome; where he came very well acquainted with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperor's Son; and was beloved of Antonia, the Wife of Drusus the Elder, by the means of his Mother Bernice, whom Antonia held in great esteem, and to whom he had recommended her Son. And whereas by nature he was of a liberal and generous spirit, as long as his Mother lived, he would not discover his inclination, lest he should provoke her displeasure against him. But immediately after Bernice was dead, and he became his own Master, partly by his daily and bountiful entertainment and living, partly by his immoderate Liberalities, but especially by his lavish Prodigality towards Caesar's Free men, whose favour he hunted after, he was brought into extreme Poverty, and could no more live at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius having lost his Son, forbade his friends to come into his sight, lest their presence should refresh and encrease the sorrow he conceived for the loss of his Son. For these causes he returned back into Judaea, having but badly ordered his Affairs, spent his money, and left himself no means to satisfy his importunate and many Creditors: For which cause, uncertain how to dispose of himself, and ashamed of his present estate, he withdrew himself into a Castle called Malatha in Idumaea, to pass away obscurely and miserably the rest of his time. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his Wife perceived, the endeavoured by all means to prevent his resolution: She wrote to Herodias his Sister, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, acquainted her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessity he was enforced thereto; and she exhorted her, that in regard of affinity she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieved his misery, although her Fortunes were far weaker than hers. Being therefore sent for by his Sister and Wife, he was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certain Summ of Money assigned him for his maintenance; and for his greater honour, was appointed Magistrate of that City. Yet Herod did not continue long time in that mind, although by the means

A means he had given him, he had not satisfied his Kinman's necessities. For being in the City of Tyre in a certain company, where he drank immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreme injury, that Herod had upbraided him with his poverty, and hit him in the teeth, that he maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himself to Flaccus, who had been sometimes Consul at Rome, and for the present was President of Syria, with whom he had been very familiar at Rome: Flaccus received him very kindly, and had also done the like a good while before to Aristobolus, Agrippa's Brother, who were both at variance between themselves; yet, notwithstanding this Difference between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equal favour. But Aristobolus remitted nothing of his hatred he bare his Brother, and never rested till he had drawn Flaccus into dislike with his Brother, upon this occasion: The Inhabitants of Damascus, contending with the Sidonians about their limits, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus; knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their Cause, promising him a great Summ of money: whereupon he addressed himself in what he could, to further those of Damascus. But Aristobolus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, accused his Brother to Flaccus; and after enquiry was made, and he found guilty of the Fact, Agrippa grew out of the President's favour; and falling again into extreme poverty, he came to Ptolemais; and having no way to subsist, he resolved to go into Italy. And seeing he wanted Money, he commanded Marjfas his Free-man, that by all means whatsoever, he should seek to take up Money upon Interest. He spake unto Protus (who was Agrippa's Mother's Free-man, who, by the Testament of his deceased Mitres, was left unto Antonia's protection) that upon his Master's Bill and Promise, he would lend him some Money. But he alleging that Agrippa before that time owed him money, extorted from Marjfas a Bill of his hand for twenty thousand Attick Drachmes; deducting out of that Summ two thousand and five hundred, which Marjfas took for himself; which he might the more easily do, for that Agrippa could not otherwise chuse. Having therefore received this money, he went to Antbedon, where getting Shipping, he prepared himself for the journey.

But when Herennius Capito, who was Treasurer of Jamnia, understood of his being there, he sent his Souldiers to him, to exact three hundred thousand silver Drachmes at his hands, for which he stood indebted to Caesar's Treasurer, during his being at Rome; by which means he was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demand; and as soon as it was night, he caused the Cables of the Ship to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to Alexandria; there he requested Alexander Alabarcha, to lend him two hundred thousand Drachmes in Silver; he protested that he would trust him with nothing: But admiring Cypros, his Wife's constant love toward her Husband, and her many other Virtues; he, upon her promise, condescended to do him a kindness: Whereupon, in present money he paid him five Talents in Alexandria, and promised to deliver him the rest of the money at Puteol, leaving Agrippa's unthriftiness. Thus Cypros having furnished her Husband for his Journey into Italy, returned her self and her Children into Judaea by Land. But Agrippa, as soon as he arrived at Puteol, wrote unto Tiberius Caesar, who lived in Capreae, signifying unto him that he came to do his duty; beseeching him that he would grant him free and favourable access. Tiberius, with all expedition, returned him a very kind answer; assuring him, that he would be very glad to see him safely arrived in Capreae. In a word, as soon as he was arrived, Caesar expressed and made it known, that his affection was answerable to his Letters; and both embraced him, and lodged him. The next day Caesar received Letters from Herennius Capito, who advertised him that Agrippa owed three hundred thousand Drachmes of Silver, which he borrowed, and paid not at the time prefixed; and that when the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the Country, and by this occasion he had deprived him of the means to constrain him to make satisfaction. When Caesar had read these Letters, he was highly displeased, and commanded those of his Chamber that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, until such time as he had discharged that debt.

But he, nothing daunted at Caesar's displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius's Mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the sum of three hundred thousand Drachmes, to the end he might not lose Caesar's friendship. Who remembering her Bernice, Agrippa's Mother, and with what familiarity they had conversed together, and how Agrippa likewise had been brought up with Claudius her Son, lent him that money: Whereupon, he paying the debt, without any contradiction, enjoyed the Princes favour; and was so reconciled to Caesar, that he committed his Nephew to Agrippa's charge; commanding him to attend him always, whithersoever he went.

Being

Being by this benefit bound and tied to Antonia, he began to reverence her Nephew H Caius, who was gracious in all men's eyes, and honoured in memory of his Parents. At that time by chance there was one Alimus a Samaritan, Cesar's Free-man, of whom he borrowed ten hundred thousand Drachmes of Silver; and paid Antonia her due, and kept the rest, the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with most inward familiarity, it happened one day, that riding in the same Coach with him, Agrippa wilbt (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might shortly surrender the Kingdom and Empire unto Caius, who was each way more worthy than he. These words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippa's Free-man, who for the time, spake not a word thereof. But being afterwards accused for stealing Agrippa's garment (as he indeed had done) and brought back again, after he had fled away to Piso (who was the Governour of the City) he asked him why he fled; who answered, that he had certain secrets which he desired to reveal unto Cesar, that appertained to his profit and safety; for which cause he was sent by him in Bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory manner, wherein no King or Tyrant ever equalled him, held him Prisoner. For neither did he presently admit any Ambassadors, neither sent he Successors to those, who were Governours of his Provinces, when the former were dead; and was no less negligent in yielding audience to his Prisoners. But when his friends at any time questioned him, why he used these accustomed delays; he answered them, that he deferred the Ambassadors after that manner, lest, if he should suddenly dispatch them, they should instantly return with new, whereby it should come to pass, that he should be continually troubled in entertaining and dismissing them.

And as for his Offices, he left them in their hands to whom he had committed them, in regard of his Subjects welfare. For naturally all Magistracy is subject to Avarice; but especially strangers induce those who exercise the same, to gather and ingross the more eagerly, when as the time of their Authority is short, and of small assurance; whereas, if they should continue in the same for a long time, in regard of the gain they had made, and the much profit they had raised, they would be afterwards less greedy to extort further. Now, if he should send others to succeed them on a sudden, it were impossible for him to content them, notwithstanding their many Bribes: whereas, in giving them time to fill their purses, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious desire of Lucre which they affected before. And to this purpose, he told them an example of a poor man that was a Lazar, to whose wounds a great number of Flies assembled themselves, and covered the same; at sight whereof, some by fortune arriving there, and having compassion of his misery, and supposing that the cause why he repulsed them not, proceeded from his disability, approached near to help him, but he prayed them to let him alone. Whereupon, they demanding the cause wherefore he that was hurt, refused to be delivered from so irksome an evil; he answered them, for that they should do him more wrong, if those flies were driven away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not, (said he) neither suck me so earnestly, but give me some ease, whereas if new should light on my wound which were hungry, and should seize my flesh in that desperate estate that I am, they would procure my death.
 For these causes he said; that seeing his Subjects already consumed by so many exactions, he thought it a good policy in him, and a better provision for them, not to send them new Governours continually, who might, after the manner of flies, suck them to the quick; especially, if to their innate covetousness, he should add the fear of their sudden displacing. Now, to prove that to be true, which I have declared of Tiberius's disposition, this action of his may suffice to justify me: For having been Emperor for the space of twenty two years, all those Governours which he sent into Jewry were two, namely Gratus, and Pilat his Successor; neither carried he himself otherwise towards the rest of his Subjects of the Empire.

And as for his Prisoners, the reason why he delayed so much to give them Audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, should not speedily be delivered from those torments, wherewith he threatened them, and which they had deserved by their wickedness. For whilst he kept them in that pain, their misery en-creased the more. For this cause Eutychus could not obtain Audience at his hands, but was a long time detained Prisoner. Afterwards, in process of time, Tiberius transported himself from Capreas, to Tyrculanum, which was distant from Rome some hundred Furlongs: There did Agrippa sollicite Antonia, to cause Eutychus to be called to his answer, concerning the accusation which he pretended against him. Now, Antonia was in great favour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that she was Drusus's Wife, who was Tiberius's Brother) as in respect of her

A her Modesty. For she being young, continued in her Widowhood, and would not Marry with any other, notwithstanding Augustus importuned her to wed; but lived always in honour, without blame. Besides that, she had done Tiberius a great pleasure; for at such time as Sejanus his Friend, and a man of great account in those days (by reason he had the Government of the Army) practised a Conspiracy against him;
 whereunto divers of the Senate, and of his Free-men, and of his Souldiers likewise, were accessory: yet, she brought all their intents to nothing. This Attempt had taken a great head, and Sejanus had finished his purpose, had not Antonia used more ad-vided courage, than Sejanus did in executing his Treason. For having discovered the danger that threatened Tiberius, she wrote, and sent her express Letters by Pallas, one of her trusty Servants, unto him to Capreas, to assure him in particular of the whole Convivance of the Conspiracy. Cesar having true understanding thereof, caused Sejanus and his Confederates to be executed. Therefore, though before that time he honoured Antonia greatly, yet he did afterwards honour her far more, so that he trusted her in all things. When therefore, he entreated him to give Eutychus Audience; Tiberius answered, If, said he, Eutychus hath falsly objected any thing against Agrippa, it sufficeth that he endure that Punishment that I have enjoined him: But if in the Torture he maintain that which he hath spoken to be true, it is to be feared lest Agrippa, intending to punish his Free-man, do rather heap the Punishment upon his own head. When Antonia had reported this answer of his to Agrippa, he did the more instantly sollicite her, requiring her to use her, Antonia took the occasion, which was this: Tiberius being after Dinner time carried in his Litter, and having Caius and Agrippa before him, the walking by the Litter, besought him to call Eutychus to his Tryal: Whereunto he replied; The Gods (said he) know, that that which I do, I do it not of mine own will, but for the necessity I am pressed upon upon your request: And having spoken thus, he commanded Macron, Sejanus's Successor, to bring Eutychus before him; which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to say against him, who had made a Free-man of him? My Sovereign (said he) Caius that is here present, and Agrippa rode one day together in the same Coach, and I sat at their feet; after divers discourses D held between them, Agrippa began to speak after this manner unto Caius; O, said he, would God the day were come, wherein the old man, departing out of this world, would make you Governour thereof: For his Son Tiberius would be no hindrance unto you, for you might dispatch him: Then should the World be happy, and I likewise have my share in the Felicity. Tiberius esteeming this his Accusation to be true, and having of long time conceived a grudge against Agrippa, for that notwithstanding he had commanded him regard to his Commandment, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted unto Caius. For which cause he said to Macron, bind me this fellow. He scarcely understanding that which he spake, and no ways suspecting that he should give that Command against Agrippa, deferred the performance, until such time as he might more exactly understand his mind. When therefore Cesar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance, met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (said he) Macron, whom I have commanded to be bound: And demanding of him once more, of whom he spake; It is Agrippa, said he. Then had Agrippa recourse to submissive and humble Prayers, refreshing the memory of his Son, with whom he had been brought up; alledging the education he had used towards his Nephew Tiberius: but he prevailed nothing, but was led away bound in those Purple Ornaments which he then wore.

At that time it was very hot weather, and he was extremely thirsty: Whereupon, epying Thaumastus one of Caius's Servants, who carried Water in a Pitcher, he required him to give him drink; which, when he had willingly bestowed on him, he drank, and afterwards said unto him, This service thou hast done me in giving me drink, shall do thee good one day: For as soon as I escape out of these Bonds, it shall not be long before I obtain thy liberty at Caius's hands, for that thou hast not neglected to do me service in this my Imprisonment, more than whilst I was in my Prosperity. Neither deceived he the man's expectation of his promise, but rewarded and gratified him: For afterwards, when he had obtained the Kingdom, he begged Thaumastus's liberty at Caius's hands, and made him his Steward; and after his decease, he gave order that he should serve in the same place, with his Son Agrippa, and his Daughter Bernice; so that he died very old, and much honoured. But this happened afterward. But at that time Agrippa stood before the place bound with other Companions, who likewise were in Bonds; and through the grief he conceived, he leaned against a certain Tree, on which there sat an Owl.
 One of those Prisoners, who was by Nation a German, beholding that Bird, said likewise will breed thee more sorrow, than if thou hadst never heard of them. But I have thought it good, yea, although it were with mine own danger, to declare unto thee the Predictions of the Gods. It cannot otherwise be, but that shortly thou shalt be delivered from these Bonds, and shalt be advanced to great honour and power; so that those, who at this day have com- pasion on thy Calamity, shall envy thy Glory; and thou shalt depart this life in great felici- ty, and shalt leave thy Children mighty Possessors. But bear this in thy remembrance, that when thou shalt see this Bird once more, thou must needs die within five days after. These are those things which the Gods think meet to foretell thee by this Bird. As for my self, I have supposed I should do thee wrong, if I should conceal this Prediction from thee, hav- ing the fore-knowledge thereof. I have therefore thought good to impart this joy unto thee; whereby, thorough hope of thy future profits, thou mayst more easily endure thy present mis- fortune: for which cause I beseech thee, that as soon as thou shalt be partaker of this thy fel- icity, thou wilt endeavour thy self to deliver us also from these Adversities.

This Preface of the German's seemed as ridiculous to Agrippa, as admirable afterwards. But Antonia being fore-grieved at the young man's Calamity, thought it not only a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but altogether unprofitable, in regard she should be repulsed; yet, she prevailed so much with Macron, that he was committed to the custody of such Souldiers, who were of a more mild behaviour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that suffered him to use his daily Bathings, and gave his Friends and Servants leave to visit him, by whose service and kindnels, his necessities might be relieved. His Friend Silas also, was admitted to speak with him; and amongst his Free-men, Marcius and Stichus, who brought him in such meats as he was delighted withal, and Coverings under colour to sell them; which, by the permission of the Souldiers, who had no less direction from Macron, they spread by night for him to take his rest upon. See here the estate wherein Agrippa lived in Prison for the space of six Months. But Tiberius being returned to Capreas, began at first to be attainted with a certain lingering disease; and for that his Sickness encreased more and more, he began to conceive a sinister hope of himself; and commanded Euodius, whom he most honoured amongst all his Free-men, to bring him his Sons, because he intended to talk with them before he died. But the truth is, that he had not any Children of his own, but had adopted them: For Drusus, who was his only Child, was already dead, and had left behind him a Son called Tiberius, surnamed Gemellus. He had Caius also, his Brother Germanicus's Son; who was in the flower of his Age, and had been very well bred. To him also the people ascribed very much, in remembrance of the Virtue of his deceased Father; and as for himself, he was of a sweet conversation, and so modest, that he was familiar and affable to all men. Whereby it came to pass, not only the people, but the Senate also, held him in great estimation; as also all the Subjects in every several Province: For they that spake with him, were drawn, partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they saw in him; so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitedly lamenting his loss, but with unfeigned sorrow;
for that there was not any one, that supposed not his death to be every man's particular loss. He therefore demeaned himself so modestly towards all men, that his Son after his death, was highly advanced thereby: For, amongst the rest, the Souldiers made their reckoning, that although it should cost them their lives, to get him the Empire, they would not refuse the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Euodius, to bring him the two young men the next morrow, by break of day; he besought the Gods of that place, to give him an evident sign, whereby he might know who should succeed him: For although he desired to leave the Empire to his Grand-child, yet he made more account of that which God should

A should make manifest unto him. Therefore he conceived a preface, that he, who the next day should enter first to salute him, it should be he, who in the Empire should necessarily succeed him. And having fetted this thing in his fanie, he sent unto his little Son's Mafter, charging him to bring him unto him by break of day, supposing that God had ordained that the Empire should be his; but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, he commanded Euodius, that as soon as he could, in the morning, he should suffer him, of the two young Princes, to enter in unto him, who should arrive the first. He walking out, met with Caius before the Chamber door (for Tiberius was not there; who being ignorant of that which his Grand-father thought, was busie about his Breakfast) and said unto him, that the Emperor's Father called for him; and withal, suffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he suddenly began to consider the Power of God, who deprived him of the means to dispose of the Empire, according as he had determined with himself, for that it lay not in his power; and he lamented greatly, not so much for that he saw his design could not be brought to effect, as that his Son Tiberius was in danger of his life; seeing that in all appearance, Caius would be Master; who being so near a Relation, would prove the more dangerous to young Tiberius, because Sovereignty desired no sharer: And Caius would be always jealous, and never think himself sure, so long as young Tiberius was alive. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Astrological Predictions; so that the greater part of those things which he executed all his life time, was ordered thereby.

C He seeing Galba one day coming towards him, spoke this of him to his Familiars, He foretelleth Behold the man that shall be one day honoured with the Roman Empire. And amongst all the Emperours, he gave greatest credit to Divination, for that in certain things, he had found the Conjectures correspondent to truth. But at that time he was grievously disquieted by reason of the misfortune that had happened; yea, he was so grieved, as if his Grand-child had been already lost; and he blamed himself, because he had fought these Prefaces; for that he might have died, without falling into that dis-after, in being ignorant of that which was to come; whereas, now he should die in the knowledge of their misfortunes, whom he loved most entirely. Being thus troubled to see that the Sovereignty of the Empire should, contrary to his intention, fall into their hands, who by his will should not enjoy the same; although it were with hearts grief, and contrary to his will, yet he spake to Caius after this manner, which enfueth:
My Son, although Tiberius be more nearly allied unto me, than you are; yet, notwithstanding, both by mine own advice, as also by the will of the Immortal Gods, I commit unto

The Romans having intelligence of Tiberius's death, greatly rejoiced at the good news, yet they durst not assure themselves; and though they desired nothing more, yet they feared, lest the news should be false; and lest, if they shewed themselves too diligent in expressing their signs of joy, they should afterwards be accused for it, and lose their lives thereby. For Tiberius had done much mischief to the Noble Families in Rome, being of himself a choleric man, implacable towards all men without any occasion; having a natural inclination so cruel, that the easiest pain wherunto he adjudged those whom he condemned, was death. Notwithstanding therefore, that every man took pleasure to hear the news, yet did all conceal it, until such time as they might be more fully assured, through the fear of those miseries they foresaw, if the matter

matter should fall out otherways. But Marſias, Agrippa's Free-man, having certain H notice of Tiberius's death, ran ſpeedily to comfort his Maſter Agrippa, with theſe good news; and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a ſign unto him, Natvins, 30. and told him in the Hebrew Tongue, the Lyon was dead: Agrippa conceiving that which he meant, was raviſhed with joy, and ſaid unto him; I will requite thee for all thoſe benefits I have received at thy hands, and eſpecially for this good news, provided that I can prove true. The Centurion who had the keeping of Agrippa, conſidering what expedition Marſias had uſed in running, and the pleaſure that Agrippa had conceived in his report, he began to ſuſpect ſome alteration, and asked him what had happened; and whereas he delayed to give him an answer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainly what he had heard, in that he had grown already intimately familiar with him. The Centurion rejoiced at this news, as well as Agrippa, hoping to ſpeed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheer: But whilst they were in the miſt of their Banquetting, and drunk freely, there came one unto them, who told them that Tiberius was alive, and that within few days he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this news, for that he had committed a Capital crime in eating in the company of a Priſoner, upon the news of Cæſar's death, and by rejoicing with him; he drove Agrippa out of the place where he ſate, and reproachfully ſaid unto him; Thinkſt thou (ſaid he) that I know not how falſely thou ſpreadſt the rumour of Cæſar's death? yes, he aſſured thee ſhalt answer thy lie with the loſs of thy head. This ſaid, he cauſed Agrippa to be bound, whom before-time he had ſuffered to go at liberty; and ſhut him up in more cloſe Priſon, than he had been before: ſo that Agrippa was all that night long in this extrem miſery. The next day the rumour was ſpread thorough the whole City, that confirmed Tiberius's death; and at that time, every one boldly proteſted it: There were ſome alſo, who offered Sacrifices for this cauſe: And there came Letters alſo from Caius, which were addreſſed to the Senate, by which he aſſured them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He writ another alſo to Piſo, who had the Guard of the City, containing the like report; and beſides that, commanding him to transfer Agrippa from the company of thoſe Souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the ſame place where he was lodged before; ſo that from that time forwards, he grew confident. For although he was L as yet a Priſoner, yet lived he at his own diſcretion. Caius arriving in Rome, brought with him Tiberius's body, which he burned moſt magnificently, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey: And although he were willing to ſet Agrippa at liberty the ſame day, yet he was diſſwaded from it by Antonia; not for any ill will the bare the Priſoner, but in regard of Caius's honour; left thereby he ſhould ſhew himſelf to be glad of Tiberius's death, in ſetting him at liberty ſo ſpeedily, whom he had committed to Priſon. When, therefore, ſome few days were over, he ſent for him to his houſe, and cauſed his hair to be cut, and his garments changed; and that done, he ſet a Diamond upon his head, and made him King of Philip's Tetrarchy; to which he added Tyſanias's Tetrarchy; and changed his Chain of Iron, into a Chain of Gold of the ſame weight; and ſent Marullus into Judea, to govern there. The ſecond year of Caius's Reign, Agrippa asked leave to repair into Judea, to diſpoſe of his Kingdom, purpoſing to return again when he had diſpatched thoſe Affairs. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Judea, and was ſeen and ſaluted for a King, beyond all men's expectation; ſerving thereby for a moſt notable example unto men, to expreſs unto them how great the power of Deſtiny is in humane Affairs, conſidering the poor eſtate wherein he had been before, and the happineſs which he enjoyed at that time. Some termed him happy, in that he reſolutely followed his hopes; others could ſcarce- ly believe that he was thus advanced.

Herodias, Herod the Tetrarch's Wife, and King Agrippa's Siſter, being impatient to ſee her Brother reign in ſo much Proſperity, compels her Husband to go to Rome, to obtain a Crown alſo; but Agrippa having written to Caius againſt him, he baniſhed him and his Wife to Lions in France.

Herodias, Agrippa's Siſter, was married to Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee, and Perea: She envied her Brother to ſee him raiſed to ſo great Authority, and to far greater Dignity than her Husband enjoyed. For which cauſe ſhe was diſpleaſed, that her Brother, whoſe out of his Countrey, in that he wanted means to pay his debts, was returned

A turned in great Honour and State. This alteration ſeemed unſufferable to her, eſpecially to ſee him apparelled like a King, and environed with a great multitude of people, ſo that it was impoſſible for her to hide her grief; for which cauſe he incited her Husband, and perſwaded him to make a Voyage to Rome, and to purchaſe as much as he poſſeſſed. For, ſaid he, I cannot endure to live, if Agrippa, Ariſtobolus's Son, condemned to die by the ſentence of his own Father (ſo poor and indigent, that to redreſs his neceſſities wherewith he was daily preſſed by his Creditors, he was conſtrained at laſt to flee to Rome) ſhould return with ſuch Titles of Honour; and that her Husband, who was a King's Son, and was called to the Kingdom by his Father, ſhould live obſcure, and paſs his life like a private man: Husband (ſaid he) if heretofore it hath been no prejudice to thee, to live in leſſe Dignity than thy Father hath done; ſo now at, left, deſire that due honour which beſongeth to thy Family; neither think it ſufferable to be inferior to him, who in times paſt hath been maintained by thy Bounty: Neither ſuffer it to be thought (through thine own ſloth) that he in his neceſſity, had more induſtry to obtain an ample Fortune, than you amidſt your abundance; as if it redounded not to thy ſhame, to be thought inferior to him at this time, who not long ſince, except by thy pity, had no means to live. Let us therefore haſtily repair to Rome, and neither ſpare Gold, Silver, or any other expence, for that it availeth us not ſo much to keep the ſame, as to employ it in the purchaſe of a Kingdom. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he could, for he contented himſelf to live in quiet, and ſuſpected the Conſuſion that was at Rome; which he endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias: B But the more negligent he ſaw him, the more inſtantly he incited him to ſeek out for the Kingdom; and never gave over, until he had conformed him to her deſire; which he forced him to, rather than obtained. Having therefore furniſhed him with the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his Wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent, and the preparation they made, he beſtired himſelf too: And having notice that they were put to Sea, he ſent Fortunatus, one of his Free-men, to Rome, with Preſents to the Emperour, and Letters againſt Herod; with Commiſſion to acquaint Caius with every particular, according as the occaſion ſhould ſerve. He embarking himſelf after Herod, had a quick paſſage, and was only prevented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelf to Caius; for he preſently followed him, and delivered his Letters. For they arrived at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a Village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſome five Stades, adorned with moſt Royal and ſumptuous Palaces; for that every Emperour enforced himſelf to exceed the honour of his Predeceſſor, by reaſon of the hot Baths that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſerving both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whilst Caius talked with Herod, having viſited him firſt, he received Agrippa's Letters, containing Herod's Accuſations; for they accuſed him of a Conſpiracy plotted betwixt him and Sejanus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius's Empire: And how for the preſent he favoured Artabanus, King of the Parthians, to the prejudice of the Emperour Caius; of which the preparations Herod had ſtoled up in his Arcenals; gave evident teſtimony, which were ſufficient to arm ſeventy thouſand men. Caius was much moved with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him, touching his warlike preparation, was true: He unable to contradiſt the ſame in any thing, for fear he ſhould be convicted of falſhood: confeſſed no leſs. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the Accuſation of his revolt to be ſufficiently proved, deprived him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippa's Kingdom; beſtowing Herod's Subſtance alſo upon him. He baniſhed him likewise for ever, and confined him in the City of Lions, in France; and underſtanding that Herodias was Agrippa's Siſter, he gave her all that which in right appertained to her. And ſuppoſing that he would not willingly accompany her Husband in his calamity, he told her that he pardoned her for her Brother's ſake: But he gave himſelf this reply; Mighty Emperor, you ſpeak magnificently, and as it well becometh ſo great a Maſteſſy; but there is a cauſe that bindeth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I bear unto my Husband; whom if I ſhould forſake in his miſery, it would very ill beſeem me, in that I have been a partner with him in his felicity. Caius diſpleaſed with her reſolute answer, baniſhed her likewise with her Husband, and gave her Eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that envy which ſhe had conceived againſt her Brother, and plagued Herod, in that he had ſo eaſily liſtened to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius governed the Empire the firſt and ſecond year of his Reign with great applauſe, behaving himſelf graciously towards all men, whereby he obtained the good liking of the Romans, and the favour of all other Subjects: But in proceſs of time, the greatneſs of his Eſtate made him ſurpaſs the limits of humane condition, and challenge to himſelf the Title of Divinity, whereby he governed all things in contempt of God.

The Sedition of the Jews and Grecians, in the City of Alexandria.

The year of the World, 4002. after Christ's Nativity, &c.

Helio & Apion, chap. 17. alius, cap. 17. Apion, Prince of the Alexandrian Ambassadors, accuseth the Jews, because they attributed not Divinity to Caesar. Philo, Preface, for the Jews sit out, and can get no audience, and committed the cause to God.

Whereas there arose a Sedition betwixt the Jews and Grecians that inhabited Alexandria, three chosen Ambassadors on either side were sent unto Caius: One of these Ambassadors of Alexandria was Apion, who accused the Jews of many failings; and amongst other things, he alleged, that they made no account of honouring Caesar: And that, whereas all other Subjects of the Roman Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as a God; the Jews supposed it to be a dishonour for them to honour his Statues, or swear by his name. After that Apion had urged many things, and inveighed grievously against the Jews; hoping that Caius would be provoked against them, as in all likelihood and appearance it should have fallen out: Philo, the chiefest among the Ambassadors of the Jews, a man of great worth, and Brother to Alexander Alabarcha; being experienced in Philosophy, addressed himself to answer those Accusations which were urged against the Jews; but Caius commanded him silence, and willed him instantly to withdraw himself; and was so displeased, that it appeared very manifestly, that he intended some cruel revenge against them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had been grievously threatened, and spake thus unto the Jews that flocked about him; We must be of good courage, since Caius in words seemeth to be displeased with us, for in effect, he will arm God in our behalf, against himself.

C H A P. XI.

Caius commands Petronius Governour of Syria, to compel the Jews by force of Arms, to receive his Statue in the Temple; but Petronius mollified by their Prayers, writeth to Caius in the Jews behalf.

alius, chap. 17. Caesar sendeth Petronius into Syria, and commandeth him in spite of the Jews, to plant his Statue in God's Temple. The Jews repair to Ptolemais, beseeching him that he would not bring his Statue into the Holy City.

But Caius, being sore displeased that the Jews only despised his Ordinances, sent Petronius into Syria, to succeed Vitellius, charging him with a strong Army to invade Judea; and if they willingly admitted his Statue, that then he should place it in the Temple of God; but if they denied it, then, that overcoming them by force, he should compel them to condescend thereunto. As soon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured to satisfy Caesar's Command; and having assembled as great an Army as he could possibly levy, and leading forth with him two Legions of Roman Soldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending at Spring to invade Judea: All which he signified to Caesar by his Letters; who commending him for his industry, advised him to use all expedition therein, and to make War against those who should disobey his Commands. Mean while divers thousands of the Jews resorted to Petronius, who was quartered at Ptolemais; beseeching him not to constrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their Laws, or to transgress the Ordinances of their Fore-fathers. For if (said they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this Statue in our Temple, first deprive us of our lives, and afterwards do that which shall seem good in your eyes: For it is impossible for us, so long as our Souls remain within our Bodies, to permit that which is forbidden by our Laws; or to suffer such Impiety, in regard of that honour which we owe unto our Law-maker, and our Predecessors, who have ratified our Laws, to the intent we should encrease in Virtue. Petronius answered thus, If I were Emperor, or if the Emperor would be ruled by my advice, your reasons might prevail with me; but I am enforced to obey him, otherwise my Life and Fortune is at Stake. Hereunto the Jews answered; My Lord (said they) since you are resolved, not to transgress, by any means, the Commands and Contents of Caesar's Letters, neither will we any ways violate or infringe the Precept of our Law, under hope of Divine Assistance, and in imitation of the Virtue of our Ancestors: For we are not so faint-hearted, that for the hope of a vain and untimely desire of life, we should break the Laws which Almighty God hath proposed unto us, under the reward of Eternal Felicity: For which cause, we will endure all Fortunes whatsoever, so that our Country Law and Religion may remain inviolate; and we are ready to encounter any misfortune, under hope that God will assist us; for whose honour, we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, than by obeying thee through Cowardice, to incur perpetual Ignominy; and that which is more, God's wrath in neglect of his Laws, whose Authority, even in thine own judgment, is more to be regarded than Caius's Commission.

Petronius

Petronius conjecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to force them from their opinion; and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected, in the erection of his Statue, without great Blood-shed, whereby much murder and inconvenience might follow; he took some of his nearest and dearest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumspectly look into the Jews' Actions. They fearing some imminent danger through the Wars they expected from the Romans, and greater mischief through the breach of their Laws; assembled once more many thousands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias; beseeching him that he would not enforce them to that necessity, nor desile their Sacred City with forbidden Images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (said he) will you fight with Caesar, without regard, either of his ability, or your own weakness? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die, than depart from our Laws. Whereupon, prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to die. In these terms they continued for the space of forty days, neglecting their Husbandry, though that was the chiefest Seed-time: For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death, than to admit the Statue. Whilst the matter stood upon these terms, Aristobolus, Agrippa's Brother, and Eleazar, accompanied with divers of their Train, and some of the chiefest among the Jews came unto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacy of the people, neither give them occasion to draw them into desperate Actions; but rather, that he would write unto Caius, with what obstinacy the people refused the Dedication of his Image in the Temple: And how, giving over the care of their Husbandry, they prepared themselves for War, without any trust or confidence in their own strength; being rather resolved to die, than to suffer so great an indignity to be offered to their Religion. Besides, how giving over their Tillage, there was nothing to be expected but Robbery, whereas they should want means to pay their Customs; by which means, they hoped that Caesar would be moved to moderate his severity towards that Nation, and not to give them cause of Rebellion: And that if he might not be moved from the prosecution of the War, that then he might go forward with his business. This was the effect of Aristobolus's request.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their Prayers who instantly urged him, and the weightiness of the affair; partly in regard of the contentious resolution of the Jews, supposing that it was a matter unworthy a man, to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfy Caius's foolish ambition; and touched with the fear of God, and remorse of his own Conscience, he had rather to his own danger, inform the Emperor of the absurdity of the matter by his Letters, being no ways ignorant of his cholerick spirit, and forwardness in revenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he, that although it altered not his resolution, but haply enforced his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his Command; yet, that it was the duty of a good man, not to refuse an assured death, if so be it might save so guiltless and huge a multitude. When therefore, he had assembled the Jews together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) and disposed all those warlike Forces, that at that time gave attendance on him, round about him; he told the Jews first of all, not his own, but the Emperor's intent, who would shortly have them taste his displeasure, and enforce them to bear the burthen of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him: For himself, it necessarily concerned him, that since, by the Emperor's favour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrary to his Command. I hold it (said he) a matter most just to employ my life and honour for you, to the end, that so huge a number of men should not be drawn into the danger of death: And I will respect the excellency of the Laws of your Fathers, for which you think you ought to undergo a War and danger: neither is it lawful to suffer the Temple of God to be desiled by the Authority of Princes. I will therefore write to Caesar, and acquaint him with your minds, and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtain your Request. God (whose power surpasseth all industry and humane force) vouchsafe to conduct you, and make you constant in the observation of your Laws; and grant, that he, through excessive desire of humane glory, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius be displeased, and enforce his inevitable displeasure against me, I will undertake all danger, and endure all torments, both in body and spirit, to the end, that I may not behold so many virtuous men, as you are, perish in your good and just actions. Go therefore each of you, and ply your work, and till your Lands; I will send to Rome, and will employ both my Friends, and my self for you.

After he had spoken this, he dismissed the Assembly, praying the chiefest amongst them to encourage the Husbandmen to ply their business, and to confirm the rest of the people in their good hope; he himself also ceased not to encourage them. And truly God shewed his assistance to Petronius, and assisted him in all his affairs: For as soon as he had finished his discourse to the Jews, there suddenly fell a great rain beyond all humane expectation; for the day was very fair, neither was there any appearance of rain in the Air, and all that year long there was an extream Drought; so that men were past hope to have any moisture, notwithstanding, that sometime there appeared certain Clouds in the Heavens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance, and besides the expectation and opinion of men; the Jews conceived hope, that Petronius soliciting their cause, should not be repulled. But Petronius was more amazed than all the rest, seeing evidently that God undertook the affairs of the Jews, and gave them testimony of his manifest assistance; so that they that were their professed Adversaries, had no power to contradict them, as he himself wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end he should not draw for many thousand men into a desperate resolution and unhappy death; for without War it was impossible for him, ever to make them forsake their Religion. Moreover, that he would not cut off and lose the Revenue which he received of that Nation; and would not erect a Trophy of an everlasting Curse and Malediction against himself. Adding moreover, what the power of their God was; which he had so clearly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his merciful hand was over them. This is the Contents of Petronius's Letters.

The year of the World, 4002. after Christ's Nativity, &c. The Jews met Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him not to violate the Sacred City with his Images.

Aristobolus, King Agrippa's Brother, and Eleazar the High Priest, entreat Petronius in the Jews behalf.

Petronius promitteth the Jews to write unto Caius in their behalf, and exhorteth them to follow their Husbandry.

On the other side, King Agrippa, who at that time was at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius; having entertained him at a Banquet, wherein he was very desirous to exceed all others as well in sumptuousness, as in all other sorts of delights and pleasures; yea, he entertained him so nobly, that not only others, but also the Emperor himself, could not attain to such magnificence; so much he endeavoured to surpass all others, through the great desire he had to content and satisfy Caesar in all things. Caius was amazed at his courage and magnificence, seeing Agrippa so willing to constrain himself, above his power and means, to abound in Silver; and all this to the intent to please him. For which cause Caesar, in requital of his kindness, intending to honour Agrippa to his uttermost power, in granting him that which he most desired; being one day warm with Wine, invited him to drink a Carouse: adding these words;

Agrippa, I have heretofore known the honour thou hast shewed towards me, and thou hast expressed the earnest affection that thou bearest me, in hazarding thy self in divers dangers, into which thou hast been drawn during Tiberius's life time; and hast omitted nothing, no not in that which exceedeth thy power, to shew thy affection towards me: For which cause, I think it should be a great shame for me, if I should suffer my self to be overcome by thee in kindness, without some answerable correspondence: I will therefore put that in practice, which I have heretofore omitted; for all those things that hitherto I have bestowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My will is, that thy merits should at this time be requited, by such means as might for ever make thee happy. Now he spake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg some great Province at his hands, or the Revenues of some Cities.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet he did not discover his intent, but gave Caius this answer; that whereas he had served him to the dislike of Tiberius, it was not for the gain he expected heretofore; and for the present also, he did nothing under hope to be rich; contenting himself that he was in the Emperor's good favour. That the benefits he had received of him were great, yea, exceeding all that which he durst ever have hoped: For (said he) although they be but small in comparison of your Greatness, yet in respect of my self you have received them, and in my conceit, they are very great. Caius admiring his generosity, insisted to press him to ask whatsoever he had a mind to, being ready to grant it. Whereupon Agrippa said, Dread Prince, since it is your good pleasure to think me worthy to be honoured by your Presents, I will not request any thing at your hands, that may tend to enrich me; for that by those goods you have already given me, I am greatly honoured: But I beseech and request one thing at your hands, which will purchase you the reputation of Piety, and will procure God to be propitious unto you in all your actions; and which also, will breed me much glory among those who shall hear that I have not been refused in my demand, which concerneth me more than the necessities of this life: I therefore beseech you, that it will please you to give order that that Statue, which you have charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Jews, may never be put there. This was Agrippa's request to the Emperor, knowing very well how dangerous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life, to demand any such thing at Caius's hands, that was not answerable to his humour. Caius, on the one side, moved with the service Agrippa had done him; and on the other side, seeing how great an indignity it should be for him, if before such an Assembly of Witnesses, he should deny that

A that which he had so instantly pressed Agrippa to request, as if suddenly he had repented himself; and admiring Agrippa's virtue (who having an opportunity in a moment to augment his particular Estate, either by Revenues, or other Commodities; had preferred the Common Cause, the Laws of his Country, and Piety, before all these) he granted him his Supplication; and wrote to Petronius, praising him for that he had used such diligence in assembling his Army, as also for all that whereof he had given him notice: adding these words; If (said he) you have already erected the Statue which I commanded you, let it remain in the place; but if it be not done, be thou no more troublesome to the Jews, but dismiss thine Army, and repair thou in person to that place whither I have sent thee: For I urge no more the erection of the Statue, for the desire that I have to gratify Agrippa, whom I entirely honour, and in such sort, as it is impossible for me to contradict any thing whatsoever, that either he hath need of, or shall require. These were the Contents of those Letters which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he understood that the Jews were like to revolt; for they made it known, that rather than they would endure the Statue, they would hazard a War against the Romans: Which, when Caius understood, he was extremely troubled; and being a man addicted to all villany, and averse to all honesty, and who gave place to no good counsel, after he had conceived a displeasure against any man; and who likewise thought it a great happiness for him to accomplish all that whatsoever he pleased; he wrote again to Petronius, to this effect; Since the Presents which the Jews have given thee, have more prevailed with thee than my Commands have done; so that to please them, thou hast despised that which I have enjoyed thee; I make thy self the Judge, how much thou hast deserved to incur my displeasure, to the end, that thou mayest serve for an example to all those, who shall come after thee, that an Emperor's Commands ought not in any sort to be neglected. Although this Epistle was both written and sent, yet Petronius received it not during Caius's lifetime, for they that carried it, were stayed with cross Winds; so that Petronius received those Letters that assured him of Caius's death, before he received the other: For God would not forget Petronius, who exposed himself to great dangers for the love of the Jews, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by God's wrath, being kindled against him, by reason that he affected Divine honour, received his reward; and Petronius obtained favour both at Rome, and through all the whole Government, and especially among the principal Senators, against whom Caius was accustomed to vomit up his cholerick Revenges. He died a little after he had written the Letter to Petronius, by which he threatened and denounced him death. Hereafter I will declare the cause why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how Treason was plotted against him. The Letter that brought the tidings of Caius's death, was delivered to Petronius first; and presently after, he received that wherein he enjoyed him to kill himself: He highly rejoiced at this his good luck, and Caius's death; and admired God's Providence, who speedily and happily had rewarded him, both for the honour that he bare unto his Temple, and also for having assisted the Jews. Behold, how Petronius escaped from death, by an unexpected Providence.

C H A P. XII.

Two Jews called Ananias and Anileus, both Brothers, and of a mean extraction, become so powerful near Babylon, that they give enough to do to the Parthians: Their Actions; their Death. The Grecians and Syrians who lived in Seleucia, unite against the Jews, and kill fifty thousand of them unawares.

IN those days there happened a grievous Commotion amongst those Jews that inhabited Mesopotamia and Babylon, and such Slaughters and Calamities as never the like hath been declared in our former Narrations; which in regard I intend to report a little particularly and seriously, I will rip up the whole cause thereof from its first Original. There was a City called Narda, belonging to Babylon, stored with Inhabitants, and enriched with many fruitful Possessions, sufficient to sustain so great a multitude: Moreover, it was such as might be hardly invaded by the Enemy; both for that the River Euphrates surrounded it, and also for that it was fortified with very strong Walls. Upon the same River also, there stood another City, called Nisibis; in which the Jews, in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer unto God, and the rest of their Votive money.

These two Cities therefore served them for two Store-houses; and from thence, according as time required, they sent the money they had gathered, to Jerusalem, and committed the Convey thereof to divers thousands of men, for fear it should be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the Sovereignty in Babylon. Among these Jews lived Asineus and Anileus, two Brothers, born in Nearda; whose Father Asineus being dead, their Mother bound them to the Weavers trade, for amongst those Nations it was accounted no indignity to follow that trade: for both men and women exercise themselves therein. It happened, that their Master with whom they learn'd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late unto their work. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great injury had been done unto them, betook themselves to their weapons, whereof there was great store in that house, and retired themselves into a place where the River divideth it self into two parts, which naturally aboundeth with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserved for the winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed, and became their Captains, and no man opposed himself against their insolent proceedings. Being by this means grown absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselves a strong Fortrefe, they sent unto the Inhabitants, commanding them to pay them Tribute for their Cattle which they pastured; so that this Tribute was sufficient to entertain them, promising to those who obeyed them, all friendship, and that they would maintain them against all those that should wrong them, of what place soever they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatened them that they would kill all their Cattel. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, knowing themselves unable to oppose them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of Cattel which they required; so that greater Forces daily joyed themselves with them, and they grew to that power, that they could make their excursions against those whom they intended to hurt. Every one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renown came at last to the ears of the King of Parthia.

The Governour of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischief before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possibly, both Parthians and Babylonians, and marched forth against them; with an intent to root them out, before they should have any inkling thereof to prepare themselves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his Army, he lay in ambush near unto a Marish, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Jews forbear all kind of work, he making his account that the Enemy durst not make head against him, but without fight he should lead them away captives) he march'd easily, thinking to charge them unaware. Asineus, who at that time sat idly with his fellows, having his Arms by him: Ye men (said he) methinks I hear the neighing of Horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreover, I hear the noise of their Bridles, and I fear lest the Enemies secretly stealing upon us, should circumvent us: let therefore some one of us go and discover what the matter is, and bring us word: I would I were found a liar in that which I have told you. This said, one of them went out to espie what the noise intended; who running hastily back again, told him, that he had not fallily conjectured as touching the intent of the Enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselves any longer to be out-braved by them. He also declared, that there was a mighty number of Horsemen, who were assembled like a drove of Beasts, sufficient and able utterly to overcome Asineus and all his Company, so far as much as they were not in a readiness to defend themselves: and our Law forbiddeth us to do any manner of work on the Sabbath. Asineus resolved with himself not to do that which the Spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behave themselves valiantly in their necessity wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needs die, it better became them to make breach of their Law, than to hearten their Enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betook himself to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it known in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth against the Enemy, and slaughtered a great many of them, for that they, despising Asineus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquished; but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

When the news of this skirmish was brought to the King of Parthia, he was wholly astonished at the boldness of these two Brethren, and had a great desire to see them and to speak with them. He therefore sent one of the trustiest of his Guard, to let them understand, that although King Artabanus had been injured by them, in that they had invaded his Countrey; notwithstanding, said this Ambassadour, he making less

A left account of the displeasure he hath conceived against you, than of your Virtue, hath sent me unto you, to give you my hand and troth in his name, for a safe conduct and security in your Voyage, requiring you to be his friends; he treateth therefore with you without any Deceit or Fraud, promising you Gifts and Honours, and resolveth to increase your Dignity by his Power. Asineus refused to enterprize this Voyage, but sent his Brother Anileus with certain Presents, such as he could possibly find. He therefore departed with the Messenger, and presented himself before Artabanus; who seeing Anileus come alone, asked him how it happened that Asineus came not with him: And understanding that he stayed in his Marish, through the fear that he had of him; he swore by the Gods of his Ancestors, that he would do him no wrong, wishing them to give credit to his promise, and he stretched out his hand, which is the greatest sign with which the Kings of that Countrey use to assure those that parley with them. For after they have mutually given one another their hands, there is no finiter practice to be feared, and they, from whom a man expecteth any harm, are no more to be feared, at such time as they have given this testimony of assurance. This done, Artabanus sent back Anileus, to persuade his Brother Asineus to come to Court, Artabanus did this, supposing that this his Amity with the two Brothers, would be a bridle for the Jews, who otherwise might encroach upon his Governments. For he feared, lest if any Rebellion should happen, and he should be troubled in that War, Asineus and they of Babylon should grow more strong, as well by the voluntary submission of the Jews, as by force; and thereby should do him the more mischief. Upon this deliberation he sent Anileus, who easily persuaded his Brother, giving him to understand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the Oath that he had sworn; so that both of them returned to Artabanus, who received them very graciously, admiring Asineus's Virtue, who had so great a courage in all his Enterprizes; considering especially, that he was a man of low stature, and who, to look on, seemed to be contemptible; and he told his Friends, that without comparison, he had a greater heart, than his body.

And when in banquetting he had named Asineus, and shewed him to Abdagasis the General of his Army, signifying unto him, with what valour these Brethren were endowed in Feats of Arms: Abdagasis required that it might be lawful for him to kill Asineus, to the end he might punish the wrongs he had done to the Estate of the Parthians. Neer (said the King) will I give my consent to betray a man, who hath committed himself to my protection, and hath given me his hand, and who buildeth upon the Oath I have put unto him in the name of the Gods: But if thou be a valiant man in feats of Arms, thou hast no need to make me swear my self; but when his Brother and he shall depart from hence, assail him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not privy to thy attempt. And afterwards, calling Asineus to him in the morning; It is time (said he) that thou return homeward, for fear thou provoke divers of the Captains of my Court, which, contrary to my will, will endeavour to kill thee. I commit the Countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard; which by thy care and vigilancy, shall remain exempt from all Robberies, and other such Calamities. Reason it is, that I procure thy good, because I have things that importune thee as nearly as thy life. This said, he gave him certain Presents, and presently dismissed him. Now, as soon as he returned home to his own Fortrefe, he fortified the places, both those which were already secured, and the other, which as yet no man had attempted to fortifie: And in short time he grew to that greatness, contented with the Honours of the Babylonians, he was also held in great account by the Captains of the Parthians, who were sent to govern in the neighbouring Provinces; yea, so much encreased his Authority with his Power, that all Mesopotamia was at his Command. In this Felicity and encreasing Glory of his, he continued for the space of fifteen years; which never began to decay, until such time as neglecting the ancient Study of Virtue, and contemning the Laws of his Fore-fathers, both he and his factious followers being drowned in pleasure, yielded themselves Captive to Foreign Lust. It fortuned that a certain Governour of those Parthians came into that Countrey, accompanied with his Wife, not only endowed with other Perfections, but also admired for her incomparable Comeliness and Beauty; whom, without ever seeing her, only by report of her Beauty, Anileus, Asineus's Brother, loved entirely; and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtain her favour, neither had any other hope to enjoy the Lady, he could not bridle man of his unruly Lust, but he made War against her Husband; and killing the Parthian in their first Conflict, his Wife became his, both in subjection and Bed-service, which

The year of the World, 4000, after Christ's Nativity. which thing was the Original of many mighty Calamities, both to himself, and to his Brother. For when, having lost her former Husband, she was led away Captive, the carried with her the Images of the Gods of her Countrey, which the highly esteemed, according as it was the custom of those that inhabited that place; to have their Gods whom they adore in their houses, whom, when they travel in, to a Foreign Countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and used them according to the fashion of her Countrey, at the first secretly; but after she was known for Anilew's Wife, then she adored them according to the custom, and with the same service which she used during her first Husband's days, sacrificing to her Gods.

Their chiefest friends seeing this, first of all reproved them, for that Anileus committed such things that were no ways used among the Hebrews, and altogether repugnant to their Laws, for that he had married a woman of a Foreign Nation, that contradicted and violated their accustomed Religion ; for which cause they advised him to beware, lest, in submitting themselves too much to their unbridled pleasures, they should lose the honour and power they had received from God, even until that present. But seeing their persuasions profited nothing, and that Anileus likewise had villainously killed one of his dearest Friends, who had somewhat too freely reproved him (who, at such time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeal of the Laws of his Ancestors, and with grief against his Murthrer, wished that Asineus and Anileus, and all their Associates might die the like death ; they, for that they were transgressors of the Law ; the other, for that they succoured not themselves in that oppression, which they suffered for the maintenance of their Laws.) They were fore displeased ; yet notwithstanding they contained themselves, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cause, but from the valour of those Brethren.

But when they understood that the Parthian Gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoved them not any more to bear with Anileus in contempt of their Laws; for which cause, addressing themselves to Asineus in great Assemblies, they exclaimed against Anileus; saying, that he ought, although at first he had no power to dispose of himself; yet now at last, to correct this error before it should redound to their publick Plague: For that both the Marriage was disallowed in all men's eyes, as altogether contrary to their Laws; and that the superstitious observance of the Gods, which the woman presumed to use, was an apparent injury offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his Brother's fault would breed some great inconvenience, both to himself and his followers; yet, being overcome with Brotherly affection, he easily pardoned his Brother, ascribing his error to the violence of his unbridled passion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations and greater reproofs, at length he admonished his Brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was past, and desiring him to amend the error hereafter, by sending home the woman unto her Kindred. Yet this admonition of night, and slew those whom he found asleep; and the rest being astonished thereat, O were forced to save themselves by flight: He also took Mithridates Prisoner, and caused him to be carried away naked on an Ass, which is one of the greatest disgraces

Aces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this disgraceful manner carried him into a Forrell, some of his familiars perfwaded him to kill him: but Anileus told them, that they ought to deal with him far otherwise; for that it behoved them not to kill a man, who was one of the chief among the Nobility of the Parthians, and one that was most honoured in regard of that affinity and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mitridates, were insupportable; yet if they should be instrumental to save his life, he would pardon the injuries, and reward them for their Mercy in saving his life; whereas if they should deal feverly with him, the King would seek his revenges, and make a horrible laughter of those Jews that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to have compassion of, both for that they were of their blood, and for that if any mischief should befall them they knew not whither to retire themselves; whereas they might be afflicted with the flower and select men of their nation. Having thus difcussed and debated the matter to his Soldiers, his opinion was approved, and they were perfwaded; and Mitridates was sent back again.

But he no sooner returned home unto his house, but his wife bit him in the teeth, that he lived but by the mercy of his enemies, notwithstanding he were the Kings Son-in-law; that he had made no reckoning to punish those, who had so much injured him; that he likewise contented himself to have his life saved, after he had been prisoner to the Jews: For which cause (said the) recover thou thy former virtue and honour, which thou hast heretofore lost, or I swear by the Gods of the King my Father, that the bond of Marriage which is betwixt me and thee shall be dissolved.

Mithridates, unable to endure these usual reproaches, and on the other side apprehending his wives haughty courage, from whom he feared to be separated, he assembled the greatest power of men that he could possibly, notwithstanding it was against his will, and led them forth; supposing himself to be unworthy of life, if he, who by Nation was a Parthian, should be put to the work by the Jews. When Ananias understood that Mithridates came forth against him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignity, if he should lie lurking amidst his Marthes, and hoping that he should have no worse fortune against his enemies, than he had at first, and building much upon his Soldiers, who were ever wont to get the upper hand in their encounters, he likewise drew forth his Army: to them also others adjoined themselves, who fought nothing else but pillage, and hoped that with their only presence they might discourage their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninety stades, and passed thorow a County that was scant of water, and were about the heat of the mid day burned up with thirst; Mithridates Army came in fight, and charged them even at that time, when they fainted for want of drink, and through the extremity of heat, so as they could scarcely handle their weapons. At that time Anileus's Soldiers encountering with Mithridates's fresh men, were shamefully put to flight: whereby it came to pass that a great number of them were killed. But Anileus himself, and all those of his Company, retired themselves in great haste into a Forrest, leaving Mithridates Lord and Master of the Field, whereof he was very joyful. Notwithstanding this disaster, an infinite number of lawless men resorted to Anileus, who set little by their lives, provided there might no limit be proposed to their unbridled licentiousness; so that he gathered a greater number of men than those he had lost; yet they were far different in valour from the former: for they were wholly ignorant of warlike discipline. Notwithstanding, he being accompanied with these men, went and set upon divers Burroughs of the Babylonians, which were totally destroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cause the Babylonians and his other enemies, sent unto Nearada to the Jews that were there.

requiring that Anilew might be delivered into their hands: whereunto consenting not (for although they had a will to perform their request, yet it lay not in their power to deliver him) they required that they might live in peace. And to treat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians sent certain men to confer with Anilew. They having surveyed the place wherein Anilew kept, assailed both himself and his followers by night, and slew all those they encountered with, without resistance, and amongst the rest Anilew. When the Babylonians saw that they were delivered from the oppression of Anilew, who till that time had been as a were a bridle unto them, to restrain and curb the hatred they conceived against the Jews, with whom they had oftentimes been at odds, by reason of the contrariety of their Religions, whereby it happened that they oftentimes fell at debate upon every opportunity when they met.

Now when Anilew's men were defeated, the Babylonians set upon the Jews on all sides:

 fides; who seeing themselves in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, against whom they were too weak to make resistance; and on the other side, unable to live amongst them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a City famous in regard of Seleucus the Son of Nicanor, who builded it. In that City dwelt divers Macedonians, divers Greeks, and a great number of Syrians. The Jews fled thither, and continued there about five years, without any molestation: But in the sixth year, when the Plague encreased in Babylon, the Jews that remained there, were enforced to seek them some new habitation; and that removing of theirs into the City of Seleucia, was the cause likewise, that the Jews came to inhabit that place, in a certain Sedition that arose among them, the Syrians had the upper hand, by the means of the Jews, who joyned their Forces with theirs, who of themselves were valiant and good Soldiers.

 The Greeks being repulled in this Tumult, and having no other means left them to maintain their former honour, but to break that League of Friendship, which was between the Syrians and the Jews; devised in private, each one with those Syrians with whom they were acquainted, promising to live in peace and amity with them; whereunto they condescended willingly. For the chiefest of these two Nations concluded the Peace, which presently after followed, to the end that on both parts they should joy in hatred against the Jews: So that altogether charging them at unawares, they killed more than fifty thousand of them; they were all put to the Sword, except some few, who through the mercy of their Friends, and assistance of their Neighbours, were suffered to escape. These retired themselves to Ctesiphon a City of Greece, that was not far from Seleucia, where the King resideth every year, and keepeth the greatest part of his Moveables; hoping in that place, through the reverence of the King, they might remain in more safety and security. All the Nation of the Jews that were in these Quarters, stood in great fear: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that Countrey, agreed amongst themselves to make a general War against the Jews; whereby it came to pass, that they assembled themselves at Narda and Nisibis, trusting themselves to the strength of these Fortresses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in Arms. See here what the condition of the Jews was, who remained in Babylon.

The Cruelties and Follies of the Emperor Caius Caligula: Several Conspiracies against him. Chareas, being assisted by several others, killeth him: Some Germans of his Guard, kill some of the Senators afterward. The Senate condemns the thoughts of his Memory.

 Aius did not only express and manifest his fury towards those Jews that dwelt in Jerusalem, and in other neighbouring places; but also thorough all the Countreys both by Land and Sea, which were subject to the Roman Empire, filling the whole World with an infinite number of mischiefs; yea, such, and so odious, that the like hitherto have never been heard of. But Rome especially, felt the force of his fury; but especially the Senators, Patricians and Noblemen were plagued. They also that were called Roman Knights, who, in Wealth and Dignity, were next unto the Senators; for that out of their number, such men were were chosen, who were to supply the Senate, were most persecuted. For with ignominies they were abused, with banishments and confiscations weakened, and by slaughters wholly exterminated. He likewise usurped the name of God, commanding his Subjects to dignify him with more than humane honours; and ascending the Capitol, which amongst all the Temples in Rome is most religiously honoured, he was so bold as to salute Jupiter, and to call him Brother. Many such impieties were committed by him, which shews that his unbridled and extravagant madness did never forsake him. Amongst other his mad pranks that he played, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to cross the Sea between Tuscol a City in Campania, and Misenum another Town seated by the Sea-shore in a Gally; and otherwise esteeming it a thing correspondent to his greatness, who was Emperor, to exact that superiority on the Sea, which was answerable to his sovereignty on the Land, betwixt one Cape of the Sea unto another, for the space of thirty furlongs or fades, betwixt which the Gulf had his course, he caused a Bridge to be built, on which he commanded himself to be drawn in a Charriot, as if that way were answerable to the dignity of his deity. He left not one Temple in Greece whatsoever, that he spoiled not of those excellent pictures that were in them; Giving a Commission that all Statues, and whatsoever ornaments or gifts, and presents that were dedicated in any Temple, should be brought unto him; saying, that such things as were admirable, should be reserved for a place of admiration, such as was the City of Rome: with these spoils of the Temples he adorned his Palace and Gardens, and generally all his houses and Palaces that he had in Italy. He was so impudent also, as to give direction, that Jupiter Olympius Statue, which the Greeks had in great estimation, and which Phidias the Athenian Satuarian had made, should be transported to Rome. But Mementinus Regulus, to whom he directed this commission, executed it not, because the Mafons informed him, that without spoiling it they could not remove it from the place. It is reported also, that he was hindered from this execution by such prodigies that are almost incredible: which he assured Cajus of, giving him to understand, what the occasion was, that had moved him to disobey him therein: and whilst he was in danger of death for his delay, the sudden and successful death of Cajus warranted him from the same. Yea, so far stretched his unbridled fury, that having a daughter newly born, he caused her to be carried into the Capitol, and laid at the feet of the Image of Jupiter; saying, that the child was common betwixt him and Jupiter, leaving the judgment to all men, which of the two parents was the greatest. And notwithstanding all these his misdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gave liberty to slaves also to accuse their Masters of whatsoever crimes they would: which was so much the more hateful, because all things were done by Cesars authority, and to his good liking: so that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durst accuse him, and Cajus the Emperour was contented amongst the Judges to hear his offence brought in question for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwise) to pick out an occasion to put him to death. For having filled all the Countries of his Empire with false accusations, and all sorts of mischiefs, and giving slaves a prerogative above their Masters; their Lords devised many conspiracies against him, some for spite, and with an intent to be revenged of those injuries they had received: others pretending by his death to prevent those inconveniences that threatened them. In a word, his death concerned the security of the Laws, and the safety of all men: and had he not been speedily cut off, our nation had almost been utterly exterminated. For which cause I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of every occurrent; namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifestation of Gods power and will, which brings consolation unto those who are in adversity, and keep them within the bounds of modesty, who suppose that their prosperity should continue always firm, and although they neglect virtue, think that no evil may befall them. Three several Conspiracies were intended against him, to ease the world of this burthenome Tyrant, All of them were attempted by men of great account. For, Aemilius Regulus, who was born in Corduba in Spain, was fully resolved to kill him himself, or to make him away by the means of his Confederates. Chereas Cassius, Colonel over a thousand men was the conductor of another Band; and Annius Minucianus was in no less readiness to do his uttermost herein. The cause that moved them to combine thus altogether in hatred against Cajus, was, that in respect of Regulus, he was by nature a detester of all iniquity: for he was a very generous man, and so free; that he dissembled not any of his designs, but communicated them with many, who were either his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Annicianus, he was induced to seek his revenge, through the desire he had to do justice to Lepidus, who had been three conspiracies against himself, or to make him away by the means of his Confederates. Chereas Cassius, Colonel over a thousand men was the conductor of another Band; and Annius Minucianus was in no less readiness to do his uttermost herein. The cause that moved them to combine thus altogether in hatred against Cajus, was, that in respect of Regulus, he was by nature a detester of all iniquity: for he was a very generous man, and so free; that he dissembled not any of his designs, but communicated them with many, who were either his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Annicianus, he was induced to seek his revenge, through the desire he had to do justice to Lepidus, who had been

A been one of his especial friends, and one of the rarest men that were ever found among the Roman Citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the fear he had conceived of him) knowing well that all they, against whom Caius was incensed, could not escape with less punishment than loss of life. As for the third man Chereas, he could not endure the shame and reproach of cowardice that Caius had objected against him, but feared besides, that his friendship and inward familiarity with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause, and his own security and honours sake, he resolved to dispatch him. Generally all of them were resolved to rid the world of Caius, and bring an end to his pride and tyrannical power, for their hope was that their attempt having good success: their Country and Common-wealth should reap the fruits thereof, for whose security and safety, it became them to hazard themselves, though it were with loss of their lives. But above all the rest, Chereas was egged on with a desire he had to grow famous, and through the facility and convenient means he had to do it, because his Colonels room gave him most secure access unto him. About that time the Circensian Games were solemnized, which is a kind of Pastime which the Romans very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercises, and the common people is wont to demand somewhat from the Emperour, which they desire to obtain; and after having examined their requests, do never refuse them. Now they required with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxations, and moderate the excessive tributes which they paid: but he would give no ear unto them, and caused those to be apprehended, who called upon the matter most earnestly; sending his Guard, some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword. After he had given this order, and they who received it had fully executed it, a great number of men were killed. The people seeing this, ceased to exclaim any more, preferring their lives to their goods. This horrid sight incited Chereas the more to execute his enterprize, to the end he might finish his furious and tyrannical life, whose pleasure was all mens destruction. He had often resolved to kill him at Table, yet he deferred to do it, not that he fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some better opportunity. He had been Captain of Caius Guard a long time.

Caius having appointed him to gather in his Tributes, in the execution whereof he followed his own nature, rather than Cesars command, and spared those of whom he ought to have compassion for their poverty sake. Caius was so displeased herewith, that he objected against him, that the cause why he delayed the bringing in of his money, was his cowardice and negligence: And amongst other injuries that he offered him, as oft as he gave him the Watch-word, as he usually went to fetch it once a day upon his watch-day, he gave him the names of women, and others that were infamous persons, notwithstanding that he himself was no less remarkable, for his effeminate daintiness. In those Ceremonies which he himself had established, he attired himself like a woman, and was disguised with certain veils, whereby he might the better counterfeit that sex, and yet notwithstanding he could object this dishonour to Chereas, whom he vexed constantly when he gave him the watchword, and so much the more because his companions jeared him with it. For when it was his turn to receive the word from Cesars mouth, he ordinarily fitted him with such an one as might move laughter, which made him the bolder to conspire with his Confederates, in that he had just occasion to be displeased: among these was a Senator, called Popedius, and one that had past through all honours and offices, otherwise an Epicure and lover of delights. Timidius accused him (in that he was his enemy) that he had uttered certain injurious speeches against Caius: and for proof hereof, he alleged Quintilia for his witness, a woman among all Stage-players dearly beloved of many, but in especial, by Popedius, by reason of her incomparable beauty: and for that she refused to bear witness in a matter falsely objected against him, whom the entirely loved, Timidius required, that the might be examined by torture. Caius importuned herewith, commanded Chereas with all expedition and diligence to see Quintilia tortured: and the rather gave he Chereas these Commissions to kill and torment those whom he pleased, for that he had conceived this opinion, that he would acquit himself with more cruelty, to the end he might exempt himself of that reproach of faint-heartedness which was wrongfully objected against him.

Whilst thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, she trod upon the foot of one of those who were of the Confederacie, giving him to understand that he should be of good courage, for that there was no fear that he would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with constancy: notwithstanding, Chereas tormented her cruelly, felt nothing, which which he rather performed by constraint, than of his own free will. And seeing he could enforce nothing out of her, he brought her back to Caius in so pitiful an estate, that all they that beheld her, had compassion on her. Caius likewise himself was moved, and bethinking him of those pains he had endured he desisted from the inquest and accusation which was prosecuted against Pepidius and Quintilia and gave her a certain sum of money, to comfort her against the indisposition that might follow by reason of her torments, which she had so courageously endured.

This displeased Chereas very much, as if he had been the cause of all those evils that had happened to those two persons, whom the cruellest of men did bemoan. He consulted therefore with Clement, who was Captain of the foot, and Papinius who had the command of the Guard, and spake unto them to this effect. "We have (said he) O Clement, employed our selves to the uttermost for the Emperours safety: for by our diligence and care we have done so much, that of all those, who have conspired against him, some of them have been killed: the rest in such sort tormented and martyred, that Caius himself had compassion on them. But what reward or honour receive we for all these services? Clement hearing these words, held his peace, giving manifest testimony by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly ashamed he had so long time obeyed the Emperours commands: and whilst he thought with himself that it was no policy for him to open his mouth against Caius cruelty, Chereas emboldened himself to discover the calamities and dangers wherein both the City and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him, that the common report was, that Caius was the K cause of them:

But (said he) those that will narrowly examine the truth, will judge that I and Papinius that stand by me, and you, Clement, more than we, have caused the Romans torment, and the World's misery, for that of our own will we have been Ministers of Caius's Commands; and although the means lieth in us to make an end of those Violences that are committed against the Citizens, and injuries to the whole World; yet we serve him for his Guard and Hang-men, in stead of Soldiers. And we bear Arms, not to maintain our Liberty, and the Roman Empire, but to preserve him who keeps their bodies and minds in slavery: And every day are we foiled in their blood who are killed and tortured, until such time as some one serve us with the same sauce, to satisfy Caius's Cruelty. For it is not for the good will be beareth us, that he maketh use of us; but that which is more, we are subjected by him, and he will cause us to be put to death, as he hath done others. For his displeasure is not limited by justice, but by his will: We also shall serve him for a mark to aim at. For which cause, it becometh us to provide for the security and liberty of all men; and especially, to warrant our selves against all those dangers that threaten us.

Clement declared by apparent signs, that he thought well of Chereas resolution, but he counselled him to make no words of it, for fear the rumour thereof should be spread among the people, and the secret should be discovered before the execution: and lest that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they should all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the mean while, it behoved them to hope that some good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himself, his age had taken from him the necessary courage that belonged to such enterprises. "It may be (said he) that I may furnish you with some advice more secure than yours is, Chereas, for a more honest than it is, who is he that can propose? This said, Clement returned to his house, ruminating with himself upon those words which he had both heard and spoken. But Chereas grew fearful, and conferred with the Colonel Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a lover of liberty, and greatly discontented with the estate for the miseries of the Common-weal; and seeing it was necessary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing lest Clement should discover all the Conspiracy, considering that delay and procrastination would be but an occasion to hinder the action. When therefore he perceiv'd him to give ear to all that which he intended, and that already he was confirmed with no less resolution than himself was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the same, he said nothing; whereas otherwise he was ready, not only to conceal that which he had heard, but also declared that which he had in his heart, he was so much the more encouraged. For which cause, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable unto them in virtue, good affection, and great courage; and who besides that, was suspected by Caius by reason of Lepidus death. For, Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been associates in the same dangers. For Caius was feared by all those who had any publick Office, sparing none of them in particular or general, but made them all groan under the burthen of his fury.

Now

A Now they knew well one another, that all of them were displeased to see the Common-weal in that estate: but the apprehension of the danger suffered them not to manifest the hatred that each of them bare to Caius, although their secret conceit ingendered among them a certain Amity. For, before that time, as often as they met together, they were accustomed to esteem Minucianus for the most honourable man of the Company, as in truth, among all the Citizens of Rome he was the most famous, valiant and best esteemed among them: being therefore assembled at that time, he was first of all requested to speak his opinion. For which cause he asked Chereas what the watch-word was he had received that day (for all the City knew very well what mockery Caius usually used in giving Chereas the Watch-word: ) Chereas, notwithstanding this disgrace, failed not to answer him, relying on the wisdom of Minucianus, and said unto him;

But give you me for the Watch-word, Liberty; mean while I give you thanks for that you have awakened me more speedily, than of my self I have accustomed to be. You need not now any further enforce your self to incite me by your words, for both you and I have undertaken the same resolution. Before we were assembled in this place, our thoughts were united. Behold here my sword that is girt unto my side; this shall suffice for us both. And if you please you shall be my Captain, and I will march under your Command, and will follow you under assurance of your assistance and wisdom. They, who have valiant hearts, never want Arms: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon do execution. That which kindly me thus to this action, is not the consideration of my particular interest: for I have not the leisure to think on those dangers that threaten me, through the grief that I conceive, to see the Liberty of my Country changed into slavery, and the force of the Laws wholly abolished, and all sorts of men condemned to death by Caius cruelty. It is I that deserve to be trusted in this execution, and I make you my Judge, since you have the like intention that I have.

Minucianus, perceiving with what affection Chereas spake, embraced him with all love; and after he had praised him, he exhorted him to continue his constancy: then departed they one from the other, with prayers and wishes; and at that time there hapned a preface that confirmed them the more. For as Chereas entered into the Senate, some one among the people cast out a word, that redoubled his courage. Dispatch (said he) that which thou hast to do; for God will assist thee. Chereas was somewhat afraid, lest some one of his Associates had betray'd him. But at last, he thought it was some one of those, who, being privy to his resolution, gave him a Watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, governing and observing humane affairs, pushed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to divers; sundry Senators, Knights, and Souldiers being advertised hereof were in Arms. For, there was not any one that supposed not that Caius death was the greatest good hap the Common-weal could expect. For which cause, all of them enforced themselves as much as they could, to assist the execution with courageous and virtuous resolution: and as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect, desiring each of them to be partakers in the dispatch of a Tyrant. For Calpishus also, who was Caius's freeman, and raised by him to great Authority, yea, such as almost equall'd him, adjoyned himself to them for the fear he apprehended of all men, and for those great riches which he had gathered together, for that he was a man of a corrupt conscience, and easily won by bribes and presents, doing wrong to all men, and abusing the power he had, against whomsoever he pleas'd, contrary to all right and reason. Besides, for that he knew the unbridled nature of Caius, who having once conceived an ill opinion of any man, could never afterwards be disswayed or reconciled. Amongst divers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatness of the danger of his riches was not the least, which was the cause that made him serve Claudius, and secretly to follow him, under hope, that after Caius's death, he should be his Successour in the Empire, and that at that time he should by him be maintained in the same estate, which he enjoyed: and by this means he thought to obtain his amity and good liking, by giving him to understand how Caius had commanded him to pay him, and how he had invented infinite delays to defer this execution. As for mine own part, I think that Calpishus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been disswayed by Calpishus allegations, who had presently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Masters command, with all expedition in a matter so acceptable to him. So it is, that the Providence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage against Claudius; and Calpishus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no ways deserved.

Those that were about Chereas day by day, followed the action very slowly, notwithstanding standing that he willingly delayed not, but thought on all occasions fit to finish his purpose in, for that he might assail him at such time as he ascended up into the Capitol, or even then when he solemnized those Ceremonies, which he had instituted in honour of his Daughter, or at such time as he stood in the Palace to scatter Gold, and Silver among the people, by casting him from the top of the Palace into the Market place, or at such time as he celebrated those Mysteries, that were introduced by him. For, no man suspected Chereas, so discreetly had he behaved himself in all things: and he persecuted himself that no man would have thought that he should lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet so it is, that the power of the Gods was sufficient to give him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chereas was sore displeased against his companions, in respect that he feared that they would let slip their occasion; and although they perfectly knew that he intended it for the maintenance of the Laws, and for the good of them all: yet did they request him to delay a little, for fear lest in the execution he should in some sort miscarry, and for that cause the City might be brought in trouble by the informations that would be made of that act; and that at length when Caius should be so much the better provided against them, they should not know how to shew their virtue, when the time required that they should assault and set upon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunity to set forward this business, should be the time in which the Games of the Palace were celebrated, which were solemnized in honour of Cæsar, who first of all disannulled the Peoples Authority, and appropriated it to himself. This Solemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble Citizens, with their wives and children remained to behold the sport, and Cæsar himself likewise. At that time they concluded that it would be an easie matter for them, when so many thousands of people should be shut up in so narrow a place; so that he, who would step foremost to give the stroke, might very easily be succoured, for that he could have no assistance, although his Guard should have the courage and desire to defend him. Chereas resolved upon this, and it was concluded that the first day of those sports that were next at hand, the deed should be done: but their adventure was greater than their conclusion. For the delay was such, as the third day was almost past, and hardly could they be drawn to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chereas assembled all the Confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time had overslipped them, accused and reproached them of slackness in that execution, which had been so virtuously resolved among them; and that it was to be feared, lest if any should be discovered, the whole matter should be frustrate: by which means Caius might grow more cruel than he was before. See we not (said he) that by how much liberty we take from our selves, by so much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought first of all to obtain security for our selves, and afterwards purchase perpetual felicity to others, the greatest glory whereof shall redound unto our selves. Now they having nothing to reply against so honourable a resolution, and yet notwithstanding no ways enforcing themselves towards the action, but remaining altogether amazed without one word speaking, Chereas spake thus:

Most noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cause that we linger and delay in this manner? See you not that this day is the last day of the Games, and that Caius is ready to go to Sea? for he hath determined to sail into Alexandria, and to see Egypt: truly it will be a small honour for us, if we suffer him to escape out of our hands, to the end that both by land and Sea, he may triumph over the Romans negligence. How can we chuse but condemn our selves justly, and challenge nothing but dishonour, if some Egyptian supposing that men of free condition could not any longer endure his influence, should put the matter in execution? For mine own part, I will dream no longer upon your consultations, but this very day will I hazard my self; and betide me what can, I will sustain all fortunes with pleasure and courage. For I am a man of that mind, that no danger can be so great or grievous to daunt me, or draw me from so worthy an enterprize which some other will put in execution if I delay, depriving me of the greatest honour and glory that the world can afford for its deliverance. This said he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the rest to do the like; so that all of them were desirous to set hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The custom was, that the Captains of the Guard entered the Palace with their swords by their sides, and in such equipage they asked the Emperor the Watch-word. At that time it fortuneed that it was Chereas turn to fetch the Watch-word, a great number of people had flocked to the Palace, to take up their places to behold the Games with great press and noise; whereina Caius was greatly

A greatly delighted: for there was no distinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one fate together confusedly, men and women, slaves and freemen. Caius, arriving there first, had offered sacrifice in honour of Cæsar Augustus, in whose honour likewise those sports were solemnized. It came to pass that whilst those Beasts were embowelled, that were appointed for sacrifice, Apfenas Gown, who at that time was Senator, was besprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithstanding, this was a preface for Apfenas. For he was slain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaved himself most affably towards all men, so that all the assistance were astonished to behold the courtesy that he used. After the sacrifice was done, he fate him down to behold the Pastimes, and had about him the most noble of his friends and familiars. Now was there every year a Theatre builded, according to this form and fashion that ensueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening upon the porch, by which the actors had their egress and regress, without disturbance of those who fate to behold the pastime. There was within the same a certain room, separated from the rest, where the Players and Musicians kept. When the people were seated, and Chereas, with the Captains were near about Cæsar, who fate on the right side of the Theatre: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Arms, asked Cleovitus privily in his ear, who fate by him and had in like sort been Consul, whether he heard any news? who answering him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (said Batibius) shall the tragedy be played of a Tyrants death. Cleovitus made him this reply in Homers words.

Whist: lest some Greek, should listen to our talk;

Now whilst some one darted certain apples and rare and precious Birds at the people, Caius took great pleasure to behold how they strove one with another round about him, buffering one another to see who should get the fame: but at that present there chanced two prefaces: for the sport that was represented, was of a Judge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the Dance they represented Cynera, who was killed with Myrrha her Daughter: and there was a great quantity of blood gathered to counterfeite both the murder of the Judge that was crucified, as also of Cynera. It is affirmed likewise, that the day was the very fame, whereon Philip the Son of Amyntas King of Macedon, had been killed by Pausanias one of his familiars, at such time as he entered the Theatre. Whilst Caius was incertain with himself whether he should remain until the sports were finished, for that it was the last day of them, or rather should resort to the Bath, and after he had refreshed himself, return back again thither as he had done before; Minutianus sitting next unto him, fearing lest the occasion should be overslipped, because he had seen Chereas go out of doors, with an intent to go and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the Gown, saying, Whither go you, my friend? At which time for the reverence like that he bare unto Cæsar, he sat him down again: but the fear that he had, grew so forcible, that he arose again; so that Caius could not detain him, supposing that he had gone thence to dispatch some important business. At that time did Apfenas counsel, Cæsar to repair to the Bath, telling him that after his refreshment he might return thither again; all which he did, being desirous that the resolution might take effect. They that were with Chereas were ready disposed to take advantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to stand prepared and in a readiness, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the Tragedy: and the delay seemed very tedious to them, for it was already three a clock afternoon. So that Chereas seeing that Caius lingered so long, intended to go in unto him and assail him in his seat: but he conceived that he could not bring that to pass without great loss and murder of the Senators, and Knights that were present. Now although he had this apprehension, yet addressed he himself to the execution thereof, supposing that the loss that might happen by the death of some one, would be well recompensed by the security and liberty, that would redound unto all men. When as therefore they were in a readiness to enter the Theatre, news was brought them, that Caius was risen to come forth; by means whereof there arose some noise. For which cause the Confederates turned back into the Theatre, and appealed the people, telling them that they displeased and annoyed the Emperor: but the effect was, to draw him aside from all those, who might yield him any assistance; and so to set upon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his Uncle, and M. Minutianus his Sisters Husband and Valerius who at that time was Proconsul, who might not by any means be drawn from their place, although though they had the will, by reason of the Place and Dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Auranus. Now when he was entered into the Palace, he left the ready way where his Officers were, and Claudius and his Associates held : and turned aside by an unfrequented way to the Baths, on purpose to see certain young Boys, who were come out of Africa, and were sent him out of that Countrey, partly to sing in those Ceremonies that were instituted by him, and partly to dance in Arms about the Theatre ; and in that place Chereas came and encountered him, asking him the Watch-word : which Caius gave him very reproachfully according to his custom. For which cause without any further delay, Chereas assailing him both in word and act, drew his sword and gave him a great wound, which notwithstanding was not mortal : some say that Chereas purposely wounded him after that manner, because he would not kill him at once, but to his greater torment increase the number of his wounds : but I cannot believe it, for that in such executions a man hath no leisure to determine how to strike. And if Chereas had such an intention, I account him the veriest fool that might be, for he rather took pleasure to content his despite, than readily to deliver both himself and others, who, by his delay, in being of his Confederacy might be drawn into hazard. For, if Caius had not been suddenly killed, he could not have wanted rescue, and it should seem that Chereas had not pretended to do so much mischief to Caius, as to himself and his Fellow-confederates. And being in this uncertainty, whether his enterprize should have fallen out happily or no, he had without reason both undone himself and lost the occasion, whereas having happily hit home, he might without a word speaking secure himself against those who would offend him. But let every man think what best pleaseth him. Caius feeling the grief of the wound (for he was stricken between the shoulder and the neck, and his sword could not pierce further, by reason that it hit upon the first bone of the breast) he cried not at all, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he distrusted them all, or that he had some other thoughts ; and in lamenting himself he passed forward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus who was already prepared to encounter him, who thrust him down upon his knees : whereupon all of them environed him round about, and with mutual exhortations encouraged one another to do their utmost in murdering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gave him the deadly wound, that severed his soul from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chereas : For though divers set to their hands in the action, yet was he the first who had bethought him of the action, having a long time before any of them premeditated the same, after what sort it should be attempted : and he also was the first that durst boldly impart it unto others, and who after they had allowed of his resolution, assembled them : and when every one was to speak his opinion, he concluded the same very discreetly, and had always done far more than the rest ; so that by his earnest and honourable persuasions, he encouraged those that were faint-hearted, since at such time as the opportunity presented itself, to set hand to the execution, he was the first that attempted it, and who valiantly struck and made an easy way to the rest, who found Caius calm enough, for he was almost dead. For which cause, it is necessary that all which others have done, should be ascribed to Chereas advice, virtue and diligence.

Aquila gave Caius his death wound : but Chereas was the author and chief actor of the tragedy.

Claudius with his Confederates retired into Germanicus house.

The Germans Caius Guard.

Thus died Caius, being struck with many mortal wounds. Now when Chereas and his Companions had dispatched him, they perceived well that it would be impossible for them to save themselves, if so be they should return by the way that they came ; so much were they ravished with that which they had done : For they drew themselves into no small danger by murdering an Emperor, who was cherished and beloved through the folly of the common people, and whose death the Soldiers would not leave unpunished. Now in that the ways were narrow where the murder was done, and they themselves also were hindered by reason of the great number of people, and Officers and Soldiers that gave their attendance that day in guarding the Emperor ; they took another way, and retired themselves into Germanicus's lodging, who was Caius's Father, whom they had lately killed. This house adjoined unto the Palace. For although the Palace was but one, yet consisted it of divers lodgings which were builded by several Emperours ; whose names, whether they had begun or finished the works, were imposed upon the same Buildings. When therefore they had escaped from the press, they were in safety as long as the inconvenience that had befallen the Emperor was yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germans who were of his Guard, being a Company chosen out of that Nation named the Celticque Band, for the preservation of the Emperours Person. These men are

A are very prone unto wrath, and amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution : otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the Wars always give the first onset, yielding great advantage to those on whose side they fight. They having notice of Caius murder, were vehemently grieved thereat, for that it is their manner to censure all things not according to right, but as they were answerable to their own profits : Caius especially was dearly beloved by them, for he had obtained their favour by bestowing much money upon them. Their Captain was one called Sabinus, who was not advanced to that dignity, either for his virtue or for the Nobility of his Ancestors (for he was but a sencer) but for his mighty strength and huge body. They therefore ran about with their naked swords searching for Caius murderers from house to house ; and meeting with Aprenas at first, whose Gown (as we have said) was beddied with the blood of the sacrifice, which was a presage that boded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in pieces. The second was Norbanus (who for his Nobility and Ancestors might derive his Titles from the noblest Citizens, amongst whom were divers Generals of Armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his Dignity, and being of himself endowed with great force and strength, he took a sword from one of them which first assailed him ; with whom he grappled, and made them know that he intended they should buy his blood very dearly ; and indeed so had he done, but that, being environed by divers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten down, and struck with many deadly wounds. The third was Anticus, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two other had done ; but to shew the hatred that he bare unto Caius, and the pleasure that he took to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with envy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anticus Father, whose name likewise was Anticus, and not content therewith, he had sent his Souldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the carcass of this Tyrant ; but hearing the uproar that was raised in every part of the house, he thought good to hide himself : yet could he not avoid the narrow search of the Germans, who were so displeased, that they killed all they met, whether they were guilty or guiltless of the fact : Thus were these three made away.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theatre, every one was amazed, and could scarcely believe it. For although divers of them were very glad that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselves that it would highly profit them ; yet did their fear hinder their belief. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befall Caius, and conceiving in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there was no man so bold, as to attempt it ; they supposed the report to be altogether false. Of this mind were certain women and children, slaves and souldiers. These by reason they received wages at his hand, tyrannized with him, being his ministers in all those abuses that he offered to many good Citizens, in partaking the booty, and other advantages that Caius drew unto him. As for the Women and Children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kind of people take delight in Plays, Jests, Donations of flesh, and other such Pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to have means to satisfy his rage and cruelty. He was also gracious among the servants and slaves, for that by him they had liberty to accuse and condemn their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily believed ; and when they discovered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discovery they were not only made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was assigned them, was the eighth part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certain of the Nobility, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before they were privy to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding they desired that the enterprize should be effected ; yet kept they all things close, and gave no sign of joy, nor made any shew that they heard that which was reported. For some of them feared lest if they should be frustrated of their hope, they should bring themselves in danger of punishment, for having discovered their intent sooner than they should have done. They likewise who knew the enterprize and were Confederates with the Actors ; yet did they more closely conceal it the one from the other, fearing lest if they should discover the matter to any one of those, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might betray them : whereby if Caius should be yet alive, they might incur the danger of punishment. For the report was, that he had been wounded in certain places ; yet that he was not killed ;

killed; but as yet alive, and among his Physicians hands, who dressed his wounds. H
No man therefore durst freely discover the secrets of his heart to his Neighbour; for they that spread those reports, were either friends (and for that cause were suspected as favourers of his Tyranny) or enemies, and by that means, in that they were but faintly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they said. There arose also another report, which daunted and beat down the hearts and hopes of the Nobility; namely, that Caius setting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little also by the wounds he had received, was come into the Market-place all bloody as he was, and after this manner declaimed before the people: See here, how they that spread these rumours, preferred their conjectures, which were void of all reason: which distracted those that heard it, according as they were affected. Notwithstanding all this, no man removed from his place, for fear lest they should be suddenly accused; knowing well that they should be accused, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the disposition of their Judges and Accusers.

But after that the Germans had envired the Theatre with their naked Swords, all that were present expected nothing but death; and as soon as any man entered, they were seized with such an amazement, as if they had already felt the strokes; so that they knew not what to do, having no heart to depart from thence; and otherwise perfwading themselves, that if they stayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. At length, when the Soldiers were entered into the Theatre by force, all the Assembly cried out, protesting that whatsoever was done, it was besides their knowledge, whether it were either attempted by Conspiracy, or any other means. They therefore most humbly entreated them, that they would spare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on those that were innocent: For their own parts, they prayed them to search out those who had committed the act, if any such thing were committed. And thus spake they with tears, beating their breasts, and calling the Gods to witness; alleging that which the present danger suggested them with, and as much as such as pleaded for their lives could say. By these perfwasions of theirs the Soldiers' fury was abated, so that they began to repent for what they had executed in the Theatre; for this also was a cruelty, as they themselves (notwithstanding their barbarous incivility) supposed it to be, which was, that the heads of Asprenas and others that were killed, were carried and set upon an Altar. Whereat all the Assistants were most grievously discontented, remembering themselves of the dignity of the men, and having compassion of that which had befallen them; considering also, that they themselves were not far off from dangers, being uncertain whether they should save themselves: whereby it came to pass, that some of those who had cause to hate Caius, durst not freely rejoice at his death, because they were upon the point to lose their own lives, having as yet no appearance of any safety.

Auruntius entrench the Theatre, and signifies the Emperor's death.

The Germans' fury, awakened by the death of Caius, is pacified.

At length Auruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common Criers, who had a strong voice; and by crying such goods as were to be sold, had gathered so great substance, as that he was accounted one of the richest men in Rome, and in great esteem amongst all men in that behalf, entered the Theatre in a mourning Habit, and after a lamentable manner: And although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the fear he conceived lest he should lose his goods, and in consideration of the present danger, he dissembled his joy; wearing all those Garments of mourning, and using no less lamentation, than if he had bewailed the death of his dearest friend. After this manner he came into the Theatre, publishing Caius's death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had happened: After this, he began to repress the rage of the Germans, and commanded their Captains and Tribunes to put up their Swords, assuring them of the Emperor's death; which act of his did manifestly save the lives of all those who were assembled in the Theatre, and all them likewise, whom they could have met with. For if they had had but the least surmise, that Caius had as yet been alive, there was not any sort of cruelty which they had not committed: For they bare him so great love and affection, that to secure him from that misfortune, they would have redeemed him with the loss of their own lives. But as soon as they understood he was dead, they repressed their furious rage, which egged them forward to revenge; knowing that it availed them nothing, to discover their affections towards him, in that he could yield them no requital. Besides, the fear they had, lest, in pursuit of their Tyrannous Murthers, the Senate should be incensed against them, if so be the Government of the Estate should be returned into their hands, made them contain themselves. Thus was the fury of those Germans appeased for the death of Caius.

Mean-while Chereas (who feared very much, lest Minucianus should fall into the Germans

A Germans hands, and in their fury be murdered by them) fought for him among the Soldiers; enquiring of every one, whether they knew if he were killed or no. Whereupon Minucianus and Clement were brought unto him, who in his presence commended Chereas's exploit, and gave him thanks in the name of the whole Senate; who witnessed that it was to the general benefit, and good of the Commonwealth; and that the greatest persons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good advice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his resolution; alleging that the nature of Tyranny was such, that being puffed up with a short pleasure of unjust and intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in misery, as manifestly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who, before any thing was either devised, practised or executed against him, was already hateful to all men; and had in such sort violated all Laws, that his greatest friends were resolved to take Arms against him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himself, who was the Author of his own ruine.

Arcion a certain Physician dismisseth some.

Hereupon all they arose who were in the Theatre, and raised great noise and trouble in seeking to save themselves. The occasion was, that a certain Physician called Arcion, being called out to go and dress certain men that were wounded; making a shew as if he went to go and prepare such things as were necessary for those that were wounded, made those sit still with him who fate nearest unto him; but the truth was, he did it to the end to draw them out of the present danger. Mean-while the Senate assembled themselves in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after those who had murdered Caius: The people with an entire and simple intent, the Senate only to use some formal proceeding. For Valerius Asiaticus, who had formerly been Consul, came forth among the people, who were in an uproar; and supposing it a strange matter that no man knew who had killed the Emperor, whilst every one enquired who it was that had done the deed; O, said he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Consuls published an Edict, containing the Accusations that were presented against Caius; commanding the people and Soldiers, who were as yet in the Theatre, to retire themselves to their Lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they should be eased of those Taxations, wherewith they had been burdened: And the Soldiers were promised Honours and Dignities, if they would contain themselves in their accustomed order, and stir up no further trouble. For it was to be feared, lest if they had been further sisted in Murthers, the City should have fallen into some great danger, through Rapines and Spoils both of Houses and Temples. But by this time all the whole Senate was assembled, especially those who were Confederates in Caius's murder; who seemed to gather courage, and to speak boldly, as if the Government of the Estate had been fallen into their hands.

The Senate and people enquire after those that flew Caius. Valerius Asiaticus will not be the Author.

E The Soldiers resolve to promote Claudius, Caius's Uncle, to the Imperial Dignity. Saturninus's Speech in the Senate, for Liberty. Chereas sends to kill the Emperress Ceconia, Caius's Wife, and her Daughter. Caius's good and evil Qualities. The Soldiers carry Claudius into the Camp, to make him Emperor: The Senate sends to him, to pray him to forbear.

WHilst the Estate of the Empire was thus distracted, Claudius was suddenly fetched out of his house: for the Soldiers assembling themselves together, and conferring among themselves what was requisite to be done, perceived that it was impossible that so many, and so weighty affairs of the Commonwealth, should be well managed by a Popular Government; and grant it could be possible, that it would yield them little or no profit: On the other side, if it should happen that one of the chiefs of the Senate were chosen, that he would prove their enemy, for not having contributed to his Election. Whilst therefore, the Sovereign Authority remained as yet undivided, they thought fit to elect Claudius, who was Caius's Uncle, for their Emperor; who was a man of that reputation, that none of those who were assembled in the Senate, was more capable than he was, both in regard of his Birth, and also of his good Education; who likewise being by them exalted to the Dignity of the Empire, would honour them and with all answerable bounty acknowledge their good deserts. Wherefore they resolved to go to his Lodging, and take him out to declare him Emperor; Cneus Sentius Saturninus, hearing of it and conceiving that there was no time to be lost, to witness both his worth and his courage; he got up (as if he had been compelled, but in effect, of his own accord) cord) and spoke after this manner with a confidence suitable to those brave men, who have made all the world admire the Glory of the Roman Generosity.

Now Lords of Rome, although it is incredible, that the Liberty which hath so long time been unexpected, should return and visit us; yet so it is, that we see the excellency thereof, although it be uncertain how long time the Gods will bestow it on us; which is such, that it may rejoice us for the present, what issue soever it may have hereafter. For to them that know what Virtue is, it is no small felicity to live one hour in freedom of mind, and in a free Country, and governed by such Laws, which in times past have made our Commonwealth flourish. For mine own part, I cannot remember our ancient Liberty, for that I was born after the subversion thereof: But I infinitely desire to have the happy fruition of that which we enjoy at this present. And I think them also very happy, who are born and brought up in virtuous Studies. I likewise suppose that a second honour next to the immortal Gods, is to be ascribed to them, by whose Virtue at last, though very late, even in this our Age, we have obtained the felicity to enjoy the same; which happiness would God, with our Inheritances, we might bequeath to our Posterity. For in regard of our selves, this day sufficeth us both as well as those that are young, as they also who are old. For the Aged shall forsake this life with more pleasure, in that they have had the knowledge of that Blessing, which is joined to their Liberty: And the younger shall be furnished with a Royal Example, in admiring and knowing their Virtues, by whom we enjoy this benefit of Freedom. For in regard of the present time, there is not any thing that we ought more earnestly to affect, than to live virtuously; for only Virtue is the thing that confirmeth men in their Liberty. I cannot speak of the time past, but only by hear-say; but for what I have seen with mine eyes, and perceived by my observation, I know how great mischiefs Tyrannies do ordinarily breed in a Politick Estate: For they utterly extinguish all Virtue, and deprive Free men of all that perfect magnanimity that may be in them; and teach both to flatter, and to fear, for that the Commonwealth is abandoned, not to the wisdom of the Laws, but to the fury of intemperate Governours. For since Julius Cæsar bent his thoughts to overthrow the Popular Government in Rome, and violated the happy course of Law, whereby our State flourished, the Commonwealth hath been overthrown. For in subjecting the Law to his good liking, and himself to his particular desires, there is not any kind of misery and mischief, that hath not overthrown our City; so that his Successors have employed themselves to the uttermost, and with a certain emulation, to abolish the Laws of our Country; striving which of them might deprive our Commonwealth of her Noblest Citizens: For that they have made their account, that their security consisted in communicating their secrets with such as were base and abject; abusing, not only the great Courages of those men, who were famous for their Nobility and Virtue; but also by murdering a great number of them by all sorts of Punishments: And whilst all of them endeavoured to be absolute in their Command, they made it their business to oppress the Commonwealth.

But amongst all the rest, Caius, who this day hath lost the benefit of life, hath wrought greater mischiefs himself alone, than any other, by discharging his brutish and bestial wrath, not only against the common Citizens, but also against his own Parents and Friends; demeaning himself alike towards all men; and manifesting his injustice, in that he pursued them most, who were most innocent; and by this means grew hateful, not only to men, but also to the Immortal Gods. For it is not enough for Tyrants to satisfy their Concupiscence, to use all sorts of Injuries, to ravish both men's Wealth and their Wives; but also, they glory, when they may utterly ruin both their Fortunes and Families, who are their enemies. For all Liberty is opposed against Tyranny, and it is impossible (notwithstanding all the miseries that may be imagined or offered) that Free-men should agree with Tyrants, how little time soever it be that they have exercised their Tyranny. They also know too well, with how many mischiefs they have entangled their Subjects (although they have not the spirits to revenge themselves of those wrongs that are done unto them) and being well assured into what incumbrances they have drawn them, persuade themselves, that they have but one only means left them to secure themselves from suspicions, and to procure their own security; which is, to put them to death, if they may possibly do it. Since therefore at this time we are delivered from so many mischiefs, and are no more subject, except to one another (which is a Pledge of Concord for the present, and of security in time to come, and Glory unto him that hath redressed the Estate) you shall deal very well and wisely in my opinion, to provide for the Commonwealth; foreseeing very diligently, all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speak his opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no Superior to countermand their sayings, or that is exempt from reproach, if he offend against the Commonwealth, or that may threaten with the Authority of an Emperour, for that shall be said. For what else, in these later times, hath increased and furthered our over-topping Tyranny, than their foolish fear, who durst in no wise oppose themselves

A themselves against his Lust? For being entangled by a certain kind of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to live after the manner of Slaves, and being afraid also to die virtuously, and desirous to live with shame, we are fallen into these scarce sufferable Calamities, and into such mischiefs as have concerned us too nearly. First of all therefore, you ought to honour those who have killed the Tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and especially Chæreas. For he only hath been the man, who by the power of the Gods, and through his great wisdom and valour, hath given you your Liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to keep Honours on his head 3 yea, special favours, as to the man who first of all conspired, and first of all hazarded himself against a Tyrant, for your liberty. It is an honest, and well-becoming action of men of free hearts, to reward and repay suitable kindness for the benefits they have received: Such is this man in your behalf; so not like to Brutus and Cassius, who murdered Cæsar; for they were the Originals of Seditions and Civil Wars in this City: And this man, by the death of a Tyrant, hath not only at once delivered you of him, but also hath cut off those mischiefs that arise by him.

Thus spake Sentius, and his advice was entertained with great applause, not only by the Senators, but the Knights also that were there present. Whereupon, a Senator, called Trebellius Maximus, arose; and stepping to him, pulled off the Ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inclosed a Stone with Caius's Picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off; so intent was he about that which he both said and did; and by this means the engraved Image was broken. Now, in regard it was late, Chæreas demanded the Watch-word from the Consul; who gave him the word, Liberty. They were all astonished at this change, and could scarcely believe that which happened. For since the Popular Government had been abolished, the Consuls had never given the Watch-word, until that present time: For before the City was oppressed by Tyranny, the Consuls commanded the Soldiers. After that Chæreas had received the Word, he gave it his Soldiers, who subscribed to the Senate's Authority: Of these there were about four Companies, which preferred the Lawful Government before a Tyranny; who also retired themselves to their Officers. As for the people, they returned to their respective homes, full of joy, hope and courage, for that they had regained the Government of the State, which belonged unto them, and not to any particular Governour. In a word, Chæreas was their only hope: He foreseeing that there would come mischief follow, if Caius's Wife and Daughter should remain alive; and that if all his Friends and Family should not be utterly extinguished, all those who should be spared, would serve to no other end, but to the ruin of the Commonwealth, and the Laws: And on the other side, desiring to see an end of that which he had begun, and to satisfy that hatred he had conceived against Caius; he sent Julius Lupus, one of the Captains of the Guard, to kill both his Wife and Daughter; which he did. And the cause why he gave this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Caius's Kinsman, who was a Confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end, that partaking after this manner in the death of the Tyrant, he might be known to have dealt as forwardly for the Commonwealth, as if from the beginning, he had been a Counsellor and Agent in the Conspiracy. Notwithstanding there were some of his Companions of that opinion, that it should be but a cruelty to deal with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his own Nature, and not by the counsel of his Wife; and that all those evils which he committed in the Commonwealth, by desolating the Flower thereof, was his own offence, not hers.

There were others that accused her to be the cause of all that which Caius had committed; alleging that she had given him an Amorous Drink, by which he was tied and entangled in such fort unto her, and so led and transported by her love, that he governed all that which concerned the Estate of Rome, and the World subject to Rome: But her Defenders prevailed nothing. For at length it was resolved she should lose her life.

To finish this Tragedy Lupus was dispatched, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their intent who had sent him, for fear he might have been blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the Commonwealth. Therefore, as soon as he came into the Palace, he found Calpurnia, Caius's Widow, lying by the body of her murdered Husband, destitute of all that which the Law gratifieth those that are dead with; altogether bloody, and greatly afflicted; having her Daughter lying by her: being in this condition, she was heard to utter no other words, but that she blamed Caius, for that he had not given credit to that counsel which she had given him to offend; which words of hers, were by some interpreted two ways; for some thought that she meant, that she had counselled her Husband to give over his Cruelty, and Murders murthers which he exercised against his Citizens; and that in his Government, he should use a tempered measure with virtue, for fear, lest his Subjects mistaking of his manners, should seek his destruction. Others took it, as if he had encouraged Caius to set upon the Conspirators, and kill them without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means provide for his security. They therefore said, that Caelonia blamed Caius, for that he had behaved himself too carelessly, in that wherein she had counselled him. Such were the words which Caelonia spake, and such was the exposition, as divers men interpreted them.

She seeing Lupus coming, shewed him Caius's body, and prayed him with tears and complaints to come nearer: But perceiving that he made no answer, then she knew the cause of his arrival, and offered her naked throat unto him with a great courage, using such expressions as they ordinarily do, who despair of their lives; she desired him to defer no longer to finish that Tragedy which his Companions had begun; and so died courageously, by the hand of Lupus: and after her, was her Daughter killed, which was very young. This did Lupus assure Chereas of with all expedition. This was Caius's end, after he had reigned four years wanting four months. Before such time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate and wicked man, and addicted to his pleasure, a favourite of Tale-bearers, exceeding fearful; and for that cause, when he got the upper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He esteemed this only fruit of his power, to abuse it against Innocents; and to gather and heap up great spoils and Booties, by wicked and unjust Murthers, Rapines and Oppressions; lifting himself above all Humane Authority, and affecting to be esteemed as a God, suffering himself to be transported by the people's Praises; All that which the Law condemned and punished, as a thing most detestable, that made he use of to punish Virtue with. He never remembered any friendship that had been done him, how great soever it either was or had been, when he was in his passion; and was apt to inflict punishments in his rage, on just and upright men. All that which was answerable to Virtue, was odious in his eyes. In all things that pleased him, he had so violent Appetites, that it was impossible to contradict him; so that he was not ashamed to use the unlawful company of his own Sister: Whereby it came to pass, that the Citizens of Rome began to hate him extremely, for that the like had not been seen or heard of; of a long time men could not believe it, notwithstanding they sufficiently expressed the hatred they bare against the fact he had committed. It cannot be said of him, that he builded any work becoming his Royal Magnificence, worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the present or future world; except some Ports that he made near to Rhegium and Sicilia, for Harbour of such Ships as came and went into Egypt for Corn; which doubtless, is a stately work, and very profitable for such as travel by Sea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but only half finished, because the Work-men wrought slowly. But the chief cause thereof was, that he spent his study in unprofitable matters, and loved rather to consume his Substance, to feed his own private Lusts, wherein he took great delight, than to erect and build any goodly and famous Work, which might have redounded to the profit of the Common-weal. Otherwise, he was an eloquent man, and very expert in the Greek and Vulgar Roman Tongues, apprehending presently that which others said; and although they had been tedious in their expressions, yet he answered them in an instant; and in Affairs of Consequence, he had such a moving persuasion and power, that no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick Wit, and easie apprehension, because he had taken pains, and had exercised himself in Learning. For being Tiberius's Brother's Son, whose Successor he also was, he was enforced to be studious; seeing that Tiberius, who was of the same years, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therefore enforced himself to imitate the Emperour Tiberius, whose near Kin-man he was; and surpassed all those that were in Rome at that time: Yet, notwithstanding all these great advantages, which his good instruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befell him, by the abuse of his Authority. So rare a thing it is to see them who have liberty, to do what they list without punishment, to govern themselves with modesty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: But after he was given over to licentiousness, the affection that he bare them was changed; and instead thereof, he grew more averse from them daily; whereby they were enforced to conspire against him, and seek his ruine.

Now, as I have heretofore declared, Claudius understanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled for this occasion, was in such distress, that he knew not what to do to save himself; but went and hid himself in a certain corner, where he was surprized, having no other cause to apprehend his

A his danger, except his Nobility. For during the time that he lived a private man, he behaved himself modestly, kindly, and favourably unto all men, being well seen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greek tongue, shunning as much as in his lay, all tumult and train that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the Palace was full of fury and fear, and nothing reigned more in general than confusion and disorder, the Souldiers of the Guard, who were the most experienced and bold, consulted amongst themselves what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius's death, in that they supposed that upon just occasion, he was put to death, for which cause they rather bethought themselves on that which concerned their fortunes, and how they might assure themselves in those dangers, seeing the Germans were wholly bent against those who had killed Caius; rather incited thereunto of their own cruel natures, than of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the Common weal. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in fear of his life, the rather for that he saw Apprianus head and the rest of the Nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himself in a certain place, which was only accessible by certain steps or stairs, and hid himself therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the Souldiers of the Palace called Gratus, being unable to discern who he was, in regard of the obscurity of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew near unto him to the intent he might the better know him: and when Claudius besought him, that he would depart and leave him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him: This is Germanicus, let us take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiving that he was ready to be attached, and fearing lest they should put him to death as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting unto them his innocency, and how he had no ways been either accessory or agent in that which had been done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to smile, took him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause to suspect his life: "For (said he) it behoveth thee to roue up thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to govern an Empire, of which the gods (who have the care of the whole world) have deprived Caius, to reward thy virtue with." "Arise therefore, and take possession of the Throne of thine Ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walk on foot, through the fear and joy that he had conceived of that which had been told him.

Upon these speeches divers of the Souldiers of the Guard assembled about Gratus and perceiving that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermeddled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius's life. There were others of them that said, that the judgment of this matter belonged to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of Souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were unarmed fled from them; yet could not Claudius go on his way; so weak and feeble felt he himself in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiving his plight, fled away for fear, and lest him, so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by the Souldiers. Now when Gratus and his Associates were arrived in the Court of the Palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to think upon that which was to be done: thither also there flocked a great number of other Souldiers unto them, who took pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselves to place him in the Imperial Dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his Brother, whose memory was much honoured among all those, who had conversed with him. Moreover, they the chiefest Senators had committed, and how great errors Moreover, they considered the danger and difficulty of their actions then in hand, for that the Government being admitted by one only man, would be dangerous for them, if he should obtain the same by any other means; whereas if Claudius should enjoy the same by their permission and good will, he would have them in remembrance who had favoured him, and would recompense them according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselves, or when they met with one another. All of them at length concluded upon this advice, and environed Claudius, and lifting him up upon their shoulders, they carried him into the Army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended.

Difference

Citizens and Senators.

The Senate

Claudius to relinquish the Dignity offered him.

There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and Citizens: For, the Senate desirous to recover their former Dignity, and enforcing themselves to avoid the slavery that had befallen them by the wickedness of Tyrants, intending the maintenance of their present good fortune. Contrariwise, the people envied them that Dignity. And knowing that their Emperours should be as it were bridles, to restrain the avarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Claudius was advanced, making their account that if he were created Emperour, they should avoid a Civil war, like unto that which happened in Pompeius time.

"The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the Army by the Souldiers, chose out some of their order, and sent them as Ambassadors in their behalfs, to signify unto him that he ought to use no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the charge of the Common-weal to the Senate. That he both was and should be one of the Senators, and have the conduct of the Common-weal, and dispense it according to Law, persuading him to call unto his remembrance those grievous mischiefs, which the former Tyrants had wrought in the Common-weal, and what dangers he himself had also suffered with them, during the reign of Caius their late Emperour. That it should ill become him, who had detested the fury of others tyrannical, now willingly to be drawn to oppose himself against his Country. That if he would obey them, and continue to express the virtue and constancy of his life, which in times past he led with commendation, he should obtain those Honors which free Citizens could afford him, and in suffering himself to be governed by Laws, to the end he might have part in the command, and to be commanded in his turn, he should obtain the praise of virtue. That if he would not be dissuaded by the death of Caius, which was fresh in memory, for their own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alledged, that they were provided with Souldiers, and store of Armour, and a great number of domestick servants, all which they would employ against him: But over and above these things, they had far greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who are wont to fight for those who maintain virtue and goodness. They solemnly protested also for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honest and just, than to fight for their liberty and Country. The Ambassadors that brought this message were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselves on their knees before him, humbly besought him that he would not engage the Common-weal in a Civil war. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great number of Souldiers, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no force, they besought him that it would please him to demand the Government at the Senates hands, and receive it from them if he were resolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and just, if he should obtain the same with their good will, and not in despite of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

CHAP. III.

King Agrippa encourageth Claudius to accept of the Empire. The Soldiers, who had been for the Senate, forsake it, whether Chæreas would or not; and joyn with those that had sworn to Claudius. So Claudius becometh Master, and condemns Chæreas to die: He suffers with a wonderful Constancy. And Sabinus, who had been one of the chiefest of the Conspiracy, killeth himself.

Although Claudius knew with what presumption the Senate had sent this Embassy, yet he did modestly entertain the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his security to commit himself to their trust, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the Souldiers, who promised him their utmost endeavour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determined by no means to let the Sovereignty slip out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when he thought least on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties unto Caius which were requisite for such an one as had been by him advanced to Honour, and having taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the Souldiers of his Guard, and assured them that Caius was yet alive, and for that he found himself sick of those wounds that he had received, he sent to seek for Physicians. But afterwards understanding that Claudius was taken by the Souldiers, thrust so much, that he got himself passage unto him, whom he found altogether daunted, and

A and ready to surrender all things into the Senates hands; and encouraged him, to take upon him the Government of the Empire, which the Souldiers had offered him. Which done he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed, as if he were returned from some Banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: He therefore asked the Senators, what was become of Claudius, who told him of the truth; and besides that, required him to give them his opinion and counsel, touching the present Affairs: "His answer was, that he was ready to adventure his life in the behalf of the Senate: Yet, by the way he told them, that they ought to have an especial regard of the Commonweal, rather than all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords of an Empire, had need of Arms and men to maintain themselves, lest being weak and unprotected, they should be deceived in their expectations. The Senate replied, that they had great store of Furniture, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store of Souldiers, to whom they would add their Slaves, and give them liberty. But Agrippa replied, Would God, Grave Fathers, that you were able to perform the matters you intend; yet will I not fear to discover that unto you, which concerneth you nearly. You know well, that the Army that is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who have been long time trained up in Feats of Arms; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but men gathered together; and such as you joyn them with, are the very scum of your Slaves, who are both untractable and untrained. We shall therefore enter fight against expert Souldiers, and commit our Fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their Swords: I rather think it fit that we send unto Claudius such men, as may persuade him to give over the Empire. And to perform this Message, behold my self in a readiness to be commanded by you.

To this effect spake Agrippa; and hereunto the Senators agreed, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him others to accompany him. As soon as he came to Claudius, he secretly discovered unto him in what perplexity the Senate was, and gave him instructions to answer and carry himself like an Emperour, and to shew his Dignity and Power. Whereupon Claudius gave the Ambassadors this answer; "That he would not dread that the Senate were so unwilling to be commanded by a Sovereign, in regard of that cruelty which the fore-past Emperours had used to their destruction. But for the present they should taste of his mercy, and feel his moderate Rule; and they should live under the Government of such an one, who although in name he had the Imperial Authority, yet that in effect he would govern all things by their disposition. For which cause, he wished them in no sort to distrust him, whom, as they themselves could witness, they had seen and known to have dealt virtuously and justly in many Affairs, although the state of times had been far different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned back again. But Claudius instantly assembled his Army, and exacted an Oath of Fidelity from them; bestowing on every one of them who were of his Guard in way of Largesse, five thousand Drachma's, amounting to some twenty five Pound a man, of our sterling money. He presented their Captains also with Presents answerable to their Qualities, promising to perform no less bounty to all the rest, in what place soever they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the Temple of Jupiter the Victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselves through the fear they had of that which should be spoken: Others departed out of the City, and resorted to their Country Farms, foreseeing with themselves the issue of all these things; and perceiving that their hope of Liberty was lost, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to pass their life in quietness, though it were with Subjection, than to be altogether uncertain of their security and safety, by maintaining the Dignity of the Senators: Yet, about a hundred of them drew themselves together, and no more. Now whilst they were consulting upon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of Souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperour, and not to suffer their State to be lost through a multitude of Governours; and to this effect spake they, lest the Government should be given to divers, and not to one. This course of theirs gave little content to the Senators, both in regard of the loss of that Liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding, there were some that pretended some hope to be advanced, both in respect of the Nobility of their Race, as in regard of their Alliance that they had by Marriage with the Cæsar. For, Marcus Antonianus, a man of himself of Noble descent, and who had married Julia, Caius's Sister, stood up to demand the Sovereign Government; but the Consuls restrained him, alledging excuse upon excuse.

Another, Mintiananus also, one of Caius's Tutors, withdrew Valerius Asiaticus from thinking on those things: And there had happened as great a slaughter as had ever been heard of, had any of these had the liberty to desire the Empire, or oppose themselves against Claudius. For amongst others, the Fencers, who were of no small number, they of the Watch, and the Sayers, joyned themselves together with the Army. They therefore, that pretended to demand the Empire, gave over their Suit, partly in the Cities behalf, partly for their own private security.

About break of day Chereas and his Companions went forth to debate the matter with the Soldiers; and made signs to them, that he would speak with them, but they made a great noise to cut them off from proceeding any farther, for all of them were earnestly bent to have an Emperour and Sovereign Lord; and required with all expedition, that they might have one proclaimed and known. So the Senate understood, by the Soldiers disdaining its Authority, that it was impossible to re-establish the Republick; and on the other side, the Soldiers mis-regarding so worthy an Assembly, was unfeeling to Chereas and his Confederates against Caius. At length, Chereas being unable to conceal his Passion, and hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promised that he would give them one, if they would bring him a Token from Eutyches, who was the Wagoner to the Green Band, whom Caius had loved extremely; in so much as he employed his Soldiers in servile Labours, as to build him Stables for his Horses, besides several other reproaches, threatening them that he would bring them Claudius's head; and told them that it was a shame, after having taken the Empire from a Fool and a Mad man, to give it to a Block-head. did harm to a Wolf. Furthermore, when he came to the place of Execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the spectacle, he asked the Soldier that was appointed to behold him, if he were a cunning head-man, and whether he had a new Sword; wishing him to use that wherewith he murdered Caius. His death was happy, for he received but one stroke; whereas Lupus was flint-hearted and received divers, because he stretched not out his neck freely. Some few days after, at such time as the Romans solemnized their Expiations, and that every one honoured the memory of his dear Friend, they gave Chereas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire; saying, That was to deface and purge their ingratitude whereof they were guilty towards him. Thus ended Chereas his Life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not only absolved him, but also suffered him to exercise his Office, as he had done before; yet he thought that he should do amiss, and against Justice, if he falsified his Faith to his Associates and Confederates; for which cause he shortened his own days, thrusting his Sword through his own body, to the very hilts.

C H A P. IV.

Claudius the Emperour confirmeth Agrippa in his Kingdom, adding Judæa and Samaria therunto: He increaseth the Kingdom of Chalcis to Herod, Agrippa's Brother; and maketh Edü's in favour of the Jews.

One of the first things that Claudius did after his establishment in the Empire, was to disband those Soldiers whom he suspected; and published an Edict, by which he confirmed the Kingdom to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many Praises; adding moreover unto his Government all that which his Grandfather had possessed; to wit, Judæa and Samaria, which in that they were as one Lawful Inheritance, appertained unto him. He gave him also out of his own Dominions, Abela, and all the Countrey about Libanus, that in times past appertained to Lysanias. And he caused the Alliance that was past betwixt them, to be engraven and registered in an open place of the City of Rome. He took from Antiochus the Kingdom that he had, and gave him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagena. He set Alexander Lysimachus Alebarca at liberty, who had been his old Friend, and sometimes Governour in Arabia, and once his Mother Antonia's Steward; who had been committed Prisoner through Caius's displeasure, and espoused Bernice, Agrippa's Daughter, to his Son Marcus; which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was married, was afterwards married with her Father Agrippa's allowance, to Herod his Brother, for whom Agrippa begg'd of Claudius the Kingdom of Chalcis. At that very time, the Jews that were in the City of Alexandria, mutined against the Greeks: For after Caius's death, the Nation of the Jews which had been oppressed during his Reign, and injuriously dealt withal by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage. For which cause Claudius gave Commission to the Governour of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that Up-
E roar. He sent also his Letters Patents unto Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two Kings, Agrippa and Herod, to this effect:
Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, Father of the people, signifieth this that followeth: Understanding that the Jews Inhabitants in Alexandria, and for that cause called Alexandrines, have at all times enjoyed the self same Privileges of the City, which the ancient and first Alexandrines have had: Which Favours they have obtained by the Leave of those Princes that were our Predecessors, as it hath been plainly made known unto us, as well by Letters which have been written unto us, as by confirmed Decrees: And that since Alexandria hath been united to our Empire by Cæsar Augustus, their Privileges have continued in force during the several Successions of many of our Governours; which Rights of theirs have never been called in question, no not in that time when Aquila was Governour in Alexandria: Since in like sort Cæsar Augustus hath not letted them, but when the Governour of their Nation was dead, they might establish other Substitutes and Governours in his place; commanding that all of them should yield him obedience in observation of their Laws and Customs, without constraint or impulsion to do any thing contrary to their Religion. Yet notwithstanding, the Alexandrines have mutined against the Jews, being in the City of Alexandria, in the time of the Emperour Caius, by reason of the folly and frenzy of Caius, who disgraced and oppressed the Nation of the Jews, because they would not violate their Religion, nor acknowledge the said Caius for a God. Our Will and Pleasure is, that no one of the Privileges of the Nation of the Jews be abolished by reason of Caius's frenzy; but my mind is to maintain those which heretofore have been given them, to the end they may continue and live according to their ancient Laws and Customs: Commanding you and every one of you very carefully to provide, that after the publication of this our Ordinance, they be in no ways troubled. This was the Tenour of that Ordinance which was made in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

But that which was generally made in favour of those, who were dispersed thorough the whole World, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, High Priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensued through his friendship. Our well-beloved Friends, the Kings, Agrippa and Herod, have required us, that we will permit all those Jews that live under the Roman Empire, to use the same Laws and Privileges which they have used heretofore, as we have granted to the Jews that dwell in Alexandria. Which suit of theirs we have willingly granted; not only in favour of those that require the same, but also for that I think them worthy of such a favour; for whom I have been entreated, in regard of the fidelity and friendship they have always expressed towards the Romans. My pleasure therefore is, that no City, either Grecian or otherwise, shall deny any privilege, from whence they shall be excluded; for that since the Emperor Augustus, they have never been exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that heretofore the Jews that live under our Empire, of what place soever they be, may observe their ancient Customs without any contradiction: Giving them to understand, that heretofore they use our Clemency so much the more moderately, without neglecting the Religion of other Nations, in retaining their own. And our will is, that this present Ordinance be published by the Magistrates of Cities, Colonies and Countreys of Italy, and be sent unto Kings and Foreign Princes, by fit Ambassadors, within thirty days at the least to the end that they should be in such sort set up, that they may be seen and read by all those that pass by.

CHAP. V.

King Agrippa goeth to his Kingdom, and putteth his Chain, being a token of his Imprisonment, into the Sacred Treasury of the Temple of Jerusalem. He provideth for the Dignity of the High Priesthood: He is highly displeased at the Dorites insolence, who had caused Caesar's Statue to be erected in the Jews Synagogue.

By these Edicts of Claudius Caesar, which he sent both to Alexandria, and other parts of the World, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the Nation of the Jews. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of Honour, he sent him back into his Kingdom, to govern the same; commanding all his Prefidents and Lieutenants in his Provinces, thorough which he was to pass, to give him a friendly and honourable Convoy. But he, having wisely and happily dispatched his Affairs, returned in all haste. As soon as he came to Jerusalem, he offered his Sacrifices of Thanksgiving which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the Law. He caused also divers Nazarites to cut off their hair, and offered in Gift that Chain of Gold that Caius had given him; which was of the same weight the Iron Chain was of, wherewith his Royal hands were manacled, in memory of the Adversity he had past, and the Testimony of the exchange thereof into better Fortune; commanding that it should be hanged up in the Temple, and over the Chamber of the Treasury, to testify unto those that should behold it, that the highest Estates are subject to alterations; and that God can raise men again, from Obscurity, to happy Fortune. For this Chain that hanged in the Temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly expressed unto all men, that King Agrippa was upon a very small occasion, deprived of his former Dignity, and made Prisoner; and then a little while after that, he being delivered from his Bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous Kingdom; to signify thereby, that Humane Affairs are of that nature, that that which is the greatest, may be easily overthrown; and that which is declining, may recover again its ancient Honour and Dignity. When therefore Agrippa had duly and devoutly acknowledged God's mercies, he deposed the High Priest Theophilus the Son of Ananias; and bestowed that Honour on Simon surnamed Canthara, the Son of Boethus. This Simon had two Brothers, and Boethus was their Father, whose Daughter had been married to King Herod, as heretofore it hath been mentioned. Simon held the Priesthood with his Brethren and his Father, as the three Sons of Simon, High Priest, Son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as we have declared in our former Books. After the King had given order for the Priesthood,

A he thought good to recompense the good affection that they of Jerusalem had born unto him; for which cause, he acquitted them of those Tributes that every Family paid, knowing that it became him to shew kindness unto them, who had been faithful and well affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his Companion in many dangers, General of all his Army. Not long after, certain young men that were Dorites, under the colour of constancy in case of Religion, who also had daily expressed the same in their actions and unbridled rashness, brought the Image of Caesar into the Temple of the Jews, and erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as an Act that tended to the abolition of the Religion of their Country: For which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was Governor of Syria; and complained against those Dorites, who was no less displeased with the action, than he himself. For he supposed that such breach of Religion, was the means to further Impiety, and for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this Innovation, somewhat sharply to this effect following.

CHAP. VI.

Petronius, Governour of Syria's Letter to the Dorites, concerning the Emperor's Statue, which they caused to be erected in the Jews Synagogue. King Agrippa becometh the High Priesthood on Matthias. Martius is made Governour of Syria.

Publius Petronius, Lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the Country of Doria, health: Whereas Caesar hath published an Edict, by which he permitteth the Jews to live according to their Laws and Customs, some one amongst you have been so presumptuous as to contradict the same in effect (although in words you profess that you obey him) and do all that which you can, to hinder the Jews from enjoying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you have set up Caesar's Image; not only thereby opposing your selves against the Jews, but also against the Emperor himself; whose Image might have been better placed in his own Temple, than in a Foreign Temple: And you have placed it in their Synagogue, whereas by right, every one ought to be master of his place, according to Caesar's Judgment: For it should be very ridiculous in me to allege mine own Judgment after that of Caesar's, who hath granted the Jews the liberty to live according to their own Laws and Customs, and hath commanded that they should converse in equal freedom among the Greeks. For these causes I command you, that they who have been so bold as to contemn Augustus's Decree (against whom their own Magistrates have been displeased; excusing themselves that this accident happened not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) be brought before me by the Captain Proculus Vitellius, to yield a reason of that which they have done; exhorting the Magistrate, that if they will not be accounted Parties in this Contempt, they endeavour to discover those that are guilty to Proculus, and give order that no Sedition or Violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they effect, although we and the most honoured King Agrippa, whom I take for my good and special Friend, endeavour nothing more, than that the Nation of the Jews should not assemble, and take Arms, under colour of their defence. And to the end, that whatsoever Augustus hath ordained concerning this matter, may be the better known unto all men, I have added his Edict which he published in Alexandria: And although they are sufficiently known unto all men, yet hath the most honoured King Agrippa read them unto me, when I sat in my Tribunal Seat; concluding, according to right, that the Jews ought not to be excluded nor hindered from enjoying those benefits, which are granted unto them by Caesar: I therefore charge all men, that henceforward they take heed lest they seek any occasion of Mutiny or Sedition, and that every one live according to his Religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, and also to prevent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa took the Priesthood from Simon Canthara, and gave it again to Jonathan the Son of Ananias, whom he esteemed to be more worthy than the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not desirous of this Dignity, for in effect he refused it; saying, O King, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow upon me; and know well that it is a Dignity, which of your own free will you bestow upon me; notwithstanding that, God judgeth me unworthy. It sufficeth me, that I have once been invested with the Sacred Habit: For at that time I was more fit with more holiness, than I can now receive it at this present; yet notwithstanding, if it please you to know one that is more worthy of this honour than myself, I will Atias, chap. 5. P. Petronius writeth to the Dorites to find them to him, who have broken Caesar's Edict.

Jonathan the Son of Ananias is restored to the Priesthood, and refuseth it, and prayeth that his Brother Matthias may minister there.

I will inform you of one. My Liege, I have a Brother, who towards God and you, is as pure and innocent, whom I dare commend unto you for a most fit man for that Dignity. The King took great pleasure in these his words, and leaving Jonathan, he bestowed the Priesthood on Matthias his Brother, according as Jonathan advised him: And not long after this, Marfus succeeded in Petronius's room, and took upon him the Government of Syria.

C H A P. VII.

Silas (General of Agrippa's Forces) his great Imprudence, obligeth this Prince to put him in Prison. Agrippa fortifieth Jerusalem, but the Emperor Claudius commands him to forbear: His excellent Qualities; his stately Buildings: The cause of his falling out with Marfus, Governour of Syria: He bestoweth the Great Priesthood on Elioneus: dieth after a terrible manner: Leaveth for his Successor his son Agrippa, and three Daughters: The Inhabitants of Caesarea and Sebaste prove extreme ungrateful to his Memory. Claudius the Emperor sends Fadus to be Governour of Judaea, because of Agrippa's Minority.

Silas being made General over the King's Army, and for that he had always been faithful unto him, and had never forsaken him in any danger that was offered, without partaking the utmost extremity; but had always adventured on the greatest dangers, in respect of his entire and constant resolution; he made this account, that being so firm a friend to the King, he should also be partaker and Companion with him in the Honour: Therefore he submitted not himself to the King, but challenged to himself a liberty to speak what he pleased. For this cause he grew hateful in the King's fight, for that in particular he boasted of himself beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memory of those Adversities the King had past, the rather to express how affectionate he had been towards him; and his continual talk was nothing else, but of the hardships he had endured. Now, for that he observed no measure in this his discourse, the King took it as an injury done to his Honour, and was offended with the unbridled Licence of this man's prattle: For nothing foundeth more harsh in a man's ear, than the memory of his fore-past misery; and it is but the part of a fool to rip up the courtiesies he hath employed on another man. At length, Silas grievously provoked the King's displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath, than his wit, he not only dispossest Silas of his General's place, but also sent him bound into his Country, there to be held Prisoner. Yet notwithstanding, time allowed this displeasure; and the King taking it into better consideration, and remembering what Silas had endured in his behalf, he revoked the Sentence that he pronounced. And as he was ready to celebrate the Festival day of his Birth, and all his Subjects were to take their pleasure; he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and feast with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had just cause to be displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent unto him, but spake unto them after this manner: "To what honour doth the King invite me at this present, purposely to deprive me of it again? For he hath not only deprived me of those Honours which he bestowed upon me, in acknowledgment of the affection I have always shewed unto him: but he hath altogether abused me, if he thinks that he can restrain me from speaking freely, he deceiveth himself. For my Conscience knoweth how many hazards I have delivered him from, and as long as I breath, I will ring in all men's ears, how much I have endured for his Conservation and Honour, in recompence whereof I am this day in Bonds, and shut up in an obscure Prison, which I will never forget. Yea, and when my soul shall depart out of this body, he shall bear with her the remembrance of those benefits I have employed on him. These words spake he with a loud voice, desiring them to relate the same unto King Agrippa; who seeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in Prison.

After this, the King began to fortify the Walls of Jerusalem, on the side of the new Town, upon the common charge; encreasing them both in length and breadth: which if he might have thoroughly finished, it had been an invincible Fort. But Marfus the Governour of Syria, acquainted Cesar what the work was; and Claudius suspecting some Commotion, wrote expressly to Agrippa, commanding him thence-forward to desist from further building of the Walls, according to that form wherein he began; whereunto he would not disobey. This King Agrippa was of nature so ready to exercise Liberty, and

A and took so great pleasure to use his magnificence towards all sorts of Nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to show courteousie unto all men, and to purchase good esteem, being every way different in nature and disposition from King Herod his Predecessor. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing, and irreconcilable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loved the Grecians better than the Jews. For he beautified those Cities that belonged to strangers, and gave them money, and erected them Baths, and sumptuous Theatres, and Temples, and in some of them Galleries: but as for the Cities of the Jews, he bestowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise King Agrippa was very courteous and affable, and equally imparted his bounty unto all men. He was courteous unto strangers, any testified no less by the bounty he bestowed on them. To his Country-men he behaved himself affably, and especially he was merciful to all those that were in misery. For which cause his ordinary Court, and the place he took most pleasure in, was Jerusalem. He was a diligent observer of the Laws of his Country, and lived religiously, and with as great piety as was possible: Neither passed there one day, wherein he offered not Sacrifice. It happened at one time, that a certain cunning Lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Jerusalem; had assembled the people by reason of the King's absence, who for the present was in Caesarea: In which Assembly he alledged many things against him, that he was a prophane man, and that upon just cause he was forbidden to enter the Temple, in that it was not lawful nor decent for those that were unclean to enter therein. These words of Simon's, thus wrongfully spoke against him, were signified to the King by Letters sent by the Governour of the City: When therefore, he fate him down in the Theatre, he commanded that very Simon to sit next him; and in peaceable and kind manner, he spake thus unto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what seest thou worthy of reprehension, or done contrary to Law, in that which is done here? Simon having not any thing to reply; besought him to pardon him. The King grew friends with him far sooner than it could be imagined; resolving with himself, that mercy doth far better become a King than wrath; and that moderation is more requisite, than cruelty; so that after he had bestowed certain Presents on Simon, he dismissed him. Now, although he had many reparations in divers places, yet he honoured those of Berith above all the rest, and builded there a Theatre surpassing all other in sumptuousness and beauty: And besides that, he made them a sumptuous Amphitheatre, and Baths, and Porches no ways inferior. The Dedication also, of these things were celebrated with great pomp and magnificence; he also made great Shews and Plays in the Theatre, in which there were all sorts of Musick and Recreations; expressing in all things the greatness of his Magnificence; and being desirous to delight the people with a Combat, he gathered all the Malefactors that he could get, and made two several Companies of seven hundred a piece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmishing they might receive their punishment; and besides, that by this Warlike Exercise, he might prevent the people with a Past-time, concluded with the punishment of wicked men; for they fought so desperately, that not one of them came off alive.

After that he had finished these above-named Buildings in Berith, he resorted to Tiberias, a City of Galilee, and was admired of all the other Kings, so that Antiochus King of Comagena came to visit him: The like did Samsigeran, King of the Emefians, Cotys King of Armenia the less, and Polemon Lord of Pontus: And besides all these, Herod Prince of Chalcis, and his Brother: All whom he received and entertained most magnificently and amiably, to shew his greatness; to the end, that all men might perceive that he was deservedly honoured with the presence of so many Kings. And whilst these Princes were with him, Marfus the Governour of Syria visited him likewise, whom, to the end he might express the reverence he bare to the Romans, he met with, seven furlongs off from the City. This interview of so many Kings, was the original of that discontent that grew betwixt him and Marfus; who seeing all those Kings that came to see Agrippa, sitting in the same Chariot with him, suspected such Concord and so great Amity; supposing that this agreement of so many Kings, would be no ways profitable or beneficial to the Romans. For which cause he presently sent unto them, charging them with all expedition, to return each of them into their own Countreys: Which strict Commission, Agrippa took so ill, that he never had any kindness for Marfus afterwards. He took the Priesthood from Matthias, and gave it to Elioneus the Son of Cibebus. After he had reigned three whole years over Judaea, he came to Caesarea, which in times past, was called the Tower of Straton; and there he made Sports in honour nour of Cæsar, where all the Nobility of the Country was present. On the second day H of this Solemnity, he being apparelled in a Robe of Silver, made with admirable Workmanship; came into the Theatre in the morning: Where at the first reflex of the rising Sun beating upon his Robe, he shined so bright, that all those that beheld him were seized with reverence and fear. Whereupon, a company of base Sycophants (whose flatteries do usually poyson the hearts of Princes) cried out thus: Be merciful unto us; hitherto we have feared thee as a man, but hence-forward we will confess and acknowledge thee to be of a Nature more excellent than Mortal Frailty can attain unto. Agrippa reproved them not for using these words; neither rejected he their palpable and detestable Flattery, as he ought to have done. But not long after, he looking upwards, perceived an Owl over his head, perched upon a cord, and knew presently, that he was but a messenger of his misfortune; whereas formerly he had denounced unto him his felicity, and conceived thereupon a most hearty and inward grief: And suddenly he was seized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemency: For which cause, turning his eyes towards his friends, he spake unto them after this manner: Behold him (said he) whom you esteem for a God, condemned to die; and destiny shall apparently convince you of those flattering and false speeches, which you have lately used in my behalf: For I, who by you have been adored as one immortal, am under the hands of death. But I must willingly entertain that which God pleaseth to send me: For I have not lived in obscurity, but in so great and wonderful felicity, that each one of you have beld me happy.

Whilst he spake thus, his griefs augmented in such sort, that he was brought almost to his last; for which cause, he was with all expedition conveyed into his Royal Palace, and the rumour was spread in every place, that very shortly he would be dead. For which cause the people, with their Wives and Children, put on Sack-cloth, according to the custom of the Country, to the end they might solicit God's Mercy on the King's behalf; and all the City was filled with tears and lamentations. The King that lay in an upper Chamber, and looking down into the Court, saw them lying thus on the earth, could not refrain from tears. And after he had, for the space of five days without ceasing, been tormented with griping in his belly, he gave up the Ghost, in the fifty fourth year of his Age, and the seventh year of his Reign: for he had reigned four years under the Empire of Cæsar (having first of all governed Philip's Tetrarchy three years, to which was added the Segniory of Herod in the fourth year) and three years under the Empire of Claudius Cæsar; during which time he governed over the above-named Countreys; and moreover, over Judea, Samaria and Cæsarea. His Revenue amounted to twelve hundred Myriades; besides which, he made many Loans. For in regard he was very liberal in giving, he spent far more than his Revenue; and spared not any thing to shew himself magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his Brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the King's Lieutenant and Friend, agreed between themselves to send Aristo, one of their trustiest Servants, to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had been commanded by the King.

Thus died King Agrippa, leaving behind him a Son called Agrippa, seventeen years old; and three Daughters, one of which, that was called Bernice, was married to Herod, his Father's Brother, when she was sixteen years old: The two other were Mariamme and Drusilla; this Mariamme being of the age of ten years, was promised in marriage by her Father, to Julius Archelaus, Chelcias's Son; and Drusilla, which was six years old, was promised also to Epiphanes, Son to the King of Comagena.

After Agrippa's death, they of Cæsarea and Sebaste forgot those benefits they had received from him; and used him no less despitefully, than as if he had been their utter enemy: For they reproachfully abused him after his death, and reviled him in such sort, that it is unseemly to report the same. Moreover, all the Soldiers, who were at that time many in number; went into the King's Lodging, and with one accord seized the Statues of the King's Daughters, and carried them to the Brothel-house; where, after they had placed them, they uttered all the indignities they could possibly; practising such shameful matters, as they may not be expressed. Besides this, resting themselves in the publick places, they banquetted in the open Street, wearing Chaplets of Flowers on their heads, and perfuming themselves with Odours, to sacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for joy that the King was dead. Thus they expressed their ingratitude, not only towards their King Agrippa, who had bestowed so many Liberalities on them; but also towards Herod, his Grand-father, who had builded their Cities, and to his extrem charge, erected their Ports and Temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceased Agrippa's Son, was at Rome, and was brought up under the Emperour Claudius. When Cæsar understood how those of Cæsarea and Sebaste had injuriously dealt with

Agrippa,

Agrippa, he was highly displeased, and moved with their ingratitude: And his purpose was, to send the younger Agrippa with all expedition, to take Possession of the Kingdom of his Father, and therewithal to discharge him of his Oath; but divers of his Free-men and Friends, who were in great credit with him, dissuaded him from it; alleging that it would be a dangerous thing to commit the greatness of such a Kingdom to a young man, who scarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteen years; and for whom it was impossible to support the care of so great a Kingdom, considering that if he were at man's estate, he should find himself over-burthened with the charge of a Kingdom. This advice of theirs was approved by Cæsar, and for this cause he sent Cuspius Fadus to govern Judea, and the whole Realm; honouring his dead Friend in this, in that he would not suffer Marius, who had been his Enemy, to enter into his Kingdom. He gave especial Commission also, that Fadus should sharply punish those of Cæsarea and Sebaste, for the injuries they offered to his deceased Friend, and the excess that was committed against his Daughters who were yet living; and the exco-municed him to transport the Companies of the Cæsarians and Sebastens, and the five Roman Legions into the Country of Pontus to serve in that place, and to take those Roman Soldiers that bare Arms in Syria, to serve there: Yet, notwithstanding this Command, they were not displaced; for they sent Ambassadors to Claudius to appease him, and by this means they obtained the favour to remain in Judea. After this, they gave beginning to those most grievous mischiefs and calamities that befell the Jews; for they spread the Seed of the War which was awakened under Florus's Government. And for that cause, after that Vespasian had obtained the Victory, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that Province, and made them seek their Habitation elsewhere.

C H A P. I.

- The Emperor Claudius taketh the Government of Syria from Marſus, and giveth it to Longinus. Fadus, Governour of Judæa, puniſheth ſome ſeditious People, and Robbers who diſturb'd the Province: He commands the Jews to carry back the High Prieſt's Veſtment, to the Fort Antonia; but the Emperor giveth them leave to keep them at young Agrippa's requeſt: He was King Agrippa the Great's Son, and was then at Rome.

- After King Agrippa's deceaſe (as we have heretofore declared in our former Book) the Emperor Claudius ſent Caſſius Longinus the year of the World, 4009, after Chriſt's life time, to ſucceed Marſus in the Government of Syria, whom he deprived of that Honour in memory of Agrippa; who, during his life time, had oftentimes required by Letters, that he ſhould not ſuffer Marſus to govern the State of Syria. As ſoon as Caſſius Fadus came into Jewry, to take charge of that Countrey, which he was to govern under Ceſar; he found the Jews that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan in an uproar, who had taken Arms againſt the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certain Village, called Miſa, which was ſtored with valiant men. Thoſe who inhabit beyond Jordan, had armed themſelves in this manner, without the conſent of their Governours; and had killed a great number of the Philadelphians: Which when Fadus underſtood, he was much diſpleaſed, for that they had not referred the cauſe to his hearing, and complained to him of the take up Arms. Having therefore apprehended ſome three of them, who had been Authors of the Sedition, he commanded them to Priſon, and executed one of them called Annibis; and baniſhed the other two, whoſe names were Amram and Eleazar. Not long after this, Tolomeus the Captain of the Thieves was alſo taken, and brought unto him, who commanded him to be executed, for having committed many Robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this means all the Countrey of Judæa was cleared of all Thieves, by the care and providence of Fadus. After this, he ſent for the High Prieſts, and the Governours of Jeruſalem, commanding them, according to the Emperor's direction, to deliver up into the Caſtle of Antonia the Sacred Robe, which the High Prieſt only was accuſtomed to wear; to the end, that it might be at the Romans diſpoſal, as in times paſt it had been. They durſt not contradit his Command, yet notwithſtanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Jeruſalem with a great power, for fear the Jews, by reaſon of this Injunction ſhould raiſe a Rebellion) firſt, that it may be lawful for them to ſend their Ambaſſadors unto Ceſar, to beſeech him that the Sacred Robe might remain in their cuſtody. Secondly, that it might pleaſe them to expect the answer which Ceſar would return to their requeſt. Fadus gave them this answer, that he permitted them to ſend their Ambaſſadors to Rome, provided, that before-hand they delivered him their Children for Hoſtages; which when they had readily performed, the Ambaſſadors were ſent away. Now, when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his Son that lately died) knowing the cauſe of their coming, and being ordinarily accuſtomed to attend upon Ceſar (according as we have heretofore declared) beſought Ceſar that he would grant the Jews their requeſt, concerning the Sacred Robe; and that it might pleaſe him to ſignifie no leſs unto Fadus. On this his Petition Claudius gave the Ambaſſadors Audience, and told them that he favoured their ſuit; deſiring them to be thankful to Agrippa, upon whoſe ſuit he reſpected them; and granted their Demands: And beſides this Answer, he delivered them a Letter to this effect.

- Claudius Ceſar Germanicus, Conſerver of the people, Conſul created the fifth time, Emperor the fourth time, Father of the Countrey the tenth time; to the Magiſtrates of Jeruſalem, the Senate, People, and all the Nation of the Jews.

Being required by our well beloved Agrippa, whom I both have, and at this preſent do bring up with me; I have heard your Ambassadors, who were admitted to my Presence by his means; and have received their thanks for the benefits I have bestowed on your Nation: I have also willingly inclined to that instant and express request you have made unto me, and it is my pleasure, that the Sacred Robe of the High Priest, and the Holy Miter remain in your custody, in such manner, as our most dear and right honoured Friend Vitellius before ordained: To which demand of yours, I would have my allowance; first in regard of mine own Piety, and that I desire that every one should serve God according to his own Religion. Moreover, in so doing, I shall gratify King Herod and young Aristobulus, whose liberty to have affection towards me I am privy to, and whose good inclination towards you I can witness; for whom I have a particular kindness, by reason of their singular Virtue. I have also written to this effect to Cuspius Fadus mine Agent: the names of those who have received my Letters, are Cornelius the Son of Ceron, Tryphon the Son of Theudon, Dorotheus the Son of Nathanael, and John the Son of John. Given the eight and twentieth of June, in the year wherein Rufus and Pompeius Silvanus were Consuls. At the same time Herod, who was Agrippa's Brother that had lately deceased, to whose hands in times past the Government of Chalcis had been committed; required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power over the Temple, and the Sacred Vestments, and the Authority of chusing the High Priest; all which he obtained: And from that time forward, until the end of the War of the Jews, this power remained in all his Successors. According to this Authority, Herod deposed Canbara from the Priesthood, and gave the Succession thereof to Joseph the Son of Canes.

C H A P. II.

Izates, King of Adiabena, and Queen Helena his Mother, embrace the Religion of the Jews: Their singular Piety; and the great Actions of this Prince, whom God protected wisely. Fadus, Governour of Judæa, punisheth a man and his followers, who deceived the Jews.

At that time Helena Queen of Adiabena, and her Son Izates conformed themselves to the Religion of the Jews, upon this occasion that ensued: Monobazus King of Adiabena, who was also called Bazeos, having fallen deeply in love with his Sister Helena, married her, and got her with Child. Upon a time it happened, that sleeping with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whilst she lay asleep; and he thought that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, lest he should crush the Fruit that was therein, which by God's Providence should have a happy beginning, and no less fortunate ending. Monobazus was much troubled at this voice, and as soon as he awoke, he told it to his Wife; and afterwards, when the Child was born, he called him Izates. Besides, he had another elder Son by the same Wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his own name. And he had also other Sons by his other Wives; yet notwithstanding, Izates was most manifestly his best beloved, and so cherished by him, as if he had been his only begotten Son; for which cause, his other Brothers envied him. The Father manifestly perceived all this, yet he pardoned them; knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the desire that every one of them had to be best esteemed by his Father. Notwithstanding, being afraid lest some mishap should betide Izates, by reason of the hatred his Brethren bare unto him, he gave him many great Gifts, and sent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a Fort called Spasinus; committing his Son's life into his hands. Abemerigus also, entertained him very kindly; and loved him so, that in process of time he gave him Samacha his Daughter to Wife; and for her Dowry, he gave him a Countrey of great Revenue.

Monobazus being old, and seeing he had not long time to live, desired before his death, that his Son might come and visit him; he therefore sent for him, and received him very lovingly, giving him a Countrey which he called Ceron, which bringeth forth great abundance of Odoriferous Plants. In this place was the remainder of the Ark, in which Noah was saved, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be seen at this day, if any man have a desire to behold the same. Izates remained in that place, until his Father's decease. But on the very day of his death, Helena sent for all the Lords and Governours of the Kingdom, and Captains of all the Army, and upon their assembly, the spake unto them after this manner:

I suppose (said she) that you are not ignorant of my Husband's mind, who hath desired that

Izates

Izates might be King in his stead, and hath esteemed him most worthy of such an honour: yet I expect your judgment in this point. For he that receiveth the Sovereignty, not from one man's hand, but from many, and hath the same conferred unto him by their consent, is happy. She used this discourse unto them to try what their intent was, who were there assembled. They understanding her mind, prostrated themselves first of all upon the earth before the Queen, according to the custom of their Country, and afterwards answered her, that they approved the Kings election, and took pleasure to obey Izates, whom his Father deservedly, and to all their contents and the desire of the common people had preferred above the rest of his Brethren: alleging moreover, that they would put his Brethren and Kinsmen to death before his coming, to the end that he might enjoy the Kingdom with all security: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred and envie might be extinguished. Hereunto the Queen answered; that she gave them thanks for the favour they bare unto her and her Son Izates: notwithstanding she required them to suspend their judgments touching the death of his Brethren, until such time as Izates himself should give his consent thereto.

They seeing they might not obtain the liberty to put them to death, were of opinion that they should be kept prisoners until his coming, to the end that they might do him no harm in his absence; and that moreover, until his coming there might one be appointed to govern the State, whom the should esteem most truly and faithful unto him. Whereunto Helena consented, and made his elder Brother Monobazus King, and set the Diadem on his head, and gave him his Fathers Seal-ring, with that Robe which they call Sampera; exhorting him to govern the Kingdom until his Brothers arrival. Izates having certain notice of his Fathers death, related thither speedily, and receiving his Brother Monobazus willing surrender, took upon him the Government of the Kingdom.

Whilst Izates was in the Fortresses of Spasinus, a certain Merchant who was a Jew, called Ananias, having access to the Kings wives, taught them the manner how to serve God according to the Religion of the Jews: and Ananias by their means growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena; being drawn thereunto by his earnest intreaties, when Izates resorted thither upon his Fathers sending for. It chanced also that Helena was in like manner instructed by another Jew, and retained the Rites and Religion of the Jews.

After that Izates came into his Kingdom, and knew that his Brethren and Kinsfolk were imprisoned, he was much grieved, Conceiving therefore with himself that it would be a great impiety in him to suffer them to be put to death, or kept in prison; and that on the other side, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they should remember the evil they had endured: for this cause he sent some of them to Rome for Hostages with their Children unto the Emperour Claudius, and the rest unto Artabanus King of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thoroughly assured that his Mother was wholly addicted to the Religion of the Jews, he endeavoured the more to shew himself zealous therein; and supposing that he could not be a perfect Jew, except he were circumcised, he prepared himself to be circumcised. Which when his Mother understood, the endeavoured to her uttermost to hinder his resolution, assuring him that in so doing he should bring himself in great danger; for that in being King, he would draw himself into the dislike of his Subjects, if they should have notice that he was addicted to a new Religion, and to strange Ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that being a Jew, he should be their King: so she for a while by her dissuasion restrained him from his desire. But the King required of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the course of her dislike, threatened Izates, that if he would not obey his Mother, he would forsake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, lest if the matter should be publicly known, he should suffer some punishment, as being the only Author and Instructor of the King in unbecoming matters; that otherwise he might serve God, although he were not circumcised; since he had resolved to live according to the institution and Laws of the Jews, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true Religion consisteth more, than in circumcision of the body, though he were not actually circumcised, since the necessity and fear of his Subjects over-ruled him. By which words the King for that time was persuaded to proceed no further. But a little after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Jew called Eleazar, coming from Galilee, and accounted a Learned man in the Doctrine of our Religion, persuaded him to be circumcised. For coming one day unto him, to salute him, he found him reading of the Books of Moses, and said unto him; O King, contrary to your knowledge you offend the Law, and God likewise; for it saitheth you not, that you understand the same, but the chiefest matter you are tied unto, is to do that which the Law commandeth; how long therefore will you remain uncircumcised? And if as yet you have not received the Law as touching this point, read it now, to the end you may know what great impiety it is to omit it.

After the King had heard this, he would no longer defer his Circumcision: for which cause withdrawing himself into another chamber, he called a Surgeon unto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his Mother and Master Ananias unto him, he told them what had past: whereupon they grew strangely amazed, fearing the King should be in danger to lose his Kingdom, if this action of his should come to light; for that his Subjects would not endure, that such a man that followed a contrary Religion should be their King: They feared also, lest they themselves should be in danger, forasmuch as the cause of all this matter would be imputed to them. But God by his Providence prevented left any of those things which they feared should come to pass: for he delivered Isates himself and his Children likewise out of many dangers, yielding them his assistance in their doubtful and desperate conditions, declaring in effect that those that only put their trust in him, and depend upon his Providence, are never deprived of the fruit of their Piety. But of these things we will speak hereafter.

When Helena the Kings Mother perceived that the state of the Kingdom was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and strangers, her Son was reported happy by the good will of God, she was seized with a desire to go and visit the City of Jerusalem, and adore God in the Temple, which was so much renowned through the whole world, and offer Sacrifice of Thanksgiving therein; for which cause she besought her Son that he would suffer her to perform her Vows; who willingly condescended to her desire, and furnished her royally with all things that were necessary for such a Voyage; giving her a great Sum of Money with her, and bringing her on her way many days journey: so that at length he arrived in Jerusalem, to the great advantage of the Inhabitants of that City. For at that time the City was oppressed with a grievous famine, so that many died for want of food; for which cause Queen Helena sent her servants, some into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of Corn, the rest into Cyprus to buy dried Figs, who returned with all expedition they might; whereupon Helena distributed the Viduals amongst the poor, leaving a singular memory of her Liberality to the whole Nation. Her Son Isates also understanding of this Famine, sent a great sum of Money to the Governour of Jerusalem. But hereafter I will declare what other benefits the King and Queen have bestowed upon our Nation.

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiving that the Princes of the Kingdom had conspired against him, resolved with himself to go unto Isates, for the security of his person, hoping by that means, if it were possible to recover his Kingdom. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thousand men of his Kinsfolk and domestick servants. And by the way he met with Isates, whom he knew very well by his Royal Train, notwithstanding he was unknown unto him by countenance. Drawing therefore near unto him, he first of all humbled himself on his knees, according to the custom of the Country, and afterwards spake unto him after this manner:

Dread Kings, forsake me not who am thy servant, neither reject thou my prayers. For being distressed by means of my misfortunes, and of a King become a private man, I have need of thy succour. Consider therefore the inconstancy of fortune, and think with thy self, that by providing for me, thou shalt provide for thy self. For if thou makest no reckoning of the wrong that is done unto me, divers men will grow audacious to enterprize upon other Kings.

These words he pronounced with tears, and with looks fixed upon the ground. When Isates had heard Artabanus's name, and saw his humble and submissive condition, he leapt immediately from his Horse, and said unto him, King, be of good courage, and let not thy present and perplexed condition dishearten thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecoverable. For this sorrow of thine shall be suddenly changed, and thou shalt find a better friend and ally, than thou hopest for at this time: For either I will restore thee of thy Kingdom of Parthia, or I will lose mine own. This said, he caused Artabanus to get on Horseback, and walked by him on foot, yielding him this honour, as to a greater King than himself. Which when Artabanus saw, he was discontented, and swore by his Honour and Fortune to come, that he would set foot on ground, if he would not get up on horseback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting upon his Horse again, he conducted him to his Palace; yielding him all the honor that was possible, both in his Banquets and in his Assemblies, not regarding his present condition, but his former Dignity: considering with himself, that such casual misfortunes

Isates comforteth Artabanus, and promitteth him his assistance.

Artabanus reiteth himself to Isates and requirith his assistance.

Helena the Queen of Adiabene resorteth to Jerusalem. Antias cap. 6.

They that rely on God, and put their confidence in him, do always reap the reward of their Piety.

A misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Moreover he wrote unto the Parthians, perswading them to receive their King Artabanus, alluring them on his Faith and Oath, that he would obtain a free pardon for all that which was past, and to that intent he offered himself to be an Arbitrator between them. The Parthians gave him this answer, that they would not refuse to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus was advanced in his place and Dignity, and that they feared lest a Sedition should happen amongst them. Cinnamus who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was such, wrote himself unto Artabanus, who had nourished and brought him up, exhorting him to return upon his Faith, and to receive again his own Kingdom. Artabanus upon this Motion gave credit to his words, and returned back again. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and prostrating himself before his feet, called him King; and afterwards taking the Diadem from off his own head, he set it upon Artabanus head; who by this means was restored to his former estate by Isates mediation, after he had been driven out of his Kingdom by his chiefest Nobility. And he did not forget the favours which he had received at Isates hands, but did him all the honour that possibly he could imagine: for he permitted him to wear the straight Tiara, and to sleep upon a gilded Bed, which is a Privilege which belongeth only to the Kings of Parthia. He gave him also a plentiful and great Country which he had taken from the King of Armenia. This Country was called Nisibis, where in times past the Macedonians had builded the City of Antioch, by them called Mysdonia.

C Presently after Isates was thus honoured, Artabanus died, leaving his Kingdom to his Son Vardanes; who repaired to Isates, praying him to joyn with him in that War which he intended to make against the Romans; but he prevailed not with him. For Isates knowing the Romans force and good fortune, imagined that he undertook a matter beyond his power. Besides, he had sent five of his young Sons to Jerusalem to learn our tongue and discipline, and his Mother likewise to adore in the Temple, for which cause he the rather held back and disswaded Vardanes from going against the Romans, whose power and conquests he ordinarily reckoned up unto him, to the end he might discourage him, and by these assertions cause him to give over his purpose. D He did not think of war against them. But the Parthian was displeased with his perswasion, and for that cause denounced a present War against Isates. But his enterprize had but a fruitless issue; for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians understanding what Vardanes intent was, and how he was resolved to make a War against the Romans killed him, and gave the Kingdom to his Brother Gotarza, whom not long after this, his Brother Vologesius killed by treason, restoring to his two Brothers by the Mothers side these Provinces, that is to say, the Kingdom of Media to Pacorus who was the eldest, and Armenia to Tridates who was the younger.

E When Monobazus King Isates's Brother and the rest of his Kinsfolk saw how happily all things succeeded to Isates, and how in respect of his Piety towards God, he was honoured and revered by all men, they also resolved themselves to forsake their Religion, and to serve God after the manner of the Jews. But this intent of theirs was discovered. Whereupon the chiefest amongst them grew displeased; yet they did not manifest their delight, but kept it hidden in their hearts, expecting some fit occasion to revenge themselves as soon as they might. They wrote also to Abias King of Arabia, and promised him great sums of money, if he would take Arms against their King, promising him upon the first charge, they would forsake him, for that they desired to be revenged on him, for having forsaken their Religion. Having therefore confirmed their promise with an Oath, they incited him to make haste. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth against Isates with a great power. And when the first charge was ready to be given, and before they came to blows, all Isates Soldiers forsook him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great disorder, as if they had been surprized with a Panick fear; yet was Isates no ways daunted; but having discovered that it was treason and conspiracy of his greatest Peers, he retired also into his Camp, where he enquired of the Cause that they pretended. After he knew that they had plotted with the Arabian, he caused the Conspirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and killed a great number of his enemies, and constrained the rest to betake them to flight. He pursued their King also into a Fort called Arfani, which he battered and assaulted with such vigour and diligence, that he took the same with a great quantity of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabene with great triumph: but he took not Abias alive, for he himself had prevented his captivity with his death. The Lords of Adiabene seeing themselves frustrated of their former hopes, in A certain Soldier found a Book of the Law of Moses in one of those Villages, which he took and brought, and before them all, tore it in pieces, with horrid Blaphemies, and vile speeches against the Law and whole Nation. The Jews understanding hereof, suddenly assembled themselves in great numbers, and ran to Cesarea, where Cumanus kept for that present, requiring him that he would revenge, not their cause, but God's, whose Law was on that sort dishonoured; signifying unto him, that it was impossible for them to live, so long as their Law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing lest a second mutiny and uproar should be raised among the people, by counsel of his Friends, cut off the Soldier's head, who had committed that Crime against the Law; and by Cumanus's this means appeased the Sedition that was ready to take head.

C H A P. V.

A great Quarrel between the Jews of Galilee, and the Samaritans, who bribe Cumanus Governor of Judaea: Quadratus, Governor of Syria, sends him to Rome with Ananias the High Priest, and several others, to clear themselves before the Emperor; who put some of them to death. The Emperor condemns the Samaritans, and banisheth Cumanus; maketh Felix Governor of Judaea; giveth Agrippa the Tetrarchy that Philip had, viz. Bathanea, Trachonitis and Abila; and maketh Chalcis from him. The Marriage of Agrippa's Sisters. The death of the Emperor Claudius. Nero succeeds after him: He giveth the Lesser Armenia to Artabodanus, Herod's Son, King of Chalcis; and to Agrippa, some part of Galilee, viz. Tiberiades, Tarichee and Juliad.

 There happened also a quarrel betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews, upon this occasion: They of Galilee, who resorted to the City of Jerusalem at the times of our solemn Feasts, were accustomed to pass thorough the Contrey of the Samaritans. And at that time it happened, that their way lay thorough a Burrough called Nais, situated in a great Champain Field: where a Quarrel arising betwixt divers Inhabitants of that place, and some Passengers, a great number of the Galileans were murdered. Which when the Magistrates of Galilee understood, they resorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute Justice on those that had murdered their Country-men; but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritans, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being provoked by this Contempt of his, perswaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their Weapons, and maintain their Liberty; telling them, that slavery is of it self very harsh; but that when it is accompanied with injuries, it is intolerable. But their Magistrates endeavoured to pacify them, promising them to deal so effectually with Cumanus, that he should punish the Murderers; but they gave them no Audience, but fell to Arms, requiring Eleazar the Son of Dinnus to be their Leader. This Eleazar was a Thief, who for many years made his abode in the Mountains; they therefore spoiled and burnt certain Villages of the Samaritans. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus's ears, he took some Troops out of Sebastee, with four Companies of Foot, and armed the Samaritans likewise, to go and fight against the Jews; whereof they killed many, and led more of them away Prisoners. When the chiefeft Magistrates of Jerusalem saw into that a number of miseries they were fallen, they clothed themselves in Sack-cloth, and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous, to consider, that if they did not lay down Arms, and return peaceably to their own homes, they would be the cause of their Country's utter ruine; that they should fee the Temple burnt before their eyes, and themselves, their Wives and Children, made Slaves. By which words, in the end, they being perswaded, returned home, and betook them to their business. The Thieves also retired again into their strong Holds, and from that time, all Judaea was full of Robberies. The Governors of Samarita resorted to Numidius Quadratus, Governor of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre; to accuse the Jews, for that they had fired their Villages, and plundered them; telling him, that their loss did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romans were contemned by the Jews; who notwithstanding, ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet, nevertheless, that they assembled themselves, as if the Romans were not their Superiors. For which cause they addressed themselves to him, to the end, they might have redress of those wrongs which they had received by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritans charged the Jews, who answered to the contrary,

 A trary, alledging that the Samaritans themselves had been the Authors of that mutiny and uproar; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money had smothered the matter, and done no justice on the Murderers. When Quadratus heard this, he reserved the judgment till another time, telling them that he would give sentence in the matter when he came into Judaea, and had examined the truth on both sides; so that they returned without doing any thing.
 Shortly after, Quadratus came into Samarita, where he heard that the Samaritans had been the Authors of the trouble, and on the other side knowing that some Jews likewise intended some insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence he transported himself to Lydda, which is a Burrough of no less bigness than a City: in which place he sitting on his Tribunal Seat, heard the Samaritans the second time, and discovered by the report of a certain Samaritan, that one Dortus one of the chiefeft among the Jews, and four other his Confederates induced the people to rebel against the Romans. Quadratus caused them to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the High Priest, and the Captain Ananias, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperor Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governors both of the Samaritans and Jews, that they should speedily repair to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celer should conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cesar himself, upon the information taken on both sides. And fearing lest the common people of the Jews should break out into some Rebellion, he repaired to the City of Jerusalem, to give order that the Jews should attempt to raise no new stir; but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the Feast, and offering Sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed Ceremonies. Being therefore assured that no man would rebel in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.
 But the Jews that were sent to Rome with Cumanus and the principal Samaritans had a day assigned them by the Emperor to decide the differences that were between them. Cumanus and the Samaritans endeavoured all that they might by the mediation of Cesar's friends and freemen, to have the upper hand of the Jews; and indeed the day had been theirs if young Agrippa had not been at Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disadvantage of the Jews, besought Agrippina the Emperor's Wife, that she would prevail so with her Husband, that he would be pleased to take full knowledge of that which was done; and that afterwards he should execute due justice on those whom he found guilty of that sedition. Claudius favourably gave ear to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritans were the first Authors of all those mischiefs, and caused them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and banished Cumanus: he gave order also that Captain Celer should be sent back to Jerusalem, and that there in sight of all the people he should be dragged about the City, until he died. He sent Claudius Felix, Pallas Brother, to govern Judaea.

 In the twelfth year of his Reign, he gave Agrippa, Philip's Tetrarchy, with Bathanea & Trachonitis and Abila, which in time past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the space of four years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cesar's hands, he married his sister Druisilla to Azizus King of the Emeseniens, who consented to be circumcised, because Epiphanes, King Antiochus Son would not give ear unto the marriage, for that he refused to entertain the Religion of the Jews, although in times past he had promised his Father no less. He gave Mariamne to Archelaus, Clelianus Son, who by her Fathers consent was formerly promised him, on whom he begat a Daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the Marriage of Azizus and Druisilla was broken off on this occasion following: When Felix governed Jewry, he saw Druisilla and fell in love with her, she surpassing all other women in Beauty. He therefore sent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greatest friends among the Jews, who perswaded her to forsake her first Husband, and to marry Felix, giving her to understand that the should be happy, if she refused not this match. She unadvised, and resolved to rid her self from the hatred which her Sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this cause ceased not to injure her) condescended to forsake the Religion of the Jews, and to marry Felix, by whom she had a Son called Agrippa; whose death hereafter I will declare, and how in the Emperor Titus's time he died, and was burned in the fire of the Mountain Vesuvius with his Wife. Bernice remained a Widow, very long after Herod's death, who was both her Uncle and her Husband, and the report was that he had the company of her Brother. At length the wrought so much, that H Polemon King of Cilicia caused himself to be circumcised, to the end he might marry her, purposing by that means to make it known how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gave ear because the was rich. But this Marriage continued not any long time: For Bernice through her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giving over that Marriage forsook also the Religion of the Jews. At the same time Mariamne having forsaken Archelaus her Husband, married Demetrius, one of the chiefest Jews that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his descent, as also his riches; who at that time also exercised the office of Alabarcha, that is to say, the Governour of Arabia. She caused the Son he had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this I will speak more exactly hereafter.

The Emperor Claudius died after he had reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and twenty days. Some say that he was poisoned by Agrippina his wife the daughter of Germanicus, Claudius's Brother. She was first married to Domitius Enobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome; after whose death and long Widowhood, she was at length married to Claudius, into whose house she brought her Son called Domitius, by his own Fathers name. Claudius had put Messalina his wife to death, for the jealousy he had of her; although he had had children by her, namely Britannicus and Othavia: And for his daughter Antonia, who was the eldest of all his children and begotten on Pætina one of his former Wives, she was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his Son. Agrippina, fearing lest Britannicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his Father in the Empire, and desirous to make her own Son Emperor, as is reported; she left nothing unattempted that might bring her Husband to his death; and presently sent Burrus, who was General of the Army, with some other Captains, and those of the greatest power among his free-men, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaim him Emperor. He being thus established in the Empire, caused Britannicus to be secretly poisoned; and not long after this, he openly caused his Mother to be put to death, yielding her this recompence, not only for that she had born him in her womb, but also because by her means he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murdered Othavia his wife, the Emperor Claudius's daughter, and divers other Noble men, under colour of some Conspiracy intended against him. But I will not prosecute this matter, for that there are divers who have writ Nero's History; of whom some have no regard of the truth, but have spoken at their pleasure, for that he had been their Benefactor: others transported with hatred and despite against him, having not been ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renown, that they deserve to be condemned. Neither do I wonder that they have invented so many lies against Nero, considering that in those Histories which they wrote of the former Emperours, they have not studied to speak truth, although they had not any occasion to hate them, considering that they lived a long time after their death. For my own part I am resolved never to deviate from the truth, contenting myself to touch only by the way those things that concern my purpose; neither will I treat in particular but of what relateth to my Country, without dissembing our own faults any more than the afflictions that they brought upon us. I will therefore return to the discovery of our affairs. Azizus King of Emesene being dead the first year of the Emperor Nero's reign, his Brother obtained the Kingdom: Aristobolus the son of Herod King of Chalcis, had the Government of the lesser Armenia from Nero, who gave Agrippa a certain portion of Galilee, commanding those of Tiberias and Tarichea to live under him. Besides this, he gave him Julius situate beyond Jordan, with fourteen Burroughs near adjoining thereunto.

CHAP. VI.

Felix, Governour of Judæa, causeth Eleazar the High Priest to be murdered; and his Murderers commit other Murthers, even in the Temple. Robbers and False Prophets are punished. A great debate betwixt the Jews, and the other Inhabitants of Cæsarea. King Agrippa establisheth Ilhmael High Priest. Violences committed by the High Priests.

Alias cap. 16.
Felix punisheth the thieves and Magicians, and other seducers of the people.
Eleazar the son of Dinnus sent to Rome.

But the affairs of Judæa grew daily worse and worse: For the Country was stored again with Thieves and inchanters, who deceived the common People. Felix apprehended many of them daily, and caused them to be executed. He took Eleazar also the Son of Dinnus, who was Captain of those Outlaws and Thieves that ranged

A in the Country. Felix had given him his word, that he should no ways be endangered; whereupon he came and submitted himself, and was presently fettered and sent to Rome. Whereas the Governour hated excremely Jonathan the High Priest, because he used to find fault with him for his misbehaviours, left he should be blamed for him, because it was through his means, that the Emperour had made him Governour; he resolved to make an end of him; there being nothing more unprofitable to the wicked, than to be rebuked. To compass his design, he bribed a man called Dorcas, who was born in Jerusalem, and was one of those in whom Jonathan repaid his greatest trust; to bring in certain Thieves to murder Jonathan; who willingly listened to his demands: and desirous to gratifie the Governour, by this means that ensued, brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certain Thieves that came up to Jerusalem, under colour of Devotion; who carrying their Swords close hidden under their Garments, accosted Jonathan, and killed him. Now, for that this Murder was let slip, and not punished; from that day forward, the Thieves resorted boldly to solemn Feasts, having their weapons hidden under their garments, and thronging in among the people, killed some of those who were their Adversaries, and others, to pleasure those who had hired them with ready money to rid them of those they disliked. And they did so, not only up and down the City, but in the Temple likewise; where they killed some who little suspected that any impiety should be committed in that place. For my own part, I think that God hath destroyed our City, in detestation of that Impiety: and for that he accounted the Temple impure, he hath sent us the Romans, who have set it on fire to purge the City, and make us slaves, with our Wives and Children; intending thereby to teach us Wisdom by our own miseries. Thus was the City filled with these Thefts and Murthers. And as for the Enchanters and Deceivers, they persuaded the common people to follow them into the Desert, promising them to shew them signs and miracles done by the Power of God; whereunto divers gave ear, and at last suffered the penalty of their folly: For Felix recalling them back again, punished them.

At the same time there came a certain man from Egypt, to Jerusalem, who termed himself a Prophet; who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Olivet, situate not far off from Jerusalem, and only distant some few furlongs from the City; telling them, that from thence he would make them see the Walls of the City fall unto the ground, by which way he promised to give them entry: Which being reported to Felix, he caused the Soldiers to arm themselves; and departing out of Jerusalem with great store of Horse and Foot, he set upon them, and killed four hundred of them, and took too hundred alive; as for the Egyptian, he escaped out of the skirmish, and no man knew what became of him. The Thieves also, incited the people anew to make War against the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yield them obedience; and they burned and spoiled divers of those Burroughs, which opposed themselves against them. It chanced also, that the Jews that inhabited Cæsarea, mutined against the Syrians that were in the same City, in that they strove to have an equal Authority in the Government of the State as well as they. The Jews, pretending the Title of Superiority, because that Herod, who was a Jew, had builded the City of Cæsarea; on the other side, the Syrians owned the Jews sayings to be true; but they replied also, that Cæsarea was formerly called the Tower of Straton, and that the Syrians at that time there was not one Jew that inhabited the same. Which when the Governours of that Country heard, they laid hands on the Authors of this Sedition, as well of the one, as of the other party, and gave them the Bastinado; pacifying by this means, the trouble for a little space. For the Jews once more being puffed up with their Riches, and contemning the Syrians, injuriously reviled and provoked them: On the other side, the Syrians being weaker in substance, but as great in heart (by reason the greatest number of those that bare Arms with the Romans, were Cæareans and Sebastians) at some times brake out into opprobrious speeches against the Jews; and at length the quarrel grew to that heat, that they cast stones at one another, so that on both sides divers of them were both killed and hurt; yet the Jews had the upper hand. Felix perceiving that this debate might breed a War, came in between them, requiring the Jews to desist from further violence, and commanding his Soldiers to beat down those who would refuse to obey him; by which means a great number were killed, and divers taken Prisoners. Moreover, he gave his Soldiers liberty to spoil, and rob divers very rich houses. The other Jews, who, besides their Authority, were renowned for their moderation, fearing lest the like misery should befall them, besought Felix to found a retreat, and to call in his Soldiers, and to spare that which as yet remained, being fore grieved at that which had happened; to which Felix consented.

scended. At the same time King Agrippa gave the Priesthood to Ishmael, the Son of H phabens. There arose also a dissention betwixt the High Priests, and the other Priests and Governours of Jerusalem; and each Faction walked forth, accompanied with a Troop of proud and mutinous persons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of stones, so that no man might pacifie them: For all things were out of order, as if there had been no Magistrates in the City; and the impudency and audaciousness of the High Priests permitted so much, that they sent their Servants to the Barns, to seize the Tenth that were due unto the Priests; whereby it came to pass, that some poor Priests died for want; so much did the violence of the Seditious at that time prevail above all right.

C H A P. VII.

Festus succeeds Felix in the Government of Judæa. The Inhabitants of Cæsarea obtain of Nero to have the Jews Freedom recalled. King Agrippa causeth an Apartment to be built, from whence all that was done about the Temple might be seen; the people of Jerusalem cause a high Wall to be built to hinder it, by the Emperour's Authority.

Atter that Portius Festus had been sent by Nero to succeed Felix in the Government of Judæa, the chieftest of those Jews that inhabited Cæsarea, repaired to Rome to accuse Felix; and without all doubt he had been punished for the injuries he had committed against the Jews, if Nero had not pardoned him upon his Brother Palas's submission and entreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chieftest amongst the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had sometimes been Nero's Master, and at that time was Secretary of Elatte in the Greek Tongue, by mighty Bribes, to beg of Nero the revocation of the Right and Title which the Jews enjoyed in the Government and Administration of the Commonweal. For which cause Berillus solicited the Emperour, and obtained a Letter from him, which was the cause of those mischiefs that afterwards happened in our Nation; for the Jews of Cæsarea, understanding what Commission the Syrians had gotten, were so much the more encouraged to make War.

Therefore, as soon as Festus was arrived in Judæa, he found the Countrey grievously afflicted with Robberies, and the whole Countrey was ruined with Fire and Sword. The Thieves likewise at that time increased mightily; they used short Swords, after the manner of a Persian Cymetre, and crooked like the Roman Fauchion; with which they killed divers: For, thrusting themselves into the press of the people that came in great multitudes on the Festival days, to celebrate God's service, they killed those very easily whom they pleased; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies Villages, they spoiled and burnt them. But Festus sent divers Forces, both of Horse and Foot, against certain Jews that were seduced by an Enchanter, who had promised them to free them from all their troubles, if they would follow him into the Desert; they killed both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a stately Building within the Palace at Jerusalem, near unto the Porch. This Palace in times past appertained to the Almonians, and was situate in a high place, with a fine Prospect, from whence they might with pleasure behold the City of Jerusalem, wherein the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chieftest men of Jerusalem, seeing this Building, were very much displeased; for neither doth our Custom or Law permit that any one should look on that which is done in the Temple, and especially forbiddeth that any man should behold the Sacrifices and Oblations: They therefore builded a high Wall upon the Gallery, which was within the Temple on the West side, which did not only hinder the sight of the Royal Chamber, but also that of the Gallery without the Temple on the West side, where the Romans kept Guard near unto the Temple, on the Festival days. Herewith was King Agrippa highly displeased, and the Governour Festus far more than he, who commanded them to pull down the Wall: But they besought him that he would give them Licence to send their Ambassadors to Nero, to this intent; alleging that it was impossible for them to live, if any part of their Temple should be beaten down. Which being granted them, they sent ten of their chieftest Nobility, and with them Ishmael the High Priest, and Chelcias, the Treasurer of the Temple unto Nero; who no sooner heard their suit, but he pardoned them, not only for that they had done, but he commanded

that

A that the building should remain as it was. All which he did in favour of his Wife Poppæa, who was entreated by the Jews, the being a devout Princess, to sue for them. She therefore commanded the ten Ambassadors to return, and kept Chelcias and Ishmael for Pledges with her. The King understanding how all things had past, gave the High Priesthood to Joseph, surnamed Cabi, which was the Son of Simon, who in times past, had been High Priest.

C H A P. VIII.

B Albinus succeeds Festus in the Government of Judæa; and King Agrippa goeth and taketh away often the High Priesthood. Ananus the High Priest causeth saint James to be put to death. Agrippa enlargeth the City of Cæsarea, and calleth it Neronias. The Favours he granted to the Levites. The List of the High Priests since Aaron.

Cæsar being advertised of Festus's death, sent Albinus to govern Judæa. But King Agrippa commanded Joseph to lead a private life, and advanced in his stead a certain man called Ananus, the Son of Ananus, who was reported to have been most happy; for he had five Sons, all which supplied the place of the High Priest, after him self had long time before them enjoyed it; the like whereof hath never happened to any of our Priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was advanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the Sect of the Sadducees, who (as we have already declared) were amongst all other the Jews, the most severe in executing Justice: Whereas therefore, Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had fit occasion offered him to do what he pleased after Festus's death, and whilst Albinus was yet upon his way. He therefore ascended and sat down in the Tribunal, assisting by the Judges; and caused James, the Brother of JESUS, who was called CHRIST, to appear before him, with certain others, and accused them for transgressing the Law, and Blasphemy against God, and caused him to be stoned to death. They that were men of upright Conscience within the City, and diligent observers of the Law, were very much displeased with this Act; and sent secretly to the King, beseeching him to prohibit Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: For that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, being on his way to Alexandria, to inform him that it was unlawful for Ananus to assemble the Council without his Licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick Letter to Ananus, wherein he threatened to punish him. And for the same cause, King Agrippa dispossessed him of the Priesthood, after he had held the same for the space of three months; and in his stead he established Jesús the Son of Damianus. After that Albinus was arrived in Jerusalem, he employed all his care and study to pacifie the Country, by executing divers of the Thieves.

But the High Priest Ananias daily increased in honour and credit, and purchased the good will of the Citizens, by his liberality and great gifts. But he had some mischievous Servants about him, who conversed with those that were most intemperate and audacious; who repaired from Barn to Barn, and took up many Tithes that belonged to the Priests, and beat those that refused to render them. The Priests used no less violence than their servants, having no man that might restrain them; whereby it came to pass, that the Priests, who were formerly maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of Victuals. And the Thieves renewing their entrance into the City by night, during the Feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of Captain Elexar alive, who was Ananias's Son, who was the High Priest: And having bound him, he laid him out of the City; sending Ananias word, that they would deliver his Secretary, if he would prevail so much with Albinus, as to deliver them their ten Companions and Prisoners, who were taken by him. To the performance whereof, Ananias perswaded Albinus by manifest reasons; And by obtaining his demand, increased and begat a number of miseries. For the Thieves used all the cunning means they could devise, in apprehending some one of Ananias's house; and when they had taken any one of them alive, they would not deliver him, except before, they might have one of their own delivered. So that increasing both in courage and number, they became more and more insolent to afflict the Countrey.

G At that time King Agrippa enlarged the City of Cæsarea, surnamed Philippi; and in honour of Nero, called it Neronias. He builded also to his great charge, a Theatre in favour of the Berytians: He distributed Oyl and Corn for every one of the people, and hands.

adorned all the City with most antick and fine Portraits upon the Porches. In H short, he transported into that City almost all the Ornaments of the rest of the Kingdom: For which cause his Subjects began to hate him, seeing he deprived them of their rare Ornaments, to adorn one strange City. Jesus the Son of Gamaliel succeeded in the Priesthood, which the King had given him, and taken away from Jesus the Son of Dam- nas; who resigned him his place against his will. Whereupon, there arose a discord between them; for having assembled their resolute followers, they came from bitter words, to blows and stones. But amongst all the rest, Ananias was the richest in wealth, and by his bounty reconciled the more unto him. Cestobarnas also, and Saul, gathered each of them a Band of Rascals, and desperate men. These two were of the Blood-Royal; and by reason of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloved: For which cause they were insolent and violent, oppressing always the weaker sort. From this time forward the estate of our City grew desperate, encreasing daily more and more in wickedness.

When Albinus understood that Gessius Florus came to succeed him, desiring that they of Jerusalem should acknowledge some of his good deeds, he called before him all those Prisoners that were notoriously guilty of Murder, and caused them to be executed. As for those that were imprisoned upon any small or slight cause, upon payment of their Fines, he delivered them; and in so doing, the Prison was cleansed of Malefactors; and from that time, the Country remained full of Thieves and Robbers.

The Levites, who were ordained to sing Hymns to God, solicited the King to assemble the Council, and thereby to permit them to wear the Linnen Robe, which the Priests were accustomed to use; telling him that such an Ordinance would dignify his Estate very much, in that he would be always famous in memory of this new Establishment.
 This Suit of theirs was easily granted; for the King, after he had consulted with those who were his Assistants, suffered the Levites that sung the Hymns, to lay aside their ordinary Robe, and to apparel themselves in Linnen, as best liked them. He permitted also, that another part of the Levites, who intended the service of the Temple, should learn to sing the Hymns and Psalms, as they had required: All which he did, contrary to the Ordinances of the Country; which being broken, there was nothing else to be expected but Punishment.

At that time the building of the Temple was finished. And the people perceiving that more than eighteen thousand Work-men should be idle, and deprived of Wages, whereupon they were accustomed to live by the building of the Temple: on the other side, being loath to reserve their money through the fear they had of the Romans; to provide for those Workmen (in the entertainment of whom they resolved to employ their Treasure, for if any one of them wrought but one hour of the day, he was suddenly paid his wages) they requested the King, that it would please him to repair the Eastern Gate, on the outward part of the Temple, situate in a Defect, the Walls whereof were in height four hundred Cubits; made of square Stones of white Marble, from the top to the bottom; and every Stone twenty foot long, and six foot thick.

This Work was first builded by King Solomon, who was the first that builded our Temple. But Agrippa, to whom Claudius Cæsar had given the Commission of building of the Temple; thinking with himself, that it was very easy to break it down, but very hard to build it up; and that to re-edify the Porch, it would cost much time and expence, he denied their request; permitting them nevertheless, to pave their City with broad Stone. He took the Priesthood from Jesus the Son of Gamaliel, and gave it to Matthias, the Son of Theophilus; in whose time, the Wars betwixt the Romans and the Jews began.

But I think it not amiss, but very answerable to the course of this present History, N to speak of the High Priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number until the end of the War. The first of them was Aaron, Moses's Brother, after whose death, his Children succeeded him; and from that time forward, the honour hath continued with their Successors. For it is a Law observed by our Ancestors, that no man should be admitted to the Priesthood, except he be of Aaron's Posterity: for albeit he were a King, if so be that he were of another Line, it was impossible for him to obtain the Priesthood. All the Priests after Aaron, who (as we have said) was the first, until Phanias, whom the Seditious created Priest in the time of the War, have been in number eighty three, whereof thirteen have executed the Office, from the time that Moses erected God's Tabernacle in the Desert, until such time as arriving in Judea, King Solomon builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the High Priesthood continued with

with the Possessors for term of life; but afterwards, although the Priests were yet alive, yet were there other Successors put in their rooms. These thirteen were of Aa- ron's Posterity, and obtained this degree in succession, the one after the other. Their first Government was Aristocracy, which is the Government of the Nobility; afterwards a Monarchy; and at last a Royal Government. The number of years wherein these thirteen flourished, were six hundred and twelve years, from the day that our Fathers departed out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moses, until the building of the Temple in Jerusalem by King Solomon.

After these thirteen High Priests, there were eighteen others; who after Solomon's time succeeded one after another, until the time that Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon, having encamped before the City, took it, and burned the Temple, and transported our Nation into Babylon, and led away the High Priest Josedech Prisoner. The time of the Priesthood and continuance of these eighteen, was four hundred sixty years, six months and ten days; so long as the Jews have had the Royal Government. After the surprisal of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, until such time as Cyrus, King of Persia, dismissed the Jews, and gave them leave to return from Babylon, into their own Countrey, with permission to re-edify their Temple, there are seventy two years; and at that time the Captives being returned, Jesus, the Son of Josedech, took upon him the High Priesthood; who, with those of his Posterity, to the number of fifteen, have governed in a Democracy, or Popular Government, until the time of Antiochus, surnamed Eupator, for the space of four hundred and fourteen years. This Antiochus was the first, who, with his General Lysias, displaced Onias, surnamed Meneleas, of his Priesthood, commanding him to be killed at Berith; and after he had driven his Son out of the Succession, he established Jacim High Priest; who notwithstanding, was of Aaron's Race, but not of his Family. For this cause Onias, the Son of Onias, and Nephew to the deceased Onias, retired himself into Egypt: Where growing familiar with Ptolomey, Philometor and Cleopatra his Wife, he persuaded them to build a Temple in the Confines of Heliopolis, not unlike to that of Jerusalem, and to create a High Priest in the same; of which Temple in Egypt, we have made very oftentimes mention. After that Jacim had held the Priesthood for the space of three years, he died without Successor; so the City remained seven years without a High Priest. Again, the As- monæans recovered the Government of their Nation, and after they had made War against the Macedonians, they established Jonathan High Priest, who exercised the Office seven years; but afterwards he was killed in an Ambush, and Treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as we have declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his Brother undertook the Priesthood, who was, not long after, killed treacherously by his Son-in-Law at a Banquet. After him succeeded his Son Hircannus; who enjoying this Dignity for the space of thirty one years, died when he was very old, leaving behind him Judas, surnamed Aristobolus; who dying, left his Brother Alexander his Heir, both of the Kingdom and High Priesthood. After that Aristobolus had obtained the Royal Government, he enjoyed both Dignities one whole year. For this Judas surnamed Aristobolus, was the first that set the Diadem on his head, causing himself to be called a King; to which Alexander did continue; for he also joyed the Kingdom with the High Priesthood, and reigned twenty seven years: And feeling himself draw near to his death, he left in Alexandras his Wife's hands, to dispose of the Priesthood as she pleased: She therefore bestowed it on Hircannus; and as for the Kingdom, she kept it in her own hands nine years, and afterwards died. Her Son Hircannus was High Priest for so long time: For after Alexandras's death, his Brother Aristobolus made War against him; and having overcome him, he took the Kingdom from him; and not only seized on the Crown, but the Priesthood. After he had reigned three F years, and as many months, Pompey repaired to Jerusalem, and took it perforce; and laying hold of Aristobolus, sent him bound unto Rome with his Children. After which, he restored the Priesthood once more to Hircannus; committing the Government of the Nation unto his hands, forbidding him in the mean space to wear the Dia-dem. Besides the first nine years, Hircannus governed twenty and four: But Barza- pharnes and Pacorus, Princes of the Parthians, passed Enphrates, and made war against Hircannus, and took him alive Prisoner, and made Antigonus, Aristobolus's Son, King.
 But after he had governed three years and three months, Sofus and Herod took him alive perforce, and Antonus sent him to Antioch, where he was beheaded. After that Herod was created King by the Romans, there was never any High Priest created of G the Posterity of the Asmonæans (for he gave the High Priesthood to certain men of obscure and base extraction, who were of the Order of Priests) Aristobolus only excepted.
 This Aristobolus was Hircannus's Nephew, who was a Prisoner among the Parthians; and and having given him the Priesthood, he married Mariaune his Sister, to the intent to continue himself in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hircanus: But afterwards fearing, lest all of them should turn to Aristobulus's side, he caused him to be killed, by finding out a means to cause him to be stifled, at such time as he bathed himself in a Fish-pond near to Jericho, as we have declared before this. After him, he bestowed the Priesthood no more on any of the Line of the Almoneans. Archelaus his Son, followed his Father's steps in respect of the Priesthood; and from that time forward, the Romans have enjoyed the Sovereignty over Jewry. All they then, that have exercised the Priesthood from Herod's time, until the day that Titus took the City and the Temple, have been in all, twenty and eight: All the continuance of their Government was one hundred and seven years. Some of these governed during Herod's life, and in the days of Archelaus his Son: But after these two were dead, the Government was Aristocratical, or of the Nobility, wherein the Priests had the Government over the whole Nation. Thus much have we thought fit to speak at this time concerning the High Priests.

C H A P. IX.

How Florus, Albinus's Successor, offered many injuries to the Jews, which constrained them to take Arms against the Romans.

Gessius Florus being sent by Nero, to succeed Albinus, filled all Judaea with many mischiefs and miseries. He was a Clazomenian born, and was married to a certain Woman called Cleopatra, no less mischievous than himself; who, being beloved by Peppaea, Nero's Wife, obtained this Dignity for him. He behaved himself so insolently and violently in all his Government, that through the great injustice he committed, the Jews praised Albinus, as if he had been their Benefactor. For he concealed his mischief, taking care lest it should be discovered: But Gessius Florus behaved himself so, as if he had been sent to make open shew and sale of his Villanies, published his injustice in the ears of our Nation, without omitting any injustice in executing and inflicting punishment on the innocent. For he was pitiless and covetous, and made no difference between Noble and Ignoble, and was not ashamed to be partaker with Thieves; of whom there were divers, who made it their profession to steal, without any fear, in that they were assured of their safety, because he was partaker with them. And, in a word, there was no moderation in him; so that the poor Jews being unable to endure such insolence, were constrained to abandon their own houses, and to fly their Country, and remain in some more commodious place of security; yea, though it were among strangers. What need I speak any more? he that constrained us to draw our Swords against the Romans, was Florus, we made this account, that it was better for us to die all at once, than to perish by little and little. In short, the War began the second year of Florus's Government in that Province, which was the twelfth year of Nero's Empire. but they that desire to know exactly all that which we have been constrained both to do and suffer, may peruse my Books of the Wars of the Jews. For which cause, in this place I will end this ancient History.

This ancient History containeth all that which hath been reported to be done since the first Creation of man, until the twelfth year of Nero's Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Jews, as well in Egypt, as in Syria and Palestine: All that likewise, which we have been enforced to suffer under the Assyrians and Babylonians; as also our Estate under the Persians and Macedonians, and finally under the Romans. N All this, as I suppose, I have compiled and gathered together with careful diligence; and I have enforced my self to recite the number of those, who have been High Priests for the space of two thousand years. I have also collected the Succession of Kings, their Actions and Government, with the power of their Monarchies, according as it is amply described in Holy Scriptures, as also I have promised in the beginning of my History. Moreover, I dare boldly say, that whatsoever I set down, is so true, that there is no man, either Jew, or of what Nation soever, yea, although he should have employed the uttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same unto the Greeks, than I have done. For in their Confessions and Opinions who are of our Nation, I have such knowledge in that which concerneth our Doctrine, as I surpass them all: And as for the Grecian Disciplines, I have studied and learned the Tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar and fit Pronunciation of

A of the same, for that I have lived in the Countrey. For amongst us we make but slender reckoning of those, who are exercised in divers Tongues; for that this Study is accounted Profane by us, and common, not only to free persons but also unto Slaves; and they only are esteemed to have profited in Wisdom, who fully know the Contents of the Law, and who can expound the Holy Scriptures. For this cause, although divers have busied themselves in this exercise of writing Histories, yet there are scarcely two or three of them that have written successfully, and have received the Fruits of their Labours. And it may be that it will not be thought amiss, if I freely speak somewhat of my Progeny and Life; considering that there are men at this day living, who can approve or reprove me in that I set down. And in this place I will make an end of my Antient History, which I have reduced into twenty Books, containing sixty thousand Verses. And if God grant me life, I will shortly treat of our Wars, and the events of the same that have happened hitherto, which is the thirteenth year of Domitianus Cesar's Empire, and the fifty sixth year of my Age. Moreover, I am resolved to discover in four Books, the divers Opinions of the Sects of the Jews, as touching God and his Essence, and our Laws; according to which certain things are permitted us, and others are forbidden.

THE PREFACE,

C In which the Author taxeth divers Historiographers of untruth; and declareth his intent, and specifieth the principal points of this History.

The War of the Jews against the Romans, was of all other the greatest that ever was attempted in our Age, or heard of in any other, either between City and City, or Nation against Nation: Yet there have been some persons, who (rather building their discourse on the vain and false reports of others, than their own knowledge) have written the History of it by hearsay; and filled their discourse not only with Vanity, but also with Contradiction. Others there are, who, though Witnesses or Actors in the same; nevertheless, have according to their own fancy, related many falsehoods, either out of flattery to the Romans, or hatred against the Jews: Whose Writings are full of nothing but Accusations of the one, and Praises of the other, without observation of Historical Verity. For this cause, I Joseph the Son of Matthias, by Birth an Hebrew, a Citizen and Priest of Jerusalem; who, in the beginning of those Wars, bore Arms against the Romans, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by necessity) was present at all those things, which were attempted and prosecuted in those Wars; have thought good to write in the Greek Tongue (in favour of all those who acknowledge the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire) all that which heretofore in my own Language I have written, to inform other Nations. When those great Wars began, the Romans were at Civil Wars among themselves: And the younger and more turbulent sort of Jews, trusting to their Riches and Courage, excited so great troubles in the East, to make use of this opportunity, that whole Nations were in apprehension to be brought into subjection to them, because they had confederated with those of their Nation, that inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates, to revolt all together. Moreover, at that time the Gauls, who bordered upon the Romans, suffered them not to live in peace: And the Germans also began to take Arms. In a word, after the death of Nero, Seditions reigned every where: So After Nero's Kings: And the Soldiers, lead with the hope of gain, desired nothing more than trouble and alteration. Now, because those matters were important, the trouble I had to see the truth disguised, made me take care to inform exactly the Parthians, Babylonians, and the furthest distant Arabians, and those of our Nation, inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenes, of the true cause of this War, of all that was passed in it, and how it was ended, lest those who were not present in it, should be ignorant thereof, and deceived by flattering and fabulous Historians. The Glory of the Romans is diminished, if you derogate from their labours at the Siege of Jerusalem.

Thus his Pity towards the Jews.

All Calamities that happened since the beginning of the World, being compared with those the Jews suffered are of no moment. The Grecian Historiographers overpass the Wars of the Jews with silence.

Who may rightly be called a Historiographer.

who (besides their false informations) stick not to write Histories, not only void of all truth, but also no ways answerable to the Subject which they undertake. For whereas they labour to extol the Romans, and debase the Jews; I cannot understand how they can be held great, who triumph in the Conquest of men so obscure and abject. Nay, whilst they thus extol the Roman valour in conquering the Jews, they consider not the continuance of the War, nor the multitude of the Roman Forces, nor the honour of their Captains; whose Glory is much impaired, if they lessen that of the resistance, by which the valour of the Jews render'd the execution of the Enterprize so difficult. For my own part, I am not resolute to contradict those, who shall enhance the Glory and Noble Actions of the Romans, nor to extol and cry up the Deserts of my own Nation; but my resolution is, in all truth and sincerity to set down each Occurrent, without respect or partiality towards either part. In performance whereof, I will order my discourse according to the matter I treat of, and as my grief and sorrow shall invite me to lament the miseries of my Country. For the Civil Dissension, that dismember'd the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: And those Tyrants that reigned amongst us, were such, who forcibly drew the Romans, with Sword and Fire, to effect the Desolation of our Holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himself can justify, who destroyed the same; who, during all those Wars, still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceived) were kept in awe by the Seditious: And oftentimes, of his own accord, he deferred the taking of the City, and purposely protracted the Siege, to the intent, that in the mean time the Authors of the Seditions, might have leisure to repent and submit themselves. Now, if any man think that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the Tyrants, and their Depredations; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost Country, I accuse their Villanies too passionately, and thereby transgress the limits of a History; let it be imputed to my grief, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that ever were conquered by the Romans, our City only attained to the top of felicity; but now, alas, 'tis brought into extreme Misery, Captivity and Desolation. Nay, if all the Misfortunes and Calamities which the World from the beginning hath seen, be compared with the infelicity and fall of the Jews, they are slight and inconsiderable.

And to increase our sorrow, 'tis not to Foreigners, but to our own Country-men, that we are to attribute the cause of our miseries. Wherefore, if any man too severe and Stoical, reprehend this my Lamentation, let him consider only the deeds I recount in the History which I write, and pass over the Lamentations and sorrows of me, who am the Historiographer. I confess I have often blamed, and perhaps with reason, the most eloquent Grecians; that (although these our most miserable and memorable Wars hapned in their days, in respect whereof, all other former troubles are obscure and of no reckoning) they have restrained their Tongues and Pens, to the end they might carp at those with greater liberty, who undertake the publishing thereof; whom, though in Learning and Eloquence, they exceed, yet they have the advantage of having managed Publick Affairs. These Censurers of others, write the Histories of the Assyrians and Medes, as if the ancient Writers had ill reported the same; though indeed they come as far behind those ancient Authors, in their manner of writing, as they do in the design they had in writing. For such as, in times past, published any worthy History, endeavoured to write that which they themselves had seen; and they were Eye-witnesses of those Affairs they committed to writing; they more effectually performed all that they promised, because they accounted it an act of dishonesty, to report and publish Lies in stead of History. And truly, in my opinion, that man is worthy commendation, who striveth by his studious endeavours, to Register, not only the Occurrences of times past, but also those memorable events that have happened in his own days: And be only and truly, is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another man's Works, but he that of himself compileth an History whereof no man hath before written. For my own part (being a stranger) I have spared no labour and expence, to declare the truth of those events in the ears of the Greeks and Romans. For, as touching their own learned men, their mouths are always open where their own interests, publick or private, is concerned; but if they come to a History, wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past; here the travel is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leave the matter to their performance, who are incapable and unapt both in stile and study to register the Actions of Princes and great Captains; whereby it appears, that the Grecians make as little account of the truth of History, as we esteem and seek it.

Now,

The Preface.

A Now to discover unto you the Original of the Jews, what their Estate hath been in times past, and after what manner they departed out of Egypt; to shew what Countries they conquered, and what Colonies they planted; were in my judgment, both impertinent, and to little purpose; considering that drivers of mine own Nation have before my time written an exact History of the actions of our Ancestors: yea, many Greeks also have translated these men's Writings into their own Tongue, without much deviating from the truth. I will therefore begin my History in that time where those Writers, and our own Prophets have ended theirs, and set down at large all those Wars that happened in my time. As for those things that precede my particular knowledge, I will only touch them briefly, and in a word or two. First, I will relate how Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, took the City of Jerusalem, and possessed the same for the space of three years and six months; and how he was driven out of that Country at last, by the Assyrians. After this I will set down the Dissentions that happened amongst Antiochus's Successors for the Kingdom; and how the Jews by this means they drew Pompey and the Romans into their Affairs. How Herod likewise, the Son of Antipater, being assisted by Solimus, put an end to the Rule of the Assyrian Princes: And how, in Augustus Cæsar's time, after the death of Herod, of the Jews, the Epitome and during the Government of Quintilius Varus, a Sedition was raised among the people: And how in the twelfth year of Nero's Reign, the War began. What likewise happened in Cestius's time, and what Warlike Exploits the Jews performed in their first Attempts and Revolts; how they strengthened the Cities and Forts about them; and how Nero (hearing of the great Overthrow, which his Army received under Cestius their General, and fearing lest he should lose all) made Titus Vespasian General of his Army; who being attended by his eldest Son, came into Judæa, accompanied with as great a number of Romans as he could possibly gather; to how a great number of his Allies were defeated in Galilee; what Cities they took in that Province, either by Assault, or by Composition. Besides all these things, I will express what Order and Discipline the Romans observe in their Wars, and how they are accustomed to exercise their Soldiers. I will describe also the places and nature D of the Country of Galilee and Judæa, together with the Mountains, Lakes and Fountains thereof, with all the Properties of the same; not forgetting those miseries which the Captive Cities suffered; and how they were surprized. All which (together with all those evils and miseries which during those troubles befell my self) I will discourse with all truth and diligence, the rather because I publish them to many who are no ways ignorant of them.

After this, I will set down how (upon the declining and downfall of the Jews) Nero died; and how at such time as Vespasian had undertaken the Expedition to Jerusalem, he was recalled from it, to receive the Imperial Dignity; and how when E he returned into Egypt to establish that Province, the Jews began to mutiny among themselves; how many Tyrants arose among them, who hatched much civil discord and debate in their Government. Moreover, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the second time into Judæa, and ranged over the Country; and how and where he levied and encamped his Armies. How, and how often, the City was vexed by Seditions, especially at such time as he himself was present. What Onsets he gave, and how many Mounts he raised, in besieging the City with a triple Wall: The strength and Provision of the City: The Situation and Platform of the Temple, the Temples and the Altars therein: The Rites and Ceremonies used on Festival days: The manners over Purifications, and the Offices of the Priests: The Garments also, of the High Priests, and the Holy Sanctuary of the Temple. All which I will recount without any dissimulation, or swearing from the truth of History. After this, I will relate what cruelly the Tyrants used towards their own Country-men, what Humanity the Romans shewed to strangers, and how often Titus (who desired to save both the City and Temple) exhorted the Seditious to mutual Amity. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Jews (after the many and grievous Calamities which they suffered in the Siege, by War, Sedition, and Hunger) were at length reduced into servitude after the taking of that great and potent City. Neither will I omit the slaughter of such as deserted their Nation, neither the punishment inflicted on those that were Captive: I will set down how the Temple was burnt against Cæsar's Will, and what an infinite Mass of Sacred Treasure was consumed by the Fire, and what signs and wonders happened before the same: The Captivity also of the Tyrants themselves, and the burning of the Temple, and the overthrow of the City.

The Romans triumph over the Jews. The cause why he wrote this History.

and the number of those that were led away into Captivity, and what miseries they endured: How the Romans continuing their Wars, utterly ruined the Fortresses of their Captives: Finally, how Titus travelling thorough the whole Countrey, established a Form of Government; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All these things I have comprehended in seven Books, endeavouring as much as in me lieth, to avoid all occasion of reproof, from those men who know these Affairs, and were Actors in the War. Which I have done for their sakes, who love truth. And according to that Order and Form I promised, I will begin my History.

CHAP. I.

The Destruction of Jerusalem by Antiochus King of Syria. The Overthrow of the Syrians by Matthias Maccabæus and his Sons.

AT such time as Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, made War against Ptolemy the Sixth King of Egypt, for the whole Dominion of Syria, those of the chiefest Authority and Nobility among the Jews, were divided into two Parties: And that of Onias the High Priest being become the strongest, expelled the Sons of Tobias out of the City; who fleeing to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in all humility, that he would lead his Forces into Judæa; offering themselves to be his Guides in the Expedition. Antiochus

Antiochus (who had long desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their request; and leaving a great Army, he entered their Country, took Jerusalem, and slew most part of them who favoured Ptolemy. He gave his Soldiers liberty to sack the City, spoiled the Temple of the great Riches which were in it; and for the space of three years and six months forbade the Sacrifices, which before time were accustomed to be offered every day to God in that place. Whereupon Onias the High Priest fled to Ptolemy; of whom having obtained the grant of a piece of Land, within the Liberties and Precincts of Heliopolis; he built a Town and Temple there, resembling the City and Sanctuary of Jerusalem; of which we shall speak in due place.

But Antiochus not satisfied with the unexpected surprize of the City, nor with the pillage and slaughter of the Citizens, was so far transported by his passions, and incensed with the remembrance of those toys which he had sustained during this War, that he compelled the Jews to renounce their Religion, to forbear the Circumcision of their Children, and to immolate Swine upon the Altar. The abhorrence, which the chiefest and honestest amongst them, could not refrain to declare against these Abominations, cost them their lives. For Bacchides, who was Governour of all the Garrisons of Judea, by the appointment of Antiochus, being naturally very cruel, omitted no occasion to execute his wicked Orders; insomuch that he particularly tormented such as were of Noble Birth and Quality; and every day represented to them the fresh face and memory of the desolation of their City. But, at length, a Tyranny so insupportable animated those that suffered it, to attempt the means of freeing themselves from it; and of executing revenge upon the Authors. Matthias (or Matthias Macabeus) the Son of Asmonius, one of the Priests, who dwelt in a Village called Modin, accompanied with his five Sons and his own household, armed with Swords, slew Bacchides; and fearing the power and multitude of the enemy's Garrisons, presently retired himself into the Mountains. Thither resorted divers of the people unto him; by which conflux, growing more confident and courageous, he descended from the Mountains; and overcoming the Captains of Antiochus, drove them out of the Borders of Judea. By many instances of such happy success, he became so renowned, that he was by common consent of the people (whom he had delivered from the subjection of strangers) made their Ruler: And when he died, he left his eldest Son who was called Judas, to succeed him in the Government. This brave Son of so brave a Father, could not doubt of the endeavours which Antiochus would use, to revenge the losses he had received; and therefore he gathered together an Army of his own Country-men, and was the first among the Jews that made a League with the Romans. Antiochus failed not (as he had foreseen) to enter into Judea with a powerful Army; and this great Captain repelled him with a great Overthrow. And whilst the remembrance of this Victory was yet fresh in men's minds, he assaulted the Garrison of Jerusalem, which as yet was entire; in which Conflict he forced them to forsake the high Town, which is called Holy, and betake themselves to the lower part: And having recovered the Temple, he purified it, and compassed it with a Wall, and made new Vessels for the Service of God, and placed them there; (because those that had been formerly consecrated there, were profaned: ) He built likewise another Altar, and began to renew the accustomed Sacrifice, and observe the Rites of Religion.

Scarce was the City brought to its former Estate, but Antiochus died; leaving behind him Antiochus Eupator, his Son and Heir; not only of his Kingdom, but also of his hatred against the Jews: Who having gathered together fifty thousand Foot, and almost five thousand Horse, and fourcore Elephants, entered by the Mountains, into Judea, and took a Town called Bethsara; near which Judas met him, in a place called Battelazar, where the passage was something strait: And before they joyned Battelazar, Judas's Brother, seeing one Elephant higher than the rest, bearing a great Tower on his Back, and adorned with Golden Furniture, thought Antiochus had been there; and ran from his Company, breaking the Ranks of the Enemies, till he came to the Elephant: but he could not reach him whom he deemed to be the King, he was so highly mounted; all he could do, was to wound the Elephant in the belly with his Sword, till the Beast fell upon him, and pressed him to death; which act of his had no other success but this, that by attempting so great a matter, he gave testimony that he preferred Glory before his life. For he that rid on this Elephant, was but a private person; and although Antiochus had been there, Euseas had achieved nothing more in this valiant attempt; but yet he adventured his life, in hope to perform some great exploit. This act of his was a preface unto his Brother Judas, of the event of that days Battle; for the Jews fought stoutly, and a long time; but yet Antiochus's Army (being both more in number, and more fortunate) obtained the Victory; and

Judas after the loss of many of his company, fled to the Goponites, with those of his side who escaped. Antiochus advanced afterwards to Jerusalem, from whence after some stay he departed for want of Provisions, leaving a sufficient Garrison there; for the rest of his Army, he led them for their Winter-quarters into Syria. But notwithstanding the King's departure, Judas rested not; but encouraged by many of his Nation, who daily came to him, and gathering all together those who were escaped out of the former Battle, he fought with the Forces of Antiochus at a village named Modin, where after many proofs of his valour in assaulting and slaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himself at length was slain; and within a few days after, his Brother John also was betrayed, and slain by their treacheries who favoured B Antiochus.

CHAP. II.

The Succession of Princes, from Jonathan to Aristobulus.

After Judas succeeded his Brother Jonathan in the dignity of Prince of the Jews. He carefully studied the peace and security of his people, and fortified himself by the friendship of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his Son; yet did not all these things procure his safety. For Tryphon (who was tutor to the young Antiochus) laying wait for him, and seeking to spoil him of his friends, took Jonathan at such a time as he came with a small company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an Army against Judas: from whence being repelled by Simon Jonathan's Brother, in displeasure and revenge thereof, he slew Jonathan. But Simon valiantly bestirring himself in the Conduct of the affairs of the Commonwealth, took Zara, Joppe and Jamnia (which were bordering Towns); and overcoming the Garrison of Accaron, he destroyed the City, and assisted Antiochus against Tryphon, who besieged Dora, before that expedition which he made against the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the King be satisfied, notwithstanding Simon had thus faithfully served and assisted him to the ruine and death of Tryphon; but in a short time after, he sent Condebeus (the General of the Army) to harass and spoil Judea, and to take Simon Prisoner. But Simon though very aged, acted both youthfully and valiantly, and sent his Sons before with the most resolute men he had against Antiochus, and himself with the residue of his Army, assaulted another quarter of the enemies Camp; and having laid many ambushes in the mountains, he obtained a great victory. After which he was made High Priest, and delivered the Jews from the subjection of the Macedonians, under which they had been two hundred and seventy years. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolemy his Son-in-law, he was murdered at a Banquet; who imprisoning his Wife and two Sons, sent certain men to kill his third Son John, otherwise called Hircanus. But the young man understanding the design, fled to Jerusalem, accompanied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his Father's prowess, especially because Ptolemy's iniquity was hated of all men. Ptolemy also halted to enter the City at another gate: but he was speedily repelled by the people, who had already received Hircanus. For which cause he presently retired himself into a Castle named Dagon, situate beyond Jericho.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of High Priest, which was left him by his Father, and had offered Sacrifices to God, he led forth his forces with all speed to besiege Ptolemy, hoping to deliver his mother and brethren that were detained Prisoners there by him. His tenderness of nature was the only obstacle that hindered him from forcing the Castle. For when Ptolemy perceived himself to be in danger, he brought Hircanus's Mother and Brethren upon the walls, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatening to cast them down from the wall, except Hircanus would presently depart. How great fever the indignation of Hircanus was, it was forced to give place to the affection he had for persons so dear to him, and to his compassion of seeing them suffer. But his Mother being no way dismayed with the stripes which he endured, nor with the death wherewith she was threatened, lifted up her hands to her Son, beseeching him that he would not in regard of her miseries be moved to spare so impious a person; for she should esteem her death happy, if so be Ptolemy might receive just punishment for the villany which he had impiously committed against their house. Hircanus seeing the resolute mind of his Mother and hearing her entreaty, was moved to assault the Castle; but straightway seeing her beaten and torn, he relented with compassion, and his mind agitated with different Sentiments, was full of confusion and trouble. By which means the Siege continued long, and the Jubilee year was come, which falleth out every seventh year. Protemy was no sooner delivered from the Siege by this occasion, but he put Hircanus's Mother and his Brethren to death, and afterwards fled to Zeno, the Tyrant of Philadelphis, who was also furnamed Cotylus.

In the mean while, Antiochus, to be revenged for the Victory which Simon had got over his Generals, entred with an Army into Judea, and besieged Hircanus in Jerusalem; who opening the Sepulchre of David (who had been one of the richest of all the Kings of Judea) took more than three thousand Talents from thence; of which he gave three hundred to Antiochus, and so obliged him to depart the Country. Hircanus was the first Prince that entertained Foreign Soldiers. But so soon as Antiochus had bent his Power and Forces against the Medes, he took that opportunity to revenge himself, and presently assaulted the Towers of Syria; assuring himself he should find them (as indeed they were) void of Soldiers to defend them. He made himself Master of Adabaz, Samca, Sichem and Garizim, and subdued the Cuthaens, who inhabit the places adjoining to the Temple, that was built in imitation of that which is at Jerusalem. Moreover he took many Cities of Idumea, and amongst the rest, Dotene and Marisa; and coming into Samaria (which Herod afterwards rebuilt, and called Schesse) he besieged it on every side, and left his two Sons, Aristobolus and Antigonus, to continue the Siege: They omitted nothing to the purpose; and there came such a Famine in the City, that the Inhabitants were constrained to eat very unaccustomed Meats. In this extremity, they desired aid of Antiochus, furnamed Spondius, who speedily came to relieve them; but he was overcome by Aristobolus and Antigonus, and was pursued by them to Sytopolis, whither he retired himself. But they, returning again to Samaria, straitned the City; and at last, taking it by force, destroyed the same, and led away their Inhabitants Captives. Whilist thus Fortune favoured them, they ceased not to pursue their good success, but led their Army beyond Sytopolis; and shared between them all the Land of Mount Carmel.

Schesse overthrown and spoiled.

CHAP. III.

Of Aristobolus, Antigonus, Judas, Essæus, Alexander, Theodorus and Demetrius.

His Felicity and good hap of Hircanus and his Sons, was accompanied with the envy of many of his Country-men; and their discontent was the cause of an open Rebellion: For divers of the Jews rising up in Arms against them, were so much over-ruled by their ambitious passion, that they could not contain themselves from the prosecution of an open and bloody War; wherein, notwithstanding, they were put to the work. From that day forward, Hircanus passed the remainder of his life in all tranquillity and happiness; and after he had governed the Commonwealth for the space of thirty and three years, he departed this life, leaving behind him five valiant Sons. He was a man of more than ordinary felicity, being possessed of three excellent endowments together; for he was the Prince of his Country, High Priest, and a Prophet, to whom God spake, and gave him the knowledge of future accidents. He foretold, and foretold, that his two eldest Sons should not continue long in the Government, (whose ends are worth rehearsal, being very different from their Father's felicity;) for the eldest Son Aristobolus, after his Father's death, changed the Principality into a Kingdom; and was the first that put a Crown on his head; four hundred twenty one years, and three months, after the deliverance of the people from the Captivity of Babylon. As for Antigonus (who was his second Brother, and whom in appearance he seemed to love most entirely) he made him partaker of his Dignity, and committed the rest of them to Prison: He imprisoned his Mother also, for that she had contended with him for the Government of which Hircanus had made her Regent. And he was so given over to all kind of cruelty, that he not only kept her Prisoner in Bonds, but also put her to death by Famine: To which Impiety he added that of killing his own Brother Antigonus, whom he had entirely loved, and made Partner with him in the Kingdom. For by reason of certain scandalous flanders, which his envious and malignant Courtiers contrived and invented against him, he commanded him to be put to death. Upon their first information, Aristobolus (wayed by Brotherly affection) gave them no credit; conceiving those Accusations to proceed from envy, rather than any good ground. But when Antigonus returned from the War, at that Festival time, wherein Aristobolus himself his Mother, Aristobolus loved Antigonus very dearly.

A according to the custom of our Country, we celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles; it happened that Aristobolus fell sick; Antigonus therefore, about the end of those Festival days, attended with a great Equipage and Train of armed men, ascended up into the Temple, to offer Sacrifice, and to pray God for the health of the King his Brother. Hereupon, certain cursed and wicked detractors repaired to the King, and told him, that this great Guard of Soldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and his magnificent Pomp, shew'd that he was not contented with the honour he had done him, in associating him in the Royalty, but was minded to possess it wholly to himself; in which resolution they said he was come accompanied with so many Soldiers, that it could not be doubted, but that it was to murder him. Aristobolus, though unwillingly, yet at last being won to believe them, desirous to hide his suspicion, commanded his Guard to hide themselves in a certain place under ground; (himself then lodging in a certain Castle, which in times past was called Baris, and afterwards Antonia, by Herod, in honour of Antonius) with this Commission, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they should let him pass; if otherwise, they should kill him. He sent certain Messengers also, to Antigonus, requiring him to repair unto him unarmed: But the wicked Queen prevented this good intent of his by a subtil stratagem contrived by those, that with her conspired against him; for the perwaded those that were to carry this message, to discover nothing of what the King had commanded them; but to tell Antigonus, that his Brother having intelligence that he had brought very goodly Armour, with other fair Furniture for War, from Galilee, desired him to come to him, arm'd as he was, that he might have the pleasure to see him in his Warlike Ornaments. Which when Antigonus understood (who, by reason of his Brother's affection, suspected no mischief) he armed himself, and returned to him, intending to content him with his appearance. But no sooner arrived he in the strait, which is called the Tower of Straton, but the Guard of Aristobolus set upon him, and slaughtered him; yielding by this means a demonstrative testimony, that Treachery is able to destroy all good nature and friendship; and that there is no union of affection so great, as it can always resist the attempts of envy, to ruin it.

In this Occurrence there happened a thing which cannot be too much admired: Judas the son of Judas, who was of the Sect of the Essæans, had so certain a knowledge of the Future, that his Predictions were never found false. This man beholding Antigonus pass thorough the Temple, cried out to his familiars, who attended him in no small number (as ordinarily, divers of his Disciples did:) Ab, how happy were it for me at this present, if I were dead, since truth is dead before me, and one of my Predictions is found faulty! For behold Antigonus yet liveth, who should this day have died in the Tower of Straton, which is distant from this place six hundred furlongs, and 'tis now the fourth hour of the day; now therefore is the time, wherein my Divination shall be falsified. Having spoken to this effect, the old man sat down, being altogether disconsolate and pensive; within a while after, it was told him that Antigonus was slain in a place under ground, called the Tower of Straton, being of the same name with that at Cæsarea, which is situate upon the Sea-coast; which conformity of names, was the cause that Judas staggered in his Divination.

The sorrow which incontinently seized Aristobolus, for committing this heinous Murder, augmented his sickness in such sort, that his Soul was continually troubled with the thought of his sin; and his body, through extrem heat of passion, became dried up; and the grief that he felt was so vehement, that his Entrails became exulcerated, so that he voided blood in great abundance. And if so fell out, by God's Providence, that one of his Servants, who was deputed to that Office, bearing out that blood which came from him, mist his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had been slain, where still there appeared some signs and stains of the blood of Antigonus; on which he poured out the blood of the Murderer, Aristobolus: Which, when they perceived who stood hard by, imagining that the Servant had purposely spilled the blood in that place, as it were in Sacrifice to the Ghost of that Prince; they cried out so loud, that Aristobolus hearing their cry, demanded the cause thereof; they cried out that each man feared to discover the same to him, the more instantly he desired to understand the truth; so that at length, after he had used threats, he was certified of what had passed. Whereupon, his eyes were suddenly filled with tears; and in vehement agony of mind, he cried out, and said; How could I hope, but that the great eye of the Divine Majesty should see my wicked act, and the sudden vengeance of my Brother's blood pursue and overtake me? How long, O thou miserable Body, wilt thou detain my Soul from being sacrificed to the vengeance of my Mother and Brother's death? Why do I thus lingeringly languish, in offering a part of my blood unto them? Let them take it all at once; and bury.

The eye of God discovereth every sin. Aristobolus died miserably.

This laid he died, after he had only reigned one year.

His Wife after his death delivered his Brother Alexander from Prison, and established him King, who was both the eldest, and seemed to be the most moderate among the rest of his Brethren. But growing by this means both proud and potent, he put one of his Brethren to death, for aspiring after the Kingdom; but spared the other alive, for that he contented himself with a private and contemplative life. He made War also against Ptolemy, that was called Lathyrus, who had surprized the City of Ajoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the Sword; nevertheless, Ptolemy's side obtained the Victory: But retiring himself into the Countrey of Egypt, by reason that his Mother Cleopatra pursued him with open War; Alexander forcibly entered the City of Gadara, and the Fort of Amath (one of the greatest of all those that were beyond Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zeno's Son, had hoarded up his chiefest and most precious moveables, which he took, but enjoyed not long; for Theodore, suddenly setting upon him, recovered all that which was his; and furthermore, laid hands on the King's Carriage; in seizing which, he slaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thousand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this loss, invaded the Frontire Towns upon the Sea-coast, and won Rapha, Gaza and Anthedon, which afterwards by King Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered these places, the common sort of the Jews raised a mutiny against him, during a certain solemn and holy Feast; (as Mutinies and Seditions are commonly raised at Banquets) and it is thought that he could not have prevailed against those Rebels, had he not been assisted by the Pifidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him; for the Syrians he refused to hire, by reason of their natural hatred they bare against the Jews. Having therefore slain eight thousand of the Rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galaadites and Moabites (and imposing upon them a Tribute) he returned to besiege Amath. But Theodore, daunted with his prosperous success, and finding the Castle without any to defend it, razed it to the ground. After this, he assaulted Obodas King of the Arabians; who having laid Ambushments in the Countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for such a purpose, discomfited him and his whole Army, being driven into a deep Valley, where they were perished with a multitude of Camels.

But Alexander escaped to Jerusalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred against him, being encouraged by his great loss and slaughter of men, began again to rebel; but then also he overcame them: and in six years space, in sundry Battels, slew above fifty thousand Jews: Notwithstanding, he never rejoiced in his Victory, because the strength of his Countrey was consumed thereby. For which cause, giving over his Wars, he began to seek the people's favour by sweet and mild courses; but they so much hated his inconstant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he should do to win their favours, they answered, that he should die, and that scarcely they could pardon him if so be he were dead, who had done them so much mischief. The Jews sent to Demetrius, surnamed Eucernus, for help; who, in hope of great rewards, came and joyned his Forces with the Jews about Sichein, being three thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot: Alexander met them both with a thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, that were strangers, besides ten thousand Jews that remain'd faithful to him. Before the fight began, the two Kings sent Messengers to one another's Army, persuading one another's men to forsake their Colours and Captains: For Demetrius hoped that Alexander's hired men would have forsaken his service, and come unto him; and Alexander hoped that the Jews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius, and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Jews continued obstinate in their purpose, and the Greeks kept their fidelity, the two Armies encountered; in which Encounter, Demetrius had the upper hand

(although Alexander's Hirelings evidently shewed their strength and courage.) But the end of this Victory was such, as neither party expected; for they who went for Demetrius, after his Victory, forsook him; and Fortune changing her Colours, six thousand Jews fled to Alexander, into the Mountains, whither for safety he had betaken himself. This revolt much displeased and discouraged Demetrius; so that he now thought, that Alexander uniting his Forces, was able to give him Battel; and he feared that all the Jews would at that present follow Alexander; for which cause, he returned home. Yet the rest of the Jews, having thus lost the help of Demetrius would not desert from their Rebellion; but they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slain) he drave the rest into the City of Bemesel; and when he had surprized and sack'd the City, he led them Captive to Jerusalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety; for having crucified eight hundred Captives in the midst of the

A City, he killed their Wives, and the Children he massacred before their Mother's Faces; and this pitiful spectacle he beheld with pleasure, as he was drinking, and making merry with his Concubines. Whereat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the Countrey of Judea, and stayed in Banishment, during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by such actions fought the tranquility of his Kingdom, which he obtained not, but with long time and great difficulty, he ceased to make War against his Countrey.

CHAP. IV.

Of the War of Alexander, King of the Jews, with Antiochus and Aretas; and of Aristobulus and Hircanus.

After this, Antiochus (who likewise was called Dyonisius, Brother to Demetrius, Alexander and the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised up new broils against Alexander, who fearing him because he had overcome the Arabians, drew a deep Trench along that ground which lieth between Antipatris, and the Sea-coast of Joppa: and before the Trench he built a very high Wall, and raised Towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keep out Antiochus; who burning the Towers, and filling up the Trenches, entered and passed over them with his Forces. But not carrying at that time to revenge himself of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. Aretas, King of Arabia, retiring himself into certain places of his Countrey which were fittest for defence, and returning suddenly to Battel with his Horse (who were in number ten thousand) rushed suddenly upon Antiochus's Soldiers, and found them unprovided; so that a hot Skirmish began betwixt them; in which the Soldiers of Antiochus, whilst he lived, shewed themselves valiant (though they were on every side massacred by the Arabians) but so soon as he was slain (who was always ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled; and the greatest part of them were slain in the Battel, and in flight: As for those that escaped, they fled to the Town of Cana, where all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited with the hatred they bare to Ptolemy the Son of Menneus, sent for Aretas, and established him King over Celosyria; who warring against Judea, and overcoming Alexander in Battel, retired upon Compulsion. Alexander having taken Pella, resorted once more to the Town of Gerasa, in that he was desirous to get Theodore's Riches; and took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with three Walls, and that upon every Wall there was planted a Garrison. He took Gaulan and Selencia, and that Town which is called the Valley of Antiochus. Moreover, having taken Gamala, which was a very strong Castle, and imprisoned the Governour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person; he returned into Judea after he had spent three years in War; where, for his prosperous success, he was joyfully received of his Nation. But no sooner ceased he from War, but he fell sick of a Quartane Ague; and he thought that he should drive away his sickness, if he employed himself in some business; for which cause, labouring under his disease, he applied himself to War, and toiling above his strength, amidst those tumults, he yielded up the Ghost in the thirty seventh year of his Reign; leaving the Kingdom to Alexandra his Wife, fully accounting that the Jews would in all Alexandra's things obey her, because that she, always milking and seeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquity, had won the hearts of the people: Neither was he deceived; for the being admired for her piety amongst them, they easily submitted to her; the rather for that she was well acquainted with the Customs of her Countrey, and even from her Childhood detested them who violated our holy Laws. She had by Alexander two Sons, the eldest was called Hircanus; whom by reason of his years, she made High Priest; and because of his dull nature, she thought that though he were in Princely Authority, yet he would molest no man: As for the youngest Son Aristobolus, because he was of a hot spirit, it was willing that he should lead a private life.

Now there was a certain Sect among the Jews, which were called Pharisees, who joyed themselves with the Queen: These people were thought to be of the godliest sort, and to be more skilful than others, in interpreting the Scriptures; and Alexandra favoured them the more, because the Law was much given to Religion. These having but little and little insinuated themselves into her favour, domineered at their pleasure, displacing, disposing, imprisoning, and restoring to liberty whom they pleased, for no other purpose, but that they might enjoy the Profits and Commodities of the the Kingdom; leaving to Alexandra, nothing but the Expenses and care of the Government. This Queen was always desirous of high attences, and daily studied to encrease her wealth: She levied two Armies, and hired many strangers, whereby she not only strengthened her own Country, but also made her self feared by other Nations. She ruled others, but her self was ruled by the Pharisees, who at last killed Dionenes, a gallant man, and highly in favour with King Alexander; affirming, that through his counsel, the King commanded those eight hundred before-mentioned to be crucified: And further, they perswaded the Queen Alexandra, that she should put to death all others, through whose counsel Alexander her Husband had been incited against those eight hundred. The Queen being blinded with Superstition, thought it unlawful to deny any thing which they requested; so that they put to death whom they pleased, till such time as the chieftest of those, who were in this danger, in humble wise came to Alexandra, who perswaded his Mother to spare some, and to banish others, who the thought had deserved punishment; which Exiles dispersed themselves through the whole Country. Now Alexandra sent an Army to Damascus, and because Ptolemy daily vexed the City, she took it without doing any thing worthy of memory. She also solicited Tigranes, King of Armenia, with Gifts and Promises (who with an Army had besieged Ptolemais, wherein Cleopatra was) but he, for fear of troubles in his own Country, in that Lucullus had entered into Armenia, withdrew himself from thence.

Shortly after Alexandra falling sick, her youngest Son Aristobulus, with his Servants (which were many in number, all trusty, and in the heat of their youth) got all the Castles; and hiring Soldiers with the money he had in those Castles, he proclaimed himself King. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) imprisoned the Wife and Children of Aristobulus, in a Castle near the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Beth (as we said before) afterwards Antonia, from Antonius, as in like manner Sebastie and Agrippias, other Cities were named of Augustus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before she could revenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Aristobulus had done him. This Queen reigned nine years, and left Hircanus in possession of all, whom during her life time she had advanced to the Kingdom. But Aristobulus being both stronger in power, and greater in authority, encountered with his Brother about Jericho; where many of Hircanus's Soldiers forsaking their King, fled to Aristobulus; so that he, and the remnant that followed him, were forced to fly into the Castle called Antonia, where he found Hostages to redeem them, for (as we have already said) Aristobulus his Wife and Children were imprisoned in that place: And left any worse mis-hap should betide him, he concluded a Peace, upon condition that Aristobulus should be King, and that he, as Brother to the King, should enjoy some other Dignities. Upon these conditions they were made friends in the Temple, where in the presence of all the people, they friendly embraced each other; which when they had done, they changed houses, and Aristobulus went to the King's Palace, and Hircanus to Aristobulus's house.

CHAP. V.

Of the War between Hircanus and the Arabians, and of the taking of Jerusalem.

Now a sudden fear invaded all the enemies of Aristobulus, when they saw him (contrary to all expectation) made King; and especially Antipater, above all others, whom Aristobulus had long hated. This Antipater was an Idumean born; and for Nobility and Riches, the chief, and best reputed of his Nation. This man perswaded Hircanus to fly to Aretas King of Arabia, and crave his help to set him in his Kingdom: He exhorted Aretas likewise to receive Hircanus, and to help him to recover his Kingdom; speaking much against the manners of Aristobulus, and praising Hircanus; adding, that he being King of so famous a Nation, ought to assist those who were unjustly oppressed; and that Hircanus had manifest injury offered him, being forced to forsake his Kingdom, which by the right of Succession, was due unto him. After he had thus made his way, he took in the night time Hircanus, and fled with him out of the City; and making all haste possible, they arrived safe at a Town called Petra (a Town where the King of Arabia are accustomed to keep their Court) there he delivered Hircanus into the King's hands, and by many gifts and entreaties, obtained of him that he would assist him to recover his Kingdom. And to the effecting of the same, Aretas gave him an Army of fifty thousand Horse and Foot; which power, Aristobulus not able

A able to resist, was overcome at the first onset, and forced to fly to Jerusalem. Aretas besieged him there, and he had been surely taken, if Scaurus, a Captain of the Romans, taking opportunity at those troubles, had not raised the Siege: For Pompey the Great (who warred against Tigranes) sent him out of Armenia, into Syria: And he coming to Nativity, 99, Damascus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; wherefore, understanding how matters stood in Judea, he halted thither in hope of a booty. As soon as he entered into the Confines of the Country, both the Brethren sent their Ambassadors to him, desiring him to take their parts: But Aristobulus having sent him four hundred Talents, these made him neglect Justice; for Scaurus upon receipt of that Summ, sent messengers to the Arabians and Hircanus, threatening the displeasure of the Romans and Hircanus to depart out of the Country. Aristobulus, that he had escaped from being taken; but gathering all his Forces together, he purified his enemies; and joyning Battel with them about Papyren, he slew six thousand of them; in which number was Cephalon, Antipater's Brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being destitute of the Arabians help, thought fit to seek for succour from the Romans, who had hinder'd them from receiving that of the Arabians. For which cause, as soon as Pompey had enter'd Syria, and was come to Damascus, they in humble manner addressed him with many gifts, and made the same remonstrances to him, that they had made before to Aretas; earnestly requesting him, that he would consider the violence offered by Aristobulus, and restore Hircanus to the Kingdom, to whom both by birthright, and for his virtue, it was due. Aristobulus, who became confident in that he had gained Scaurus by Presents, failed not to repair to Pompey also, and he went with the Equipage and Pomp of a King; but not abiding to debate himself, and thinking it disparagement longer to pay him respects in more abject manner than becomed a King, he returned to Diopolis: Whereat Pompey being angry, at the request of Hircanus and his followers, he went against Aristobulus, accompanied both with the Roman Army, and the Syrians, their Auxiliaries. When they had passed Pella and Diopolis, and came to Corea (where the Confines of Judea begin) as they passed thorough the midst of the Country, they understood that Aristobulus was fled to Alexandrium (a Castle strongly built, and situate upon a very high hill.) Pompey arriving there, sent messengers to him, commanding him to desist: Which imperious manner of so proceeding, appearing insupportable to Aristobulus, he determined rather to hazard himself, than obey. But when he saw that the people began to fear, and that his friends advised him to consider the power of the Romans, whose strength he was no ways able to resist; he followed their counsel, and came to Pompey; where having alleged many reasons to shew that he had just Title to the Crown, he returned again into the Castle. And afterwards, being urged by his Brother to come and plead his Title, he came, and returned thither again, without contradiction from Pompey: As he fluctuated thus betwixt hope and fear, and doubted how the matter would go with him, he resolv'd to go to Pompey, and tell him that he would do all that he should desire of him; but as he was in the midst of his way, fearing lest he should seem to derogate any thing from the Majesty of a King, he returned back again. Pompey willed him to write to the Governours of his Towns and Castles, to surrender (because he had commanded them not to do, except they received Letters written by his own hand:) In this he fulfilled Pompey's mind; yet being angry and discontented, he departed to Jerusalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey: But Pompey not thinking it best to give him time to prepare himself, followed him with all speed; and so much the more willingly, because that near Jericho, he had news of Mithridates his death. This is the fruitfullest place of Judea, where there are great store of Palms and Balm. This Balm is a Shrub, whose Stem being cut with sharp stones, droppeth Balm out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from them. After he had rested there that night, in the morning he halted to Jerusalem. At his sudden arrival, Aristobulus being dismayed, in humble manner came to him, and by promising him money, and to yield himself and the City into his hands, he appeased his anger. But he performed no part of his promise; for his Associates would not suffer Gabinus (who was sent for the money) to enter into the City: For which cause Pompey being moved to displeasure, retain'd Aristobulus in Prison; and coming near the City, he took a view at what place it might be easiest entered, for he did not lightly perceive how he could batter the Walls, they were so strong. Moreover, there was a deep Ditch before the Wall; and hard by he beheld the Temple so fortified, that though the City were taken, it might be a second refuge for the enemy. Whilst thus he long deliberated what to do, there arose a Sedition within within the City; wherein Aristobulus's Confederates thought it best to fight, and deliver the King out of Prison: But those that favoured Hircanus, would that the Gates should be opened to Pompey. At last, Aristobulus's Friends not prevailing, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the last, they cut down the Bridge which leads out of the City into the Temple. When the rest had received the Romans into the City, and delivered to them the King's Palace, Pompey sent a Captain called Piso, with Soldiers to seize the same; who leaving a Garrison in the Town (seeing he could persuade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all things necessary to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends shewed themselves ready to help them to their power, and to do whatsoever they were commanded. Pompey at the North side filled the Ditch and Valley with earth, which his Soldiers carried; though by reason of the great depth, and for that the Jews made resistance, it was a hard thing to be done; and it had been left undone, had not Pompey (observing the seventh day, wherein the Jews Religion obliged them to abstain from all labour) caused it to be filled up those days; forbidding the Soldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the Ditch more conveniently (for it was lawful for the Jews only to do what was necessary to sustain and defend their lives upon the Sabbath.) At last, when the Ditch was filled, and the Towers were built upon the Rampire, he battered the Walls with those Engines that he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten back by those who resisted from the top of the Walls, who rolled stones at them: Against the violent power whereof, the Towers that were built in that Quarter, being of a great and goodly building, resisted extremely well. But the Romans found hard work in this place, and Pompey admired the valour of the Jews; that being amongst the thickest of their enemies Darts, they omitted no Ceremony of their Religion; but (as though they had had firm Peace) they every day observed their Ceremonies, offered Sacrifices, and most diligently performed the Divine Service; yea, though every day they were killed at the Altar, they ceased not from the Lawful Rites of their Religion. At last, in the third Month of the Siege, during which, scarcely one Tower was beaten down, they brake into the Temple; and the first that attempted to climb over the Wall, was Cornelius Fauslus, Sylla's Son; and after him two Centurions, Furius and Fabius, with their Regiments; who compassing the Temple about (while some sought to hide themselves, and others resisted) they slew them all. There were many Priests also among the rest; who, although they saw the enemies with naked Swords rushing upon them, yet being nothing at all dismayed thereat, continued still their Sacrifices, and were slain even whilst they offered and incensed in the Temple; preferring the duty they ow'd to their Religion, even before their own safety. Many also were slain by their own Country-men that favoured the adverse part, and many cast themselves down headlong upon the Rocks; others in their fury, having desperately fired all things upon the Walls, burnt themselves for company. So that twelve thousand Jews were slain, but very few Romans, though many hurt: And amongst all that Massacre, there was nothing so grievous to the Jews, as that the Holy Sanctuary (which never any one saw before that time) was revealed to strangers. For Pompey, with his followers, came into the Temple, where it is lawful for none but the High Priest to come, and saw the Candlesticks, Lamps, Table, Censers, and all the Golden Vessels, and whatsoever was within the Temple. Moreover, he beheld the great Quantity of Odoriferous Drugs, which were kept in store in that place, and two thousand Talents of Holy Money; yet did he not take away these things, nor any thing else belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacrificans to purge and make clean the Temple, and to offer the usual Sacrifice. He likewise confirmed Hircanus High Priest (who had in all things shewed himself very forward, and especially at the time of the Siege; and also hindered a multitude of people, from joining themselves with Aristobulus;) and thus, like a good Captain, he got the good will of the people more by love, than by fear.

Pompey caused the chief and Controversial points to be made.
He also caused the Jews to be delivered from their Government (for they had not as yet destroyed them, because they were suddenly prevented) namely, Hippion, Scythopolis, Pella,

C H A P. VI.

Of the War of Alexander with Hircanus, and also of Aristobulus.

Scaurus advanced with his Army into Arabia; but being by the difficulty of the place hindered, that he could not come to Petra, he waited all the Country adjoining to Pella; although, whilst he stayed to do this, he endured much evil; for there arose a great Famine in his Army, notwithstanding that Hircanus, by Antipater's means, sent them Victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Antipater, as his familiar Friend, to Arctas, to persuade him that by disbursing some money, he should work his Peace. To which motion Arctas consented, and gave him three hundred Talents, and so Scaurus with his Army departed out of Arabia.

In the mean time Alexander the Son of Aristobulus (who, in the way to Rome, escaped from Pompey) gathered together a great Army, and straitly beset Hircanus's waiting all Judea; and hoped quickly to take Jerusalem, because the Wall which was destroyed by Pompey, had not been built up again. But Gabinus, a great Captain, against Hircanus was sent into Syria to succeed Scaurus's march; with an Army against him. Whereupon, fearing the worst, he assembled all the Forces he could, to make resistance; so that he had ten thousand Foot, and a thousand and five hundred Horse: He fortified also the commodious places of the Country; to wit, Alexandrium, Hircania and Macheron, which are near the Mountains of Arabia. Gabinus sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the Army, and followed after with the rest; and certain chosen men out of Antipater's Company, and other Companies of the Jews, gathered together whereof Malichus and Pitholus were made chief, joynd themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinus with all his Company, to meet Alexander.

Alexander perceiving himself unable to encounter all those united Forces, fled; but drawing near Jerusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight; where losing to the number of six thousand (whereof three thousand were taken alive, and other three thousand slain) he escaped with the rest: Gabinus pursued him, and as soon as he came to the Castle called Alexandrium, understanding that many Jews had forsaken their Colours, he, by promising them Pardon, sought to unite them to his Party again; but when he perceived that they hampered on no object resolution, he flew the most of them; and for the rest, he drove them into the Castle. In this Battle Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renown; and although he had always shewed himself valiant, yet there especially his courage appeared. Gabinus leaving him to besiege the Castle, went to the Cities of the Province, and strengthened those that were not yet assailed, and re-edified those that were destroyed; and by his Commandment Scythopolis, Samaria, Antbedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Marissa, Dora, Gadara and Azotus, and many more began to be inhabited, so that their Inhabitants joyfully returned and dwelt therein. Which when he had done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more close Siege; whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, sent Ambassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon him; promising to render unto him the Castles of Macheron and Hircania, which were in his power, besides Alexandrium: All which, Gabinus, by counsel of Alexander's Mother, destroyed, lest might be occasion of new Wars: For the apprehension which this Prince's death had for her Husband, and for her other Children, Prisoners at Rome, made her omit nothing to endeavour to gain the affection of Gabinus. After this, Gabinus carried Hircanus to Jerusalem; and committing the Temple to his charge, he committed to others of the Nobility the care of the Commonwealth, and divided the whole Nation of the Jews into five parts and Governments, whereof one was established at Jerusalem, another another at Doris, the third at Amathus, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sephoris, a City of Galilee: And the Jews being delivered from the Government of one man only, willingly suffered themselves to be ruled by an Aristocratical Government.

But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping from Rome, raised new troubles; and gathering a great Army, partly of those that desired a change, and partly of such as loved him before, took Alexandrium, and began to compass it again with a Wall: But hearing that Gabinus had sent Sisenna, Antonius and Servilius against him with an Army, he went to Macheron; and dismissing those that were not fit for War, he took with him only eight thousand armed men, amongst whom was Pitholaus, Governour of them that were revolted, who with one thousand men, fled out of Jerusalem: But the Romans pursued them; and joining Battle with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force overcome, the Romans slew five thousand of them, and almost two thousand men fled into a Mountain; and the other thousand, breaking the Ranks of the Romans with Aristobulus, retreated to Macheron; where the King hiding himself the first night amongst the Ruines, hoped that having respite, he might gather another Army, and fortify the Castle: But having for two days sustained the Forces of the Romans with extraordinary courage, at last he was taken; and with his Son Antigonus, who had been imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinus, and from thence to Rome, where the Senate put him in Prison; but his Sons they sent into Judea, because Gabinus writ that he had so promised Aristobulus's Wife, upon condition the Castles might be yielded.

The Romans obtain the Victory, and carry away Aristobulus and his Sons to Rome.

Alexander, Aristobulus's Son, once more provoked the Jews to Rebellion.

The Jews overcome by the Romans. Gabinus overcometh the Nabathæans in Battle. Ant. lib. 14. cap. 13. Marcus Cressus taketh away the rest of the Gold of the Temple.

Antipater's Wife a Noble woman of Arabia.

Whilst Gabinus prepared to war against the Parthians, Ptolemy hindered him, being returned from Eufrates, into Egypt: Antipater and Hircanus assisted him with all things belonging to the War; as Money, Weapons, Corn, and Men; and Antipater persuaded the Jews who kept the ways that lead to Pelusium, to suffer Gabinus to pass. Now, in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinus there began a Commotion; and Alexander, Aristobulus's Son, once more incited the Jews to Rebellion; and having gathered a mighty power, purposed to destroy all the Romans that were in that Country: Which Gabinus fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who persuaded some of the Rebels to be quiet; yet thirty thousand remained with Alexander: For which cause he was very forward to fight, and went out to Battle; near Itabyrium they fought, the Romans prevailed, and ten thousand were slain, and the rest were put to flight, and Gabinus returned to Jerusalem by the counsel of Antipater; where having established all things, he marched thence, and overcame the Nabathæans in Battle; he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanes, two Parthian Noblemen, who were fled to him from the Parthians, secretly to depart, saying, that they had escaped from the Soldiers. In the mean time Cassius, who was appointed to be his Successor, had Syria delivered him; and towards the maintenance of the Parthian Wars, he took all the Gold that was in the Temple of Jerusalem, besides the two thousand Talents which Pompey had forborn to touch: But passing over Eufrates, he was both himself and his whole Army utterly overthrown; of which matter it becometh us not to speak in this place. After the death of Cassius, the Parthians endeavoured to enter Syria; but Cassius who succeeded him in the Government, repulsed them; and having gotten the upper hand, he speedily passed into Judea; and taking Tarichea, carried away about three thousand men Captive; and put Pitholaus to death, for gathering a company of seditious people to Aristobulus's part. He that counselled his death was Antipater, who was married to a Noble Woman of Arabia called Cypria, by whom he had four Sons, Phaselus, Herod, afterwards King, Joseph and Phevoras; and one daughter called Salome. His wife Conduct and Liberality got him the Friendship of many Princes, and especially that of the King of Arabia, to whose fidelity he committed his Sons, when he undertook the War against Aristobulus. But Cassius made a Truce with Alexander, and in the mean time went to Eufrates, to hinder the passage of the Parthians; as we shall shew in another place.

C H A P. VII.

Of the death of Aristobulus, and the War undertaken by Antipater and Mithridates.

After that Cesar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flee beyond the Ionian Sea, and by that means made himself sole master of Rome, he let Aristobulus at liberty, and with two Legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his means speedily to reduce both it, and also all places adjoining to Judea: But both the hope of Cesar, and the forwardness of Aristobulus were frustrated by ill Fortune; for Aristobulus was poisoned by Pompey's favourers, and even in his own Country his body lay unburied, which notwithstanding was preferred from putrefaction with honey, till such time as Antonius sent it to the Jews, commanding them to bury it in the Sepulchre of the Kings. His Son Alexander also was beheaded at Antioch by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pompey's Letters accused before the Tribunal-seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romans. Ptolemy Prince of Chalcis which is upon Mount Libanus, sent his Son Philippus to Afcalon, to the widow of Aristobulus, to counsel her to send her Son Antigonus and her daughter to him. Philippus falling in love with the youngest named Alexandra took her to wife. But sometime after he was put to death by his Father, who himself married this Alexandra; and for that affinity sake, was more careful of her Brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all means to get into Cesar's favour: and when Mithridates of Pergamena was hindered by the Garrison at Pelusium to pass further with an Army into Egypt, and was by that means stayed at Afcalon, Antipater not only persuaded the Arabians to assist him, but he himself seconded him with almost three thousand armed Jews. Moreover, he incited the Potentates of Syria, and Ptolemy who inhabited Libanus, and Jamblicus, and his Son Ptolemy to assist him; for whose sakes the Cities of that Country did willingly undertake the War. And now Mithridates strengthened by Antipater's means came to Pelusium; and because they would not suffer him to pass, he besieged the City. In which siege Antipater shewed his valour; for making a breach on that side of the wall where his Quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the City, and so Pelusium was taken. After which the Inhabitants of the Province bearing the name of Onias resolved not to suffer him to pass any further: But Antipater handled the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not only suffer him to pass, but also supplied victuals for his Army. Whereupon the City of Memphis would not fight, but yielded of their own accord to Mithridates: so that passing thorough Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians, in a place called The Camp of the Jews; and being with all his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the River side, set upon and discomfited the left wing of the Enemies battel, and rushing upon them that pressed upon Mithridates, he slew many, and pursued the rest that fled, till he got their Camp, and all this with the loss of fourscore men. But Mithridates lost eight hundred men; and being thus against all hope preserved from being cut in pieces, he was without all envy a true witness before Cesar of all that Antipater had done and delivered. Whereupon Cesar rewarded his courage with praise and promises, and so made him forward to hazard himself for him. In a word, he proved and shewed himself a stout Warriour, and the many wounds he had in every part of his body, were badges and testimonies of his valour and virtue. Afterward when the estate of Egypt was quiet, Cesar returned into Syria, where he made him a Citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities thereof; adding so many other proofs of his esteem and affection, that he rendered him worthy of envy; and for his sake confirmed Hircanus in the High-Priesthood.

Antigonus's Son cometh to Cesar to accuse Pompey's friends for his fathers death.

How Antipater was accused before Cesar. Of the Priesthood of Hircanus, and how Herod made war.

At the same time Antigonus the Son of Aristobulus repairing to Cesar, was against his will a cause of Antipater's greater jealousy: for coming to complain of his Fathers death (who was, as it was thought, poisoned by Pompey's partisans;) with as great hatred as sorrow he accused Hircanus and Antipater of having been the cause ccc

that

that he and his brethren had been so unjustly driven out of their native soil, and H that their Country had suffer'd so great calamities only to satisfy their Passion: alleging that they had sent aid into Egypt to Cæsar's forces, not for good will, but for fear, and that hereby they might blot out the memory of the good will they had born to Pompey. At these words Antipater (drawing aside his vesture) shewed the number of his wounds, saying, it was not needful to use words to prove what affection he had born to Cæsar; for his very body shew'd it, although he himself held his peace: adding, that he admired the impudent boldness of Antigonus, who being Son to an enemy of the Romans, and a fugitive from Rome, and as inclinable as his Father to Rebellion, dar'd to accuse before the Roman Emperour others that had been always faithful to him; and that in stead of accounting himself happy in having his life preserv'd, hop'd to obtain such favours and assistance as he had no need of, and which he desir'd not but to make use of the same to raise seditions against those to whom he should be beholding for them.

Which when Cæsar heard, he said that Hircannus was most worthy to be High Priest, and bad Antipater name what Charge he would have: who leaving that to the pleasure of the giver, he was made Governour of all Judea. And moreover he obtained leave to re-edifie the razed walls of his Country; and Cæsar commanded that this Decree should be engraven in Tables of Brass and in the Capitol, that it might be a memorial in time to come of Antipater's justice and virtue. Antipater having attended Cæsar out of Syria, first of all repaired the ruined walls of his Country, which Pom- K
pey had razed: and going throughout all the Country, he threatened the obstinate, and perswaded the seditious to obedience, admonishing them, that if they obeyed Hircannus, they might live in wealth and peace, and enjoy happiness; but if they suffered themselves to be led away with the vain hopes of those, who for their private commodity sought alteration, then they should find him in stead of a Govern-our, a severe Master, and Hircannus instead of a King, a Tyrant; and the Romans and Cæsar, instead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not suffer his power to be overthrown, whom they themselves had established King. Antipater in speaking thus considered himself and the need of providing for the safety of the State, because he well knew the sloth and stupidity of Hircannus. He made Phaselus L his eldest Son Governour of the Army, and of Jerusalem, and of the whole Province; and sent Herod his youngest Son to govern Galilee (although he was very young) who being by nature valiant and ambitious, sought out occasion to shew his brave mind. He took Ezechiab Captain of a troop of Thieves, who, as he understood, were wont to prey upon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other Thieves: which thing was so grateful to the Syrians, that in all Towns and Villages they made songs of Herod, as though he had restored them to peace and to their Possessions. This action also made his merit known to Sextus Cæsar, who was Cæsar's Emperour's Kinsman and Governour of Syria. Phaselus also striving to exceed the virtue and gallantry of his Brother, us'd M all his endeavours to win to himself the good will of the Inhabitants of Jerusalem:

 so that during the time he governed the City, he did nothing insolently or by force.
 For which cause the people honoured Antipater no less than if he had been their King, yet was his fidelity and affection never the less towards Hircannus. But it is impossible that any man that liveth in prosperity, should not be envied. For Hircannus, although before-time he was moved something at the glory of the Father and the young men, and especially with the prosperous success of Herod's yet in particular he was stirred up by many envious persons (who use to haunt the Courts of Princes) who were grieved that Antipater and his Sons ruled without offence. These men told Hircannus that he only enjoyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his Sons ruled N all; and that he would so long permit and wink at them, till at the last, they would make themselves Kings; for they now did no more pretend themselves to be Ministers, but leaving that Title, they acted as Lords and Sovereigns, without any regard or reverence towards him; as appeared in Herod who had put to death a great multitude of Jews against the Law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had given him any such authority: and that Herod, if he were not a King but a private person, was to be brought into judgment, there to answer the matter, and shew the King a reason, and satisfy the laws of his Country; which permit no man to be put to death, before by Law he be convicted. By these perswasions Hircannus grew angry: so that not concealing his wrath, he caus'd Herod O to be sent for to answer the matter: who both for that his Father advertised him thereto, and because he trusted to the equity of his cause, first leaving a Garrison

A In Galilee, he repaired to the King, accompanied with a sufficient Guard, not so great as to give jealousy to Hircannus, nor so small as to expose him to the attempts of his Adversaries. Sextus Cæsar, who lov'd the young man much, and feared lest any evil should betide him amongst his enemies, sent to Hircannus, warning him to absolve Herod from the crimes of which he was accus'd. Which Hircannus, who also lov'd Herod, made no difficulty to do. But Herod, supposing he had done it unwillingly, went to Damascus to Sextus, purposing not to appear, if hereafter he were sent for. Hereupon Hircannus was once again incited against Herod by his enemies, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, with design to enterprize some thing against him: which Hircannus believing, knew not what to do, seeing his enemy
 B more potent than himself.

Shortly after Sextus Cæsar proclaimed him General of the Army, both in Syria and Samaria; so that now he was greatly to be feared by Hircannus, not only for that he was highly in favour with the Commonalty, but also for the forces which he commanded. Hereupon Hircannus fell into extreme fear, verily perswading himself that Herod with his whole Army would presently come against him. Neither was his suspicion vain: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accus'd, came with a great Army to Jerusalem, intending to depose Hircannus; which he had effected, had not his Father and Brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, entreating him that he would account that terror (wherein he had put his enemies)
 C and his own indignation a sufficient revenge, and that he would spare the King, by whose favour he came to be so potent; adding moreover, that he ought not to take ill that he was called to answer his accusations, since he was acquitted of them, and consequently ought to shew himself grateful to the King who had saved his life.
 Moreover, that Prudence obliged him to consider the fortune of war, together with the cause thereof; that the justice of Hircannus side might do more for him than a whole Army; and that he ought not to hope for victory, being to fight against his own King, who had always been gracious unto him, and never had thought of doing him hurt, but only being as it were urged thereunto by some of his Council, who through meer envy, and to satisfy their own passions, had framed a shadow of an accusation against him. Herod was satisfied herewith, and suppos'd it to be sufficient D in order to his great designs, to have shewed his forces and his power unto his Nation.

At this time began Civil war among the Romans near Apamia, in which Cæcilius Bassus murder'd Bassus, for the love he bare to Sextus Pompey, slew Sextus Cæsar at unawares, and made himself Governour of his Army; and other Captains of Cæsar's to revenge his death, cre-made after Bassus with all their forces; unto whom Antipater by his two Sons sent aid, both for the sake of Cæsar that was slain and of him that was yet alive (for he was an entire friend and well-willer unto them both) and these wars continuing long, Marcus E came out of Italy to succeed Sextus.

Cæsar's death. Cassius comes into Syria; Herod ingratiate with him. Malichus poysons Antipater, who had sav'd his life. For which Herod causes him to be slain.

A T this time arose great and bloody Civil Wars amongst the Romans, after Cæsar was slain by the treason of Cassius and Brutus, having ruled the Empire Marcus, Scæthree years and seven months. By reason of which murder their troubles daily increased, and the Nobility being at variance amongst themselves, every one followed that course, that they thought most expedient for themselves. Whereupon Cassius, slain by Br-utus presently march'd into Syria, to take possession of the Government of the Army, and which was about Apamia; where he made Marcus and Bassus friends, took the conduct of the Legions which they commanded, and rais'd the siege from Apamia, and leading the Army in his own person, he forced every City to be tributary, and exacted without measure. He commanded the Jews to contribute seven hundred Talents: Antipater fearing his displeasure, appointed his Sons and others of his friends presently to gather the money; and especially amongst the G rest, he gave this charge to one Malichus a friend of his. But Herod first of all got Cassius his favour, having brought him an hundred Talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or Province. As for the rest, he accused them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that having pillaged Gophna and Ammauttes, and other two small Cities, he march'd onwards with intent to kill Malichus, for that he had been so careless and negligent in gathering the tribute-money. But Antipater (presently disbursing unto Cassius an hundred Talents) saved both him and all the rest of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficial Antipater had been unto him, but oftentimes treacherously laid wait to murder him because he hindered and withstood his villainous pretensions; notwithstanding that himself had often confessed that Antipater had saved his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtilty, passed over the River Jordan to gather an Army, that he might prevent those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, saw nothing left for him to do but to dissemble; and accordingly by many oaths and excuses he won Phaselus chief of the Garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod who was master of the Army, that they should be a means to reconcile him unto Antipater. Whereupon Antipater intreating Marcus (who was General of the Army in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was saved. The reason that Marcus would have put him to death, was, because Malichus was of a turbulent and factious spirit.

The young Cesar, surnamed afterwards Augustus, and Antonius warring against Cassius and Brutus; Brutus and Cassius gathered an Army in Syria; and in consideration of the great capacity of Herod, they made him Procurator of all Syria, giving him a band of horse and foot. Moreover Cassius promised him, that if the war had an happy end, he would make him King of Judea. But it so came to pass, that the merit of Herod, which raised this hope so high, was the cause of Antipater's Fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in fear, hired one of the Kings officers for a certain sum of money to poison Antipater; by which means he died, being thus unjustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to govern, and recovered the Kingdom being lost for Hircanus: Malichus (perceiving the people incensed against him, because they suspected that he had poisoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet for his better security, he gathered about him a Guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but would presently come with an Army to revenge his fathers death. But by the counsel of his brother Phaselus (who felt him word not openly to encounter Malichus, lest a sedition might arise among the people) he patiently permitted it so to be, and suffered Malichus to justify himself, and celebrated a solemn funeral for his Father: which done, he went to Samaria, and appealed the sedition wherewith that City was disquieted. After this he returned to Jerusalem, intending to celebrate the Festival, and having sent certain of his armed men before him, he appointed the rest to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, solicited Hircanus to give order, that no strangers should intermingle themselves among the people, to disturb their devotion. But Herod contemning this Prohibition entered the City by night: whereupon Malichus once more came to him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his displeasure, yet dissembled the same: and sent letters to Cassius, wherein he complained of his fathers death. Cassius already hated Malichus sufficiently, and so he writ again to Herod, willing him to revenge his fathers death; which that he might the better effect, he secretly commanded the Captains of his Regiment to assist him. Now for that after the surprisal of Laodicea, all the best of the City came to Herod, bringing presents and crowns, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended revenge: which Malichus suspecting as he was near Tyre, he purposed secretly to get away his son, who was there a pledge, and to flee into Judea. But despair of his own safety urged him to greater matters; for he hoped to incite the Jews to take Arms against the Romans, whilst Cassius was now busie in the War against Antonius; so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and make himself King. But God prevented these vain hopes: For Herod, suspecting he had some great design, invited him and Hircanus to supper, in order to which he made a shew as though he had sent one of his servants to cause a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he sent him to the Roman Captains to tell them to lie in wait for Malichus: who remembering what charge Cassius gave them, came forth of the City to the shore next adjoining to the Town, all armed with swords; where compassing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat astonished, fell in a swoon, and being scarcely come to himself, he demanded who killed Malichus; one of the Captains answered, that Cassius gave the commandment: whereupon he answered, truly Cassius hath preserved me and my Country, in killing him who was a Traitor to us both: but whether herein

Herod intended to revenge his Father's death.

Malichus sought with Hircanus, Cassius charged Herod by letters to revenge his fathers death.

The decree of fate laugheth at humane hope. Herod's Tribunes kill Malichus.

A he spake as he thought, or that for fear he approved the fact, it is uncertain. Thus was Herod revenged upon Malichus.

C H A P. X.

How Herod was accused, and set free

After Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition in Jerusalem: for Felix came with an Army against Phaselus, to be revenged upon Herod for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod was at that time at Damascus with Fabius a Roman Captain, and would have come to assist Phaselus, but by the way he fell sick, so that he could not succour him: but it so fell out, that Phaselus without any help, did of himself overcome Felix, and afterwards reproached Hircanus as ungrateful, in that he had both favoured Felix, and suffered Malichus's brother to seize upon divers place (as already he had done, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada;) Yet all these did not protect him from Herod, who was no sooner recovered of his sickness, but presently he retook them all, and at Hircanus's request permitted him to depart. He also chased Marion, whom Cassius had made Prince of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who had got three Castles in that Country. As for the Tyrians that he took, he spared their lives, and sent some away with rewards; whereby he got the good will of the City, and the hatred of the Tyrant. Which Marion had gotten into his hands all Syria; and for the hatred he bore to Herod, took with him Antigonus, Aristobulus's Son, and marched against him: and by Fabius's means, whom Antigonus had gained to himself by money: he also got Ptolemy to assist him in this expedition; which Ptolemy was father-in-law to Antigonus, and furnished him with all necessities. Herod likewise, having prepared himself against them, gave them battle in the entrance into Judea, and got the victory: and having put Antigonus to flight, he returned to Jerusalem, right by Herod, where he was honoured by all men for his courage in that victory; so that even they that before despised him, now by reason of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship and familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of his own Country, named Doris, and had by her a Son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamne, daughter of Alexander (who was Aristobulus's son) and of Alexander Hircanus's daughter, by reason whereof he came to be in favour with the King. But when Cassius was slain near Philippi, Cesar departed into Italy, and Antonius into Asia; at which time the chief of the Jews came and accused Phaselus and Herod, alleging that they by force got unto themselves the rule of the Country, and left Hircanus only the bare name of King. But Herod being then present, so wrought himself into Antonius's favour by a great sum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to speak one word more; who thereupon returned home. Afterward an hundred men of the most honourable amongst the Jews, repaired to Daphne near Antioch to Antonius (now doting on the love of Clodopatra) and offered an accusation against the two brethren, having chosen some of the greatest Quality and Eloquence to speak for them, Messala undertook their defence being assisted by Hircanus. Antonius having heard both parties demanded of Hircanus, whom he thought the fittest to govern the Common-wealth? who answered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had been most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinus into Judea;) and thereupon he made them Tetrarchs, committing to them the rule of all Judea: which, when the Jews Ambassadors misliked, he put fifteen of them in prison, and was near resolving to put them to death; the rest he sent away after he had treated them very ill: Whereupon there arose greater tumults in Jerusalem, and the Jews sent another Embassage of a thousand men to Tyre, where Antonius resided with intent to come against Jerusalem. Antonius displeased with their murmurs and complaints, commanded the Magistrates of Tyre to kill all they could catch of the Jews, and to maintain their Authority, whom he himself had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod and Hircanus went to these Deputies, who walk'd on the Sea-shore, admonishing them earnestly to be contented, lest by their indiscreet proceeding, they should become not only the cause of their own deaths, but also of War against their own Country; but because they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions, Antonius sent out certain armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the rest. Hircanus after this disaster caused the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured, notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not contain themselves in Peace, but so troubled the City, that Antonius in displeasure, slew those that he had in hold.

Herod in Jerusalem, and Phasaelus in the Camp, are in danger of their lives.

Two years after this, and when Barzapharnes, a great Noble man of the Parthians, governed Syria with Pacorus the King's Son, Lysanias who had succeeded his Father Ptolomæus, Son of Mincus, promised them a thousand Talents, and five hundred Women, to put Antigonus in possession of the Kingdom of Judæa, and depose Hircanus. Being induced by these promises, Pacorus march'd along the Sea-coast, and Barzapharnes pass'd through the midst of the Country. But amongst the rest of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus (notwithstanding the Citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had given him entertainment) wherefore he gave part of his Horse unto one who was the King's Butler, called Pacorus (as himself was) commanding him to pass into Judæa, and learn what their enemies meant to do, and to help Antigonus where need required. As they waited the Country about Carmel, many Jews came of their own accord, and joyned with Antigonus, shewing themselves very prompt to fight; for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos; where having fought with his enemies, and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speed as far as Jerusalem: And his number being augmented, he came to the King's Palace. But Hircanus and Phasaelus met them with a strong Company, and fought with them in the Market-place, where the enemies were forced to fly, and part of them were by Herod shut up in the Temple; and he appointed to keep them sixty men, which he placed in the houses next adjoining. But the people bearing a grudge to the two Brethren, set the houses on fire: Whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) set upon the people, and killed a great many of them, and every hour one laid wait for another, so that every day some were murdered. Now the Feast of Pestecost drawing nigh, all places about the Temple, and the whole City, was filled with people of the Country, whereof the most part was armed; and Phasaelus kept the Walls, and Herod with a small Company, kept the King's Palace; and assaulting their enemies upon the siddain, as they were in the Suburbs, they killed a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight; part of them he coup'd up in the City, others he shut in the Temple, and the rest between that and the uttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come and treat a Peace betwixt them. Phasaelus moved by these prayers received the Parthian into the City, and entertained him into his house, accompanied with five hundred Horse, who came under a pretence to make Peace; but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus; for craftily conspiring against Phasaelus, he persuaded him to repair to Barzapharnes as an Ambassadour to treat a Peace, notwithstanding that Herod altogether dissuaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to trust his subtilty; adding that the Parthians were naturally unfaithful.

Pacorus departing out of the City, took Hircanus with him that he might be the less suspected; and leaving some Horse with Herod, named * Eleutheri, he followed Phasaelus with the rest. When they came near Galilee, they found the Inhabitants at variance, and up in Arms, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily, with pretence of courtly and friendship, hid his Treachery) who after he had bestowed Presents upon them, and that they were retired, laid an Ambush for them; whereof they had intelligence as they came to a place near the Sea-coast named Edippion. Here they were informed of the thousand Talents that were promised, and how that Antigonus had given the Parthians more than five hundred women of those that were amongst them; and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and had been lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod was surprized in Jerusalem, lest he hearing what was become of them, might provide for himself. Now they perceived that these were not only words, for they beheld some Guards not far off: Yet would not Phasaelus forsake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Osilius (to whom Saramalla, the richest amongst the Syrians had declared all the Treason) exhorted him to fly; but he chose rather to go to Barzapharnes, and to upbraid him to his face, that he had treacherously laid wait for him, and for money had suffered himself to be corrupted; whereas he himself would have given more for his life and liberty, than Antigonus had done for the Kingdom.

A dom. At these words the Parthian with Oaths and Protellations craftily freed himself from suspicion, and repaired to Pacorus. But presently the Parthians, who stayed behind, and had charge so to do, laid hands on Phasaelus and Hircanus, who openly exclaimed against their fallhood and perjury.

In the mean time Pacorus was sent out to surprize Herod, and by some stratagem to trow him out of the City: He wrought by all the means he could, according as he was instructed; but Herod who was always wont to mistrust the perfidious practices of the Parthian, and believed that the Letters which Phasaelus had writ to him to discover the Treason, were fallen into the enemies hands, would not go forth, though Pacorus incited him to ride out and meet them that brought the Letters, for he had already learnt the taking of Phasaelus; and Mariamne to a very wife woman, Hircanus's Daughter, with many entreaties persuaded Herod not to go forth, but to beware how he trusted himself to the mercy of that Barbarous people, whose ill designs he could not be ignorant of. Whilst Pacorus was consulting with his Complices, how he might privily effect his Treasons (seeing it was not possible openly to circumvent a man of so great Wisdom) Herod in the night time, whilst his enemies neither knew nor suspected his intent, took his nearest kindred, and fled into Idumæa; which being once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cause, he made his Mother, his Brethren and Mariamne, whom he had espoused, and her Mother and youngest Brother to keep on their journey, and he with his Servants warily assaulted the Parthians; and having in divers assaults killed a great number of them, he hastened towards the Castle of Massada; and in his retreat sustained more harm by the Jews, than by the Parthians; who, as they had been always troublesome, so now within three score furlongs from the Town, they set upon him: The Battel was long, but Herod obtained the Victory, killed a great many of them; and in remembrance of the action, built on that place a most stately Palace, and a strong Castle, which from his own name he called Herodion. In this retreat many joyned with him: But when he came to Thersa, a Town of Idumæa, because Phasaelus could not receive such a multitude (for the number amounted to above nine thousand.) Herod, according to his counsel, dismissed those that were unfit for his turn, and sent them into Idumæa, giving them necessaries for their journey. As for those that were chosen men, and fit for his purpose, he retained them with him, and so he was received into the Castles, where leaving eight hundred Soldiers to defend the women, and Provision sufficient for those that were within, he himself went to Petra, a City of Arabia.

In the mean time the Parthians at Jerusalem began to sack the houses of them that were fled, and the King's Palace; they only obtained from Hircanus's money, which amounted to more than three hundred Talents. As for other men's Goods, they found not so much as they expected; for Herod long before, suspecting the infidelity of the Parthians, had sent all his Riches and Jewels into Idumæa, as his followers also had done. When the Parthians had taken the spoil, they were so impious, that they left no place of the whole Country free from Pillage: They destroyed the City of Marsfa, and bound Phasaelus and Hircanus, and delivered them in Chains to Antigonus, who presently cut off Hircanus's ears, to the end, that if by some alteration, he chanced hereafter to get loose, he might be no more High Priest; for by our Law, none may offer Sacrifice, that wants any member of his body. But Phasaelus's fortitude prevented the cruelty of Antigonus; for having neither Weapon, nor his hands at liberty, he beat out his own brains against a stone, and died; demonstrating himself by that act, to be the true Brother of Herod and not a Poltron like Hircanus: Yet some report that Antigonus sent a Chirurgion under pretence to cure the wound, who filled the same with venemous Medicines, and so killed him. It is reported likewise, that understanding before his death by means of a certain woman, that Herod was escaped, he spake these words; Now I shall die without regret, since I leave behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies; and so he died. Although the Parthians had not yet received the five hundred women promised them (which was the chief thing they looked for) yet they established Antigonus in Jerusalem, and led Hircanus Prisoner into Parthia. But Herod with all speed hastened into Arabia, as if his Brother had been yet alive, to the intent to borrow money of the King of Arabia, with which alone he hoped that the cruelty of those barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phasaelus: For his opinion was, that although the Arabian had now forgot his Father's Friendship, and were hard-hearted; yet at least he would lend him money, seeing it was to redeem his Brother, whose Son he meant to leave as a Pledge for it. For Herod took with him a Son of his Brother's into Arabia, that was seven years old; and purposed to give 300 Talents.

Talents for his Ransom, and had made the Tyrians intercessors for him to the Parthians: But Fortune prevented his endeavours, so that his love and care for his Brother prevailed nothing. He found also that the Arabians renounc'd the League of Amity; for Malichus their King sent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all speed to depart out of his Dominions; pretending that the Parthians had sent Ambassadors to him, to request him to drive him out of his Country; but indeed the cause was, that his ingratitude suffered him not to pay that which Antipater had deserved, or require his Sons, now comfortless, for those good turns that he had received at their Father's hands: And those who counsel'd him to this, were such as offered to forswear those Summs which Antipater had put them in trust with, who were the chiefest men about him. Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes for that which he thought would procure him friendship, answered the Messenger according as his resentment moved him, and took his journey towards Egypt; and the first night he lodged in a Country Temple, to the intent that those of his company that were behind him might overtake him. The next day coming to Rhinoflura, his Brother's death was told him; after he had paid what he could not refuse to the first sentiments of so violent a sorrow, he went forward.

In the mean time the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himself of that which he had done to Herod, and sent Messengers after him to desire him to return, but they could not overtake him, he had marched so fast. When Herod was come to Pellusium, the Mariners of the City would not receive him into their Vessels; for which cause, he in person went to the Governors; who reverencing the Fame and Dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no looner came, but Cleopatra received him very honourably, intending to make him General of her Army which was preparing at that time. But he neither regarding the offers of the Queen, nor yet discouraged by the hard Winter Season, nor the dangers of the Seas, took his journey towards Rome; and being in great danger of Shipwrack near Pamphilia, both he and the rest of the Passengers, were forced to cast away the most part of their lading: with much ado he arrived safe at Rhodes, which had been much ruined in the War against Cassius; there he was entertained by two of his friends, Ptolomey and Sipinas; and although his money grew scant, yet there he built a great Galley with three Ranks of Oars; and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he sailed to Brundisium, and from thence went straight to Rome. Where first of all (in regard of the familiarity between his Father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring unto him both his own calamity, and the miserable desolation of the whole Country; and how, leaving his dearest friends besieged in a Castle, himself through the stormy Winter Seas was come to him, to implore his assistance. Antonius compassionating his calamity, and remembering his familiarity with Antipater, and esteeming the merit of Herod which stood before him, determined to make him King of the Jews, whom before, he himself had made Tetrarch: For he loved not Herod so well, but he hated Antigonus as much; holding him both a seditious person, and an enemy to the Romans. Now, to the accomplishment of this, he found Cesar far more ready than himself, when he called to mind the service that Antipater did in Egypt under his Father, and his entertainment and friendship in all things: And besides all these, he was much satisfied with Herod's courage and ability. Wherefore he caused the Senate to be assembled, wherein Mefala and himself, in the presence of Herod, recounted his Father's deserts and fidelity towards the Romans; declaring Antigonus to be an enemy, not only because he had formerly revolted, but for that now lately, in despite of the Romans, he had by the assistance of the Parthians, usurped the Kingdom. With which considerations the Senate being moved, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Roman Wars against the Parthians, that Herod should be created King, the whole Senate consented: and when it was dismissed, Antonius and Cesar came forth with Herod between them, and the Consuls marched before him accompanied with other Magistrates to offer Sacrifice, and to Register the Decree of the Senate in the Capitol. After which Antonius feasted Herod the first day of his Reign.

Of Herod's War for the recovering of Jerusalem after his return from Rome; and how he warred against the Thieves.

AT this time Antigonus besieged those that were left in the Castle of Massada, who had great store of Victuals, and wanted nothing but Water. Joseph, Herod's dearest friends, for that he had intelligence that Malichus repented that he had given Herod no better entertainment. And accordingly he had forsaken the Castle, had not great store of rain fallen that very night, wherein he intended to flee; but the Wells and Cisterns being now filled with Water, there was no cause to flee; so that issuing out of the Castle, he assaulted Antigonus's Soldiers, and killed very many of them; sometimes in open fight, and sometimes by policy: Yet, he fought not always with fortunate success, but returned sometimes with loss. In the mean time, Ventidius (who was General of the Roman Army which was sent to expel the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulsed them, came into Judaea, under pretence to succour Joseph and the rest that were besieged; but in effect, to get money from Antigonus. When therefore he drew near Jerusalem, and had received the money he looked for, he departed with the greatest part of his Army, leaving Silo behind him with a few to colour his pretence: And Antigonus hoping for a second Supply from the Parthians, corrupted Silo not to molest him for the present. By this time Herod having sailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great Army of Strangers and his own Countrey-men together, came into Galilee against Antigonus, being assisted with the Forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Gellius, who was sent from Antonius, persuaded to establish Herod in his Kingdom. But Ventidius was busy in appealing the Broils that the Parthians had made in the Cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: Yet did not Herod want aid; for every day, the further he marched into the Country, the more his Army encreased, all Galilee (very little excepted) yielding unto him. Whereupon he purposed first of all to go to Massada, to deliver his friends that were there besieged; but Joseph hindered his purpose; which being an enemy Town, he thought best to take it before he went any further, lest whilst he was going to Jerusalem, his enemies should have a place behind him to flee to. Now Silo joyned Armies with Herod, rejoicing that he had found occasion to retire; but he was pursued by the Jews of Antigonus's Party, who Herod with a loose Wing of his Army, and a small Company of men, encountered, and presently put to flight, and saved Silo, who had much ado to make resistance against them. This done, and Joseph taken, he halted to Massada; and the people of the Country (some for his Father's sake, others for his own, and many for both) joyned themselves to him: Many also, came to him for hope, because he was now King, so that now he had a very puissant Army: But Antigonus hindered his journey, by planting certain Ambushes in places convenient, where Herod was to pass; though by all this they little harmed him.

Herod having raised the Siege of Massada, and rescued his friends, from thence went to Jerusalem; where both Silo's Soldiers, and many of the City came and joyned with him. Being now terrified with the greatness of his Forces, these pitching their Tents at the west side of the Town, they that guarded that part, assaulted them with Darts and Arrows; and others issuing by Troops forth of the City, assaulted the Front of the Army: Whereupon Herod caused one to go about the Walls of the City, and to proclaim, how that he was come for the good of the whole City; and that he would not take revenge of any, though his open enemy; but would pardon, even them that hindered the Crier's voice from being heard, lest any man should alter his mind; Herod presently commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the Wall upon which order, they shot such a flight of Arrows and Darts from the top of the Towers, that they forced them to retire. At this time Silo was detected to have been corrupted with money; for he solicited many Soldiers to cry out that they wanted Provisions, and to ask money and Victuals, and to crave to be dismissed and sent into some fit place of Quarter during the Winter, because Antigonus had laid waste all the Country; and even Silo himself offered to be gone, and exhorted others to do the like. But Herod seeing himself ready to be forsaken, went to the Captains that served under Silo; and calling many of the Soldiers together, requested them not to forsake him at that exigent, whom Cesar, Antonius, and the whole Senate (as they knew) had sent thither; promising them them, that within one day he would relieve all their necessities. When he had thus entreated them, himself went about the Fields, and brought them so much Provision that he cut off all Silo's excuses; and foreseeing left hereafter there should be any want, he sent Letters to Samaria (which City about this time had put it self under his protection) willing them to bring Victuals, and Wine, and Oyl, and Cattel to Jericho, Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certain of his men to lie in Ambush in the Fields, and suddenly to set upon those that came for Provision, and kill them, and so hinder them from carrying any Victuals to the Camp: according to his Commandment, there went a great number of Soldiers to Jericho, and placed themselves upon the Mountains, with an intent to espy if any body carried Provision to the Army. In the mean time Herod rested not; for taking with him ten Companies (five of the Romans, and five of the Jews, with three hundred Mercenaries, and a few Herod's) he came to Jericho, where he found the City without Inhabitants, and five hundred with their Wives and Families had placed themselves upon the tops of the Mountains; whom when he had surprized, he permitted to depart. But the Romans brake into the City, and sacked it (where they found the houses stored with all manner of Riches;) and the King leaving a Garrison at Jericho, returned. He sent likewise the Roman Soldiers to the Provinces which were on his side; to wit, Idumaea, Galilee and Samaria, that they might abide there till Winter was past. Antigonus also, through Silo's means (whom by money he had made his friend) obtained that a part of his Army might (during the Winter time) abide at Lidda, that he might by this means obtain the favour of Anto-

Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certain of his men to lie in Ambush in the Fields, and suddenly to set upon those that came for Provision, and kill them, and so hinder them from carrying any Victuals to the Camp: according to his Commandment, there went a great number of Soldiers to Jericho, and placed themselves upon the Mountains, with an intent to espy if any body carried Provision to the Army. In the mean time Herod rested not; for taking with him ten Companies (five of the Romans, and five of the Jews, with three hundred Mercenaries, and a few Herod's) he came to Jericho, where he found the City without Inhabitants, and five hundred with their Wives and Families had placed themselves upon the tops of the Mountains; whom when he had surprized, he permitted to depart. All this time Herod was not idle, but accompanied with two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, he went about Idumaea, and sent also his Brother Joseph, left by Antigonus's means the people should rebel. And having carried his Mother, and the rest of his Kindred, whom he took from Massada, into Samaria, and placed them where no danger might befall them; himself went into Galilee, to subdue that part of the Country which as yet was not in his hands, and to expel from thence the Garrisons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sepphoris, notwithstanding there was a very great Snow, he easily took it, for the Garrison fled before he assaulted it; and finding there great store of Provision, he refreshed his Soldiers, which now with Winter weather were much harassed; and then sent them against the great number of Thieves that infested that Province, and lay lurking in Dens and Caves; and who making off-encursions upon the Country, molested the Inhabitants no less than if they had been an Army of Enemies. And sending before three Companies of Foot, and one Troop of Horse into a Village called Arbela, himself forty days after came thither with the whole Army. For all this the Thieves feared him not, but arming themselves, came to meet him, trusting to their experience in Warlike affairs, and their own desperate courage. The Battle being joyned, the Right Wing of their Party put the Left Wing of Herod's to flight; but he with his Right Wing presently succoured them, and recalled his men that fled; and rushing violently upon his enemies, he a little stopped their career; till at last the Fore-front of their Battle, not able to stand any longer, fled: Herod pursued them even unto Jordan, and killed many of them; those that escaped fled over the River. And thus he freed Galilee from that fear, save that yet there were left some lurking in the Caves, by whom he was constrained to make a longer stay. Wherefore, first of all he gave the Soldiers some fruit of their labours, distributing to every one of them an hundred and fifty Drachmes of Silver, and unto the Captains more, and so he sent them where they should pass the Winter. Also he writ unto his youngest Brother Pheroras, to provide necessities for them, and to build a Wall about the Castle of Alexandrium; which he performed.

In the mean while Antigonus passed the time about Albens, and Ventidius sent for Silo and Herod, to assist him in the War against the Parthians after they had settled the affairs of Judea, so as no longer to need their presence. Herod willingly sent Silo unto Ventidius; and in the mean time he with his Army went against the Thieves in the Caves. These Caves were in very steep Mountains, so that there was no way to come to them, save only by crooked and very narrow passages: And these Mountains were all Rocks of Stone, hanging over the Valleys; so that the King a great while was doubtful what to do, seeing the place so inaccessible. At last, Herod devised a way scarcely heard of before; for he put the valiantest of his men into Chefts, and so let them down to the mouths of the Caves, where they killed the Thieves and their Families, and put fire to them that resisted. And Herod seeking to save some of them, caused a Trumpet to publish to them, that they might come to him with safety; but there was not one that

A that came; and those that were forced, chose rather to kill themselves than be his Captives: So that an old man having seven Sons and a Wife, who all requested him that they might go forth to the King and save their lives, killed them all after this manner: Himself stood before the door of the Cave, and bad them come forth one by one, and always as one of them came forth, he killed him. And Herod being in a place where he might behold this spectacle, being moved with compassion, stretched forth his hand and requested him to spare his Children: But he being nothing moved to compassion by Herod's words, upbraided Herod's meanness of mind; and having butchered his Sons, he also killed his Wife; and casting the dead bodies down into the Valleys, at last he cast himself likewise down headlong.

B. Herod having thus taken the Caves, and slain those that were in them, left such a part of his Army, as he thought might suffice to repress any that should attempt a Rebellion, under the Command of Ptolomey, and returned to Samaria, carrying with him three thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse against Antigonus. After his departure, those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, having now (as they thought) opportunity, assaulted Ptolomey at unawares, and killed him; and having wasted the Country, retired into Marsh Grounds, and Strong Holds. Which when Herod understood, he presently came to succour the Country, and killed most part of the enemies; and having taken all the Castles by force, he exacted an hundred Talents for a punishment of that revolt, to be paid by the Cities. In the mean time the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slain, Ventidius, in obedience to Letters from Antigonus, sent Machabera to Herod with a thousand Horse, and two Legions of Foot, to assist him against Antigonus. Antigonus writ Letters to Machabera, desiring him to help him; and complaining that Herod had injured him, promised him a great sum of money: But he thinking it not best to forsake him he was sent to succour, especially seeing that Herod would give more, would not be suborned by him; yet counterfeiting himself to be Antigonus's friend, under that pretence to discover what Forces he had, contrary to Herod's counsel, he went to him. But Antigonus distrustful his intent, kept him out of the City, and like an enemy drove him away from the Walls: Machabera alarmed of what he had done, returned to Emmanus unto Herod; and being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, he killed all the Jews he found, not respecting whether they favoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was moved, and purposed to be revenged upon Machabera, as an enemy; yet he bridled himself, and halted to Antigonus, to let him understand Machabera's cruelty: Machabera remembering how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties besought him to be reconciled, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his journey to Antigonus; and hearing that he was now with a great Army besieging Samosata (a very strong City near Euphrates) he made the more haste; thinking it now a fit time to shew his affection and his courage, and that thereby he might win Antigonus's favour the more. His arrival hastened the taking of the place, which Antiochus was constrained to deliver; for he killed a great number of the enemies, and had for his reward a great part of the Spoil; and Antigonus, though before he admired his virtue, yet now his opinion of him increased, so that he had a greater addition of his honour, and reason to hope his establishment in the Kingdom.

Of the death of Joseph. How Herod besieged Jerusalem; and how Antigonus was slain.

F IN the mean time Herod's Affairs in Judea went backward. He had left his Brother Joseph Governour of all, and commanded him to attempt nothing against Antigonus till his return; for he little trusted to Machabera's help, because of the part he had played before. But Joseph seeing his Brother to be far off, regarded not what charge was left him, but went to Jericho with his own Troops, and five Companies of Horse which Machabera sent with him, thinking now in Harvest time to have taken away their Corn; but being assaulted by the enemies upon the Mountains, and in difficult places, himself was there slain, after he had shewed himself in the fight a worthy and valiant man; and there was not one left alive of all the Roman Horse, for they had been newly levied in Syria, and they had no old Soldiers amongst them to assist their want of experience. Antigonus not contented with the Victory, became such a Tyrant, that having the dead bodies in his power, he cut off Joseph's head, and caused his body to be scourged, although Pheroras his Brother offered fifty Talents to redeem the same entire.

Antigonus's cruelty against Joseph's Carcass.

After

After Antigonus had obtained this Victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that H those who favoured him, took the chiefest of Herod's Favourites, and drowned them in a Lake. Also there arose great Commotions in Idumea, where Machera was repairing the Walls of a certain Castle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the news; for after Samofata was taken, Antoni made Sofus Governour of Syria, leaving order with him to help Herod against Antigonus, and so he departed into Egypt. Sofus sent two Legions with Herod into Judea to help him, and he himself with the rest of the Army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia, near Daphne, his Brother's death was shewed him in a Dream; and being troubled at it, he leaped out of his bed, even at the same instant that the Messengers who brought tidings of his death, entered into the house. He could not forbear loose expressions of grief; but he checked his sorrow, to hasten to revenge it upon his enemies with incredible speed. When he came to Libanus, he took eight hundred Inhabitants of that Mountain to help him, and joyned unto them one of the Roman Legions; and not expecting the day, with them he entered into Galilee; where meeting with some enemies, he forced them to flee to the place from whence they came, and besieged their Castle; but before he could take it, he was constrained by hard weather, to lead his Army into the next Village. Within a few days his number being encreased with another Legion which Antoni sent, he put his enemies in such fear, that in the night time they forsook the Castle. Then he halted to Jericho to be revenged on those that had killed his Brother; where there befel him a most strange accident, from which being against all hope delivered, he perceived himself that God bore a particular love to him: For when many Nobles that night had supped with him, and Supper being ended, every one was gone forth, incontinently the house wherein he supped fell down. Herod took this as a Preamble, both of the dangers, and prosperous success he was to have in his Wars. And the next morning early he removed from thence, and about six thousand of the enemies descending from the Mountains, charged his Vanguard; yet they durst not joyn Battle with the Romans, but molested them with stones and darts, with which they wounded many; so that Herod himself passing along, was wounded in the side with a Dart. Antigonus desirous to friend himself the stronger, as well in multitude of men, as in courage, sent Pappus a friend of his, with some Forces to Samaria, with a design to fight and defeat Machera. Herod, on the other side, went about the enemies Country, and took five Towns, and destroyed two thousand of the Inhabitants; and firing the houses, returned to his Army near a Village called Cana.

Every day there came flocking to him a very great number of Jews, both from Jericho and other parts of the Country; some out of hatred to Antigonus, and others out of love of change, and an esteem of Herod. Whilst thus he halted to fight, Pappus, with his men, neither fearing the multitude nor strength of their enemies, came fiercely upon them, and offered Battle: Which being begun, those that were not engaged against Herod, resisted a while; but Herod remembering his Brother's death, ventured more than the rest, to the end, to be revenged upon them that were the Authors thereof, and so he easily overcame the enemies; and still assailing the fresh men, put them all to flight. There was a mighty slaughter; for many being forced to flee into the Village from whence they came, he pursued them, and slew an infinite number, though all the houses and house-tops were full of armed men to defend it: After he had slain those that were abroad, he overthrew the houses, and so forced them that were within to come forth. Others he killed in Companies with the ruins of the houses wherein they were; and if any one chanced to escape, the Soldiers without killed them: So that the heaps of dead bodies were so great, that they who had the Victory, could not pass thorough the streets for them. Those of the Country were so dismayed with this overthrow, that the whole multitude of them fled away; and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had even then come to Jerusalem, had not a great storm hindered him, which was the only cause that at that time he got not a full Conquest, and Antigonus was not utterly overthrown; who, through fear and desperation, was preparing to leave the City. But Herod, towards night having given his friends leave to depart to refresh themselves, being himself heated with his Armour, after the manner of Soldiers, entered into a Bath, accompanied only with one Page: And as he was there, three of his enemies that had escaped out of the Battle, and came to the Bath to hide themselves; seeing the King there, were so terrified with the King's Presence, although at that time he was naked and weaponless, that they thought of nothing but flight; and being no body was present there to surprize them, they escaped; and Herod was very well contented that he had no harm by them. The next day he beheaded Pappus, who was the General of Antigonus his Army, and sent his head to his Brother Pheroras, to comfort him for their common loss; for Pappus was he that slew Joseph. A The Winter being past, he with his Army came to Jerusalem, and besieged it, pitching his Tents before the Temple, where it was easiest to take the City, and where formerly Pompey had entered it. It was now the third year after Herod had been declared King at Rome. Now, when he had quartered his Army as he thought best for his purpose, and divided the Suburbs, he caused three Rampiers to be raised for Towers to be built upon them; and leaving there his trusty friends that would not slack their business, he went to Samaria to visit Mariamne (the Daughter of Alexander, who was Son to Antiochus) formerly (as we before made mention) espoused to him: And he wedded her even in the time of the Siege, to shew how he contemned his enemies. After his Marriage-rites were performed, he returned to Jerusalem with a far greater Army: Sofus also seconded him with a great Army of Foot and Horse, whom he sent before him through the midst of the Country, and he himself came after by Phenicia. Now when all his whole Army was joyned together, to the number of about eleven Legions of Foot, and six thousand Horse, besides the Syrians that came to help him, which were no small number; he laid his Assault and Battery to the Northernmost Wall. He grounded his Right upon the Decree of the Senate, whereby he was declared to be King: Sofus also was warranted by Antoni's Letters, whereby he commanded him to help Herod with all the Forces under his Command. Mean-while the Jews that were within the City were diversely troubled; for the weaker fort, gathering themselves together about the Temple, deplored their unhappiness, and envied the felicity of those that died before they were reduced to these miseries. But those who were hardiest among them, joyning themselves together, robbed and took away what they could, especially Victuals, from those places that were next the City; so that they neither left meat for Horses nor Men: And the valiantest of them all being left to defend the Walls against those that besieged them, hindered the Adversaries from erecting their Batteries by some new device: Neither did they any ways prevail so much as by their Mines. The King sought to repress the Excursions of the Plunderers, by placing an Ambush of men to intercept them; and relieved the want and scarcity of Victuals, by fetching Provision from places far distant. But notwithstanding they in fight failed not to express incredible valour, yet did the military experience of the Romans surpass them. A wall no sooner began to totter, but they wrought with so great diligence to make another, that this was finished before that was fallen. In a word, they neither spared hands nor Engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out to the last: And although they were besieged by two so potent Armies, yet they defended the Town five months. But at last, certain of Herod's bravest men, by a breach, entered the City, and the Romans the like on another side. Those places nearest the Temple were the first that they seized upon: afterwards, the whole Army entering the City, it was lamentable to see how in every corner the people were massacred; for the Romans being displeased that the Siege continued so long time, became more cruel; and Herod's Army endeavoured to let none of the adverse part escape. So that many were slain, both in the streets, and in their own houses; yea, even then also when they fled into the Temple, without respect of Age or Sex. For although the King commanded the Soldiers to spare the people; yet, for all that, they never restrained their cruel hands; but like mad men, raged against all, men, women and children. Antigonus, not considering his former condition, came and prostrated himself at Sofus's feet, beseeching him to be merciful unto him; but Sofus nothing compassionating his calamity, insulted over him, and called him Antigona; yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in Prison.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, he endeavoured to the utmost to repress the insolence of his Auxiliary Strangers, who thronged to see the Temple, and the Holy Vessels that were therein; but he withheld them, not only by threatnings and entreaties, but also by force; believing himself less unhappy to be conquered, than by obtaining the Victory, to minister a means whereby those things which were not lawful to be revealed, should be exposed to the eyes of profane Strangers. He also restrained the Soldiers from sacking the City; and told Sofus, that if the Romans would desolate the City both of men and money, they would leave him King of a Desert: Adding further, that he esteemed not the Empire of the whole World, to be a recompence for such a Massacre of his Subjects. Hereunto Sofus answering, that the Soldiers ought to have the sacking of the Town, in recompence of that labour they had spent in the Siege: Herod replied, that he had rather recompence them out of his own Treasury; and by this means he redeemed, as it were, the Relicks of his desolate Country; and in the end performed that which he had promised, for he bountifully rewarded every Soldier and Captain, according to his merit; and gave Sofus Prebends.

Herod being now King, he made a distinction between the Citizens; and those who had favoured him he used very honourably, and put those to death who had followed Antigonus: And when money failed, he distributed all his Kingly Ornaments, and sent them to Antonius and his Company. Yet did he not quite redeem himself from all troubles; for Antonius being passionately enamoured on Cleopatra, in all things yielded to her desire: And Cleopatra having raged so against her own Kindred, that she had not left one of them alive, now turned her fury upon strangers; and accusing the Nobility of Syria to Antonius, the persuaded him to put them to death, that the might thereby the easier obtain their Possessions. Afterwards her covetous mind thought to effect the same against the Arabians, and the Jews also; inasmuch that she secretly went about to cause the Kings of those places, Malchus and Herod, to be put to death: Anto- nius made a shew as though he would have granted her request; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and so great Kings: Notwithstanding, he no more accounted them his friends; but took a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their Countreys, and a Vineyard in Jericho where Balm grew; and gave her all the Cities on this side the River Eleutherus (Tyre and Sidon only excepted.) Now, when she had obtained the Dominion of these Cities, she followed Antonius to Euphrates, when he set forward to make War against the Parthians; and afterwards, by Apamia and Damascus, she came into Judea; where Herod having something pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yearly two hundred Talents for that part of his Countrey which Antonius had given her; and seeking by all means possible to get himself an interest in her favour, he conducted her to Pelusium. Not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artabazus the Son of Tigranes Captive, and gave him to Cleopatra, with all the money and Prisoners that he had taken.

C H A P. XIV.

Of the treacherous practices of Cleopatra against Herod. Herod's War against the Arabi-ans, and of a very great Earthquake.

When War was declared between Augustus and Antonius, Herod prepared himself to attend Antonius; seeing for the present all troubles were pacified in Judea, and he had already gotten the Castle of Hircanian, which Antigonus's Sister had in her possession. But Cleopatra craftily prevented him in this his journey, so that he could not go with Antonius: For the desiring the ruins of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) persuaded Antonius to cause Herod to make War against the Arabians; whom if he overcame, then the should be made Queen of Arabia; and if himself were overcome, then the should be Queen of Judea: Intending hereby, that one of these Potentesates should ruine the other. But this practice of hers succeeded greatly to Herod's advantage; for first of all, making head against those of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of Cavalry he could, which was very considerable; and meeting them near Diopolis, he overcame them, though they valiantly resisted. After which overthrow, a mighty Army of the Arabians came to help them; so that an infinite company was gathered together about Celestria, expecting the Jews near the City called Canatha: Where King Herod meeting them, purposed not to fight unadvisedly, but to compels his Camp round about with a Wall; but his Army, puffed up with their former Victory, would not be counselled, but violently assaulted the Arabians, and at the first onset put them to flight. Herod pursuing his enemies, was greatly endangered by the Treason of the Inhabitants of Canatha (who were set on by Athenio, one of Cleopatra's Captains, who had always born him ill will) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned again to Battle; and they two joined their Forces together, and set upon Herod in stony and difficult places, and put his Army to flight, and slew many of them; those that escaped fled into a little Village hard by, called Ormi-
zus; where the Arabians compassing them about, took both the men and their Tents, with all their Furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herod's Soldiers, he came and brought help, but too late, and to little purpose. The cause of this defeat was,
for

A for that the Captains of his Army would not obey his Commandment; for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that injury; yet was he revenged upon the Arabians, and daily made incursions upon their Borders, and ceased not to invade and spoil them, till by many defeats, he had cried quittance with them for their one Victory.

While thus he pursued his enemies, a great calamity befel him in the seventh year of his Reign, and in the midst of the War between Augustus and Antonius; for about the beginning of the Spring, there chanced a great Earthquake, which killed an infinite multitude of beasts, and thirty thousand people; yet the Army had no harm, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged:
B For as report always encreases a mischief, the Arabians, making account that all Judea was destroyed, and that there was no man left alive to resist them, entered into the Countrey, assuring themselves to conquer it; having first slain the Ambassadors of the Jews that were sent to them. Herod seeing his people terrified at the sudden approach of their enemies, and disheartened with the continuance of their calamities, rouzed up their drooping spirits by speaking to them on this wise: I see no such great reason of your present fear; for though there be cause for you to be troubled at the evils which God's indignation makes us suffer, yet none but cowardly minds are daunted by the coming of their enemies, who are but men, whose violence, if your selves please, ye may repel. For mine own part, I am so far from being discouraged by the approach of mine enemies, that I rather think that God bath, by his Providence, sent this Earthquake as a snare to incite the Arabians to invade us, to the end, that by our means he may punish them:
For the cause that moveth them to assault us, is not the trust they repose in their own valour and great Army, but our misery: Yet, who knows not that that hope is deceitful, that is not founded upon our own courage, but upon others misfortunes; there is nothing assured in humane affairs, in respect either of prosperous success, or adverse fortune, which a man may perceive to alter upon all Occurrences, as we our selves can witness by our own experience.
For in the first Conflict ye were Victors, in the second ye were overcome, and now the third time (so far as I can conjecture) they, thinking themselves sure of the Victory, shall by us be overcome. For they who misdoubt nothing, are rash in their proceedings; whereas they D that are fearful and timorous, providently seek to prevent their dangers: so that I am encouraged to hope for Victory, even by your fear. For when you were too confident, and against my will and direction ye encountered your enemies, Athenio found opportunity to surprize you: But now, your prudent caution, and discreet moderation, is an evident token to me of assured Victory. It becometh you therefore, before the Conflict, to keep this mind; but in the Conflict, ye cannot shew too much ardour and courage, to make our impious enemies see, that no calamities, whence soever they come, whether from Heaven or from Earth, can daunt the courage of the Jews, whilst their breath is in their bodies: and that never a one of you will suffer the Arabians to domineer over your Goods and Possessions, whom many times you have almost made your slaves. Be not therefore terrified with this E motion of an inanimate thing; neither yet perfwade your selves, that the Earthquake portendeth any misfortune, for even the Elements themselves by their own nature are subject to such defects; and portend no other mishap, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the Plague, and Famine, and Earthquake have some tokens demonstrating them before they come; but when they are once come, they signify nothing else; but at last, end and cease of themselves. But say we should be overcome; can we suffer more harm than we have suffered by the Earthquake? On the contrary, what fear ought not our enemies to be possessed with for the crime, whereby, contrary to the Law of all Nations, they have butchered our Amba-sadours, and offered to God such a Sacrifice for the good success of their War? Think you they can hide themselves from the sight of God, and from his mighty arm? or that they shall F not be punished for their offence, if, filled with the courageous spirit of our Nation, we stir up our selves to revenge that impious violating the Law of all Nations; and so every one march on to fight, not for his Wife and Children, or Countrey, but to revenge the murder of our Ambassadors; who will lead our Army, and know better than we that are alive, to direct the same. For my own part (if you will be ruled by me) I will be the first that will lead you, and will hazard my self for you: For you know full well, that if your valour be not prejudiced by some headlong rashness, there is no enemy that can bear your charge.

After he had by these perswasions animated his Soldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged thereby, he offered Sacrifice to God. And presently after, with all his Army, he passed over Jordan; and pitching his Tents at Philadelphia, not far from the enemies, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them afar off, desirous to draw them to the Battle. The Arabians had sent some Troops to seize upon it; but Herod's Forces gave the repulse, and in despite of them kept the hill. There passed no day, but he put his Army in Battalia, and braved the Arabians; and seeing they would not come to the hook (for they were in great fear, and Ethiemes their General more than any) he assaulted them in their Trenches, and cast down their Rampiers, so that they were constrained to come forth to Battle without any order; and their Horse and Foot were confusedly mixt together: And although the Jews were in number inferior to them, yet they were inferior to the Jews in courage; nevertheless, they became now more hardy, because they despaired of the Victory; and so long as they stood to it, they had no great loss; but when they turned their backs, then many were slain by the Jews, and many perished, being trodden on by their fellows. Those that escaped, were forced to retire into their Camp, where Herod besieged them; and there was such penury of water, that for drink they were all like to perish. For which cause, they sent Ambassadors to the King, offering him fifty Talents to let them go; but he contemned them, and would not hear them. At length, their want of water was so great, that coming out by companies of their own accord, they offered themselves to the Jews; so that in this sort there came forth four thousand in five days, whom the Jews put in chains; and the sixth day the whole multitude (despairing of their lives) came forth to fight, with whom Herod conflicting slew about seven thousand. So great a Defeat satisfied Herod's revenge, and so abated the pride of the Arabians, that they took him for their Protector.

The Arabians through extreme thirst, are enforced to yield to the Jews.

How Herod was confirmed in the peaceable Possession of the Kingdom of Judaea, by Augustus Cæsar.

Ant. lib. 19. cap. 7.

Herod's Oration to Augustus Cæsar.

Herod speaks freely before Cæsar.

Cæsar's Answer to Herod.

The joy of this prosperous success, was soon abated by the news of the Victory of Augustus over Antoni at Actium; and his love for the latter made him apprehend the worst that could be imagined from the former: Yet was he more afraid than hurt by this his suspicion; for Cæsar counted not Antoni fully conquered, so long as Herod kept to his Party. Wherefore, the King timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæsar resided; and in the habit of a private man, without a Crown, but with a Kingly Majesty, he presented himself before him, and with great confidence spake to him in this manner: I was, O Cæsar, made King of Judaea by Antoni his means; and I cannot deny, but that (had not the Arabians hindered me) I had, with all the Power I could have made, seconded and assisted Antoni against thee: *Yet, although personally I could not go, yet did I what I could to help him, and sent him many thousand Measures of Corn. Nay, though he had the Overthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deserved well at my hands: and although I was not able to assist him with force of Arms, yet I gave him the best counsel I could; inculcating oftentimes unto him, that the only way to redress his affairs was, to put Cleopatra to death; which if he would do, I promised him to assist him with money, strong holds, and an Army, yea, and with mine own person, against thee: But the love of Cleopatra, and God, who had already designed the Empire of the World to thee, stopped his ears. By this means, O Cæsar, I find myself conquered with Antoni, and have forsaken my Crown and Dignity with his Fortunes; and I am come unto thee, without grounding the hope of my safety upon any thing but my own Virtue, and the experience which thou mayest make of my fidelity to my Friends. Herod having spoken in this manner, Cæsar answered: Live in safety, and reign now with greater security than before; for thou deservest to rule others, who with such constancy didst defend and maintain thy friendship. Hence forward endeavour to continue faithful towards them that are more fortunate than Antoni; for, for my part, I have conceived a great hope and expectation of thy Valour and Prowess. I cannot blame Antoni, in that he rather hearkened to Cleopatra than to thee, since, by his imprudence, I have obtained thy friendship. That thou hast begun to do well, it hereby appears, because Ventidius hath signified unto me, that thou hast sent him succours against his enemies. For which cause, by this my present Decree, be thou established in thy Kingdom; and I will shortly give thee such proofs of my Amity, that thou shalt have no cause to bewail the loss of Antoni. After this speech, Augustus put the Crown upon Herod's head; and made a Decree and sealed it, testifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his Kingdom, and rehearsing many things greatly tending to Herod's praise. After that Herod had made great Presents to Cæsar, he requested*

A requested him to pardon Alexander, one of Antoni's friends; who earnestly, and in humble manner desired the same: But Cæsar being much incensed against him, answered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended; and so he repelled Herod with this answer.

When Cæsar travelled into Egypt through Syria, he was entertained by Herod with all Royal Pomp possible: And that was the first time that he shewed himself to take part with Cæsar, when near Ptolemais he took a view of the Soldiers with Cæsar, and made a Banquet for him and all his friends, and feasted the whole Army. And in as much as he travelled to Pelusium thorough a dry Country, when they returned again, he provided water for them, and furnished the Army with all necessaries; so that both Cæsar and the Soldiers thought the Kingdom a small recompence for his deserts. For which cause, after he came into Egypt, and that Antoni and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not only encrease his honour, but also restored to him that portion of his Country which was taken away by Antoni, and given to Cleopatra: And besides that, Gadara, and Hippion, and Samaria, and other Cities about the Sea-coast; to wit, Gaza, and Antedon, and Joppa, and Straton's Tower; and moreover, gave him four hundred Galatians, which before were Cleopatra's Guard. Nor did Cæsar's Liberality stop here, but to shew how far his esteem of this Prince's merit proceeded, he added to his Dominion, Trachonitis, and Batanea, and Auranitis, upon this occasion: Zenodorus (who for money had hired the Lands of Lysania) continually sent people out of Trachonitis, to rob the people of Damascus; who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time Governour of Syria) entreating him to inform Cæsar of their calamity: Cæsar understanding the same, writ back again, commanding him to exterminate those Thieves. Whereupon Varus with an Army, went to those places which were most infested, and rid the Country of the Thieves, and confiscated the Territory from Zenodorus: which Cæsar (lest it should again be a refuge for Thieves to spoil Damascus) gave to Herod, and made him Ruler over all Syria. Ten years after, Cæsar returning to this Country, commanded the Governours to do nothing without Herod's counsel: And after Zenodorus's death, he gave him all the Country between Trachonitis and Galilee. But that which Herod esteemed above all the rest was, that Cæsar loved him best of all next to Agrippa; and that Agrippa loved him most of all men next to Cæsar. When he was arrived to this pitch of Felicity, he shewed the greatness of his Soul, by the greatest and most holy enterprise that can be imagined.

Herod made Governour of Syria.

C H A P. XVI.

Of the Cities and Monuments repaired and builded by Herod, and of his felicity and liberality towards strangers.

E IN the fifteenth year of his Reign he repaired the Temple, and enclosed twice as much ground as was before about the Temple with a strong Wall, whereon he bestowed great costs and charges to beautify it; as the great Porches which he built about the Temple, and the Cattle on the North part thereunto adjoining, which he built even from the foundation. The Cattle was so rich and sumptuous, that it was equal to the King's Palace; and in honour of Antoni, he named it Antonia. He built himself also a Palace in the upper part of the City, and in it two very great Apartments, so rich and admirable, that no Temple was to be compared to them: He termed one of them Cæsarea, and the other Agrippias, in honour of Augustus and Agrippa. But it was not only by Palaces that he would preserve his Name to Posterity, and immortalize his memory; but in the Country of Samaria he built a fair City with a Wall, which was about twenty fadens in circuit, and called it Sebaste; and he sent thither six thousand Inhabitants, giving them a most fertile Soil and sundry Privileges. There also amongst other Buildings, he erected a very fair Temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar. About this Temple there was a piece of ground containing three fadens and an half. For this Testimony of Herod's affection, Cæsar added to his Dominion another Country: In gratitude for which, Herod erected another Temple of White Marble to him, near the head of Jordan, in a place called Panims, where there is a Mountain rising very high into the air; at the side whereof is an obscure Valley, where there are high Rocks, that (by spouts of water falling on them) are made hollow; so that the water, standing in their concavity till they run over, falleth down with a stream of such a depth as is admirable. At the foot of this Valley, on the outside, spring certain Fountains, which many think to be the head of the River Jordan; which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

The year of the world, 3527, before Christ's Nativity, 15. c. 10, 11, 13, 14, 15. Herod's Buildings.

The Fountain head of Jordan.

At Jericho also (between the Castle of Cyprus, and the other ancient Palaces) he erected other Buildings fairer and more commodious than the former, calling them after the names of Augustus and Agrippa. Finally, there was no convenient place in the whole Kingdom, wherein he erected not something in honour of Cæsar: and having in every place of his own Kingdom devised and dedicated Temples unto him, in Syria also where he ruled he did the like; founding in many Cities, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiving, that amongst the Cities of the Sea-coast, there was one called Sidon's Tower; which being very old and ruined, and for the situation thereof deserving reparation and cost, he repaired it with White Stone, and built a very Royal Palace therein; in which work, more than in any other, he shewed how great and high his mind was. For this stands in the midst between Dora and Joppa, in a Coast where there was no Port or Haven; so that they who sail from Phœnicia into Egypt, are in great danger, by reason of the violent Winds that blow from Africa; whose blasts enforce the water with such violence against the Rocks on the shore, that the waves, rebounding back again a good way within the Sea, make the whole Sea tempestuous. But the King, by his liberality and cost, overcoming nature, built Stations for Ships. And although the nature of the place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he so overcame all difficulty, that the Sea could do that Building no harm: And it was so goodly and beautiful to behold, that one would have thought there had been no difficulty in this admirable work. For having measured out a fit place for the Port, he laid a Foundation twenty ells deep of Stone, whereof most of them were fifty foot long, nine foot thick, and ten foot broad, and some bigger; and all the bottom of the Haven, where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a Mole of two hundred foot; whereof one hundred foot served to break the violence of the waves, the other hundred foot served for a Foundation of the Wall, wherewith the Haven was compassed; and on which were built many goodly Towers, the greatest and fairest whereof he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus, the Son of the Empress Livia, Wife of Augustus. Within the Port there were very many Vaults also, to store such Merchandize as was brought into the Haven; and divers other Vaults for Sea men to lodge in. A very pleasant Descent, which might serve for a Walk, encompassed the whole Port: The entrance hereunto was on the North side; for by reason of the situation of the place, the North Wind there is the calmest.

Herod makes a greater Port than that of Piræum.

Anape description of a Haven.

On either side of the entrance were three great Colosses set on Pilastrs; those on the left hand are propped up by a Tower, being a solid Rock of Stone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge Stones joyned together, which make a greater Tower than the other. There is also a house adjoining to the Haven built of white Stone. The Streets of the City leading to this place, are of one bigness and proportion. Upon a Hill opposite to the mouth of the Haven, he built a Temple very beautiful, and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæsar, wherein was placed Cæsar's Statue, full as great as that of Jupiter at Olympus (for it was made after that Model) and another of Rome, like that of Juno at Argos. The City he built for the benefit of the Inhabitants of the Province, and the Port or Haven for Commerce. All this he did in honour of Cæsar; after whose name he called it Cæsarea. And that nothing might be wanting to render it worthy so glorious a name, he added to many great works, the fairest Market-place in the World; besides a Theatre, and an Amphitheatre, not inferior to the rest. He also appointed Games and Spectacles to be celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Augustus: And himself first began them in the 192 Olympiades and he proposed great rewards, not only to the Victors, but also to the second and third after them. Moreover, he repaired Ashtedon, which was destroyed by the Wars, and called it Agrippina, in honour of Agrippa; whose name he caused to be engraven over the Portal he built to the Temple. Neither was he unmindful of his Parents; for in the richest Soil of the whole Kingdom he built a City in memory of his Father, and by his name called it Antipatris, being in a very rich Soil, both for Woods and Rivers. At Jericho also, he built a very goodly and strong Castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his Mother. He likewise built a Tower in memory of his Brother Phasaelus, at Jerusalem, and called it Phasaelus his Tower; of the strength and beauty of which, we shall speak hereafter. He also called another City Phasaelus, which is situated in a Valley beyond Jericho, towards the North.

Cæsarea in times past called the Tower of Sidon. Ant. lib. 15. cap. 10. 11. Ant. lib. 17. cap. 5.

Herodium.

Having thus eternized the memory of his Friends and Kindred, he did not forget to do the like for himself; for he built a Castle on a Mountain near Arabia, having on one side a strong place of defence; and this Castle he called Herodium, after his own name. By the same name also he called a Mount, sixty fades from Jerusalem, artificially made in

A in manner of a woman's Dug, which he adorned on the top with round Turrets; and round about it he built Princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great distance, with great cost and charges; and made a pair of fountains of pure White Marble, to go up, which had two hundred steps. For the whole Hill was made by Art, and was of an exceeding height. At the foot thereof likewise, he built another Palace, and houses to receive his Friends and their Carriages; so that this Castle, for the abundance of all necessary Lodgings, seemed a City; and yet was all the King's Palace. Having erected thus many buildings, he bestowed his great mind in strange Cities likewise; for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Prolemais, he built publick Colledges for instructing Youth. He built the Wall of Babylon and Seats, Porches, Temples and Markets at Berytus and Tyre: At Sidon and Damascus he built a Theatre; and a Water-conduit at Laodicea, a Sea-town. At Afalon he built Fountains or Lakes very sumptuous; and Baths with Pillars, that for greatness and good work, were miraculous. To other places he gave Forrefts and Ports; and to many Cities added Fields, as though they had been Fellow-cities of his Kingdom. And to others, as to Coos, he gave Annual Revenues for ever; to the end, they might never lose the remembrance of the obligation they had to him. Moreover, he gave all poor people Corn; and he often, and in sundry places, lent the Rhodians money to build a Navy of Ships. At his own proper cost he repaired the Temple of Apollo Pythius, which had been burnt. What shall I say of his liberality towards them of Lycia and Samos, or his magnificent Gifts towards all the people of Jonia & Nyssa, and the Athenians, Lacedemonians, Nicopolites, and the Citizens of Pergamus and Mysia, received very many benefits at his hands. He paved also a large Street in Antioch of Syria, which was in length twenty fades, and that with fair Marble. This Street before that time was so full of dirt, that no man could go thorough it: And all along it he built Galleries, that people might go dry thorough it in rainy weather. Some may say, that these benefits thus bestowed, were for the proper use of those people on whom he bestowed them; but no man can deny, but that which he did for the Citizens of Elis, was not only common to those of Achaia, but to all the World, where the Games, called Olympicæ Certamina, were solemnized. For Herod seeing them decay only for want of maintenance, and that this was the only remainder of all the ancient Monuments of Greece; he, not only in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade, in which he went to Rome; but also, gave a yearly stipend to maintain the same, lest, for want, they should be left off. It is not to be told what Debts and Tributes he remitted; for he delivered the Phæglites and Balanotes, and other Towns of Cilicia, from the payment of a yearly Tribute: yet was he not so liberal to them as he would have been, fearing lest the envy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountiful to the Cities than those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind; for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein he had always his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he killed forty Wild Beasts. That Country hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts and Wild Asses. He was such a Warrior, that no man was able to encounter with him; so that many were althogether to see him, with what force and exactness he cast the Dart, and drew the Bow. Besides the Vertue, both of his mind and body, he had also good Fortune; for very seldom the event of War was otherwise than he expected; if it sometimes fell out contrary, it was not through his fault, but through the rashness of his Soldiers, or else through Treason.

Herod a great hunter.

Herod, besides the vertue of mind and body, had the blessings of Fortune.

C H A P. XVII.

Of the disagreement between Herod and his Sons, Alexander and Aristobolus.

BUT his private and domestical sorrows troubled his publick felicity; and most adverse fortune befel him through the means of a woman, whom he loved as himself. For being now made King, he put away his Wife which he first married (a Lady born in Jerusalem, whose name was Doris) and married Marianne, the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Aristobolus; which caused troubles in his house, both before and especially after his return from Rome. For he banished his eldest Son Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the City, only for his Children's sake that he had by Marianne; licensing him only at Festival times to come to the City, in regard of some suspicion of Treason intended against him. And afterwards he slew Hircanus, his Wife's Uncle.

Ant. lib. 15. cap. 5. 8. 10. 11.

Herod expelled Antipater out of the City, and killed Hircanus, his Wife's Uncle.

wifes Uncle, (notwithstanding that he returned out of Parthia unto him) because he suspected that he intended some treason against him. Barzaphanes, after he had taken all Syria had carried him away prisoner with him. But his own Countreymen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiseration redeemed him from thralldom; and had he been counselled by them, and not come to Herod, he had not been killed: but the marriage of his Niece caused his death: for, for that cause, and especially for the love of his native soil, he came thither. That which moved Herod to kill him was, not for that he sought the Kingdom, but because he had right to the Kingdom. Herod had five Children by Mariamme, two Daughters and three Sons. The youngest was sent to Rome to study, where he died. The other two he brought up like Princes, both for their Mothers Nobility, and for that they were born after he was King. But that which above all was most prevalent in their favour, was the love he bare to Mariamme: which from day to day tormented him more violently, in such sort, that he seem'd insensible of those griefs which this his best beloved caused to him. For Mariamme hated him as much as he loved her: and having a just cause and colour of discontent, and moreover being emboldened by the love which he bare her, she every day upbraided him, with that which he had done to Hircanus her Uncle, and to her Brother Aristobolus. For Herod spared him not, although he was a Child; but after he had made him High Priest in the seventeenth year of his age, he presently put him to death, after he had so honoured him: who, when he came to the Altar clothed in sacred attire upon a Festival day, all the people wept for joy; which caused so great a jealousy in Herod, that the same night he sent him to Jericho, to be drowned in a Lake by the Galatians, who had received commission to perform the murder. These things did Mariamme daily cast in Herod's teeth, and upbraided both his Mother and Sister, with very sharp and reproachful words: yet he so loved her, that notwithstanding all this, he held his peace. But the women were set on fire: and that they might the rather move Herod against her, they accused her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a shew of truth: objecting against her, that she had sent her picture into Egypt to Antonius; and that through immoderate lust she did what she could to make her self known unto him, who doted upon womens love, and was of sufficient power to do what wrong he pleased.

Hereat Herod was much moved, especially for that he was jealous of her whom he loved, bethinking himself upon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whose sake King Lycianus, and Malichus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he measured not the danger by the loss of his wife, but by his own death which he feared: For which cause being drawn by his affairs into the Country, he gave secret commandment to Joseph, his Sister Salomes husband (whom he knew to be trusty, and one who for affinity was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if so be Antonius should have killed him. But Joseph not maliciously, but simply to shew how greatly the King loved her, disclosed that secret unto her: and the when Herod was returned, and amongst other talk with many Oaths swore, that he never loved woman but her; Indeed (said she) it may well be known how greatly you love me by the commandment you gave to Joseph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he thought to be secret, was like a mad man, and presently perfwaded himself, that Joseph would never have disclosed that commandment of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked up and down the Palace: whereupon his Sister Salome having fit opportunity, confirmed his suspicion of Joseph. For which cause Herod growing now raging mad with jealousy, commanded both of them to be killed. Which being done, his wrath was seconded by Repentance; and after his anger ceased, the passion of love was presently renewed: yea, so great was the power of his affection, that he would not believe she was dead, but spake unto her as though she were alive, until in process of time being ascertained of her funeral, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes Sons succeeded their Mother in her hatred, and negotiating what an impious act it was, they accounted their Father as a mortal enemy, both before and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they returned again into Judea. For as they grew in years, so did the violence of their revenge increase. And being now marriageable, one of them married the Daughter of their Aunt Salome, who accused their Mother's other married the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was joined a liberty to speak more freely against their Father, and by this occasion of their boldness many were animated to calumniate them: so that some did openly tell the King, that both his

Sons

A Sons fought to work treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an Army to help the other, to revenge the death of their Mother; and that the other (to wit, he that was Son-in-law to Archelaus) purposed to flee and accuse Herod before Cesar. Herod giving ear to those calumniation, sent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two Sons, and fought to advance him above them. But they thought this alteration intolerable; seeing one, whose Mother was but a private woman, so preferred: and they, exalted with their own Nobleness of Birth, could not contain their indignation, but upon every occasion shewed themselves offended; by reason of which imprudence they were every day less accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himself into favour: for he knew how to flatter his Father, and raised many flanders on his two Brethren, partly invented by himself, partly divulged by some of his Favourites, whom he set a-work about the matter, till at last he put his Brethren out of all hope of having the Kingdom. For he was now by the Kings Will and testament declared King, so that he was sent as a King to Cesar, in a Kingly habit and pomp, only he wore no Crown: and in time he so prevailed, that he wrought his Mother into Mariammes stead; and with flatteries and calumniation so moved the King, that he began to deliberate about putting his Sons to death. For which cause, he conducted his Son Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cesar, that he had given him poison. But he with much ado, having obtained leave to plead his own cause, and that before a Judge more wise than Herod or Antipater, he modestly held his peace in all things his Father had offended in: and first of all he cleared his Brother Aristobolus from that crime in which he was involved with himself. And afterwards he inveighed against Antipater's subtlety, and complained of those injuries which had been offered him, having, beside the equity of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himself, for he was a vehement Orator, and knew well how to persuade. Last of all he objected, that his Father having a desire to put both him and his Brother to death, had laid an accusation upon him; whereat the whole Audience wept, and Cesar was so moved, that not regarding the accusations that were laid upon them, he presently made Herod and them friends, upon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient to their Father; and that their Father should leave the Kingdom to whom he pleased.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to have forgiven his Sons; yet he laid not his jealousy and suspicion aside. For Antipater still persisted to make Herod hate his other two Sons, though for fear of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himself an enemy to them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cicilia, and arrived at Elenza, where Archelaus received him very courteously, thanking him for the safety of his Son-in-law, and declaring himself very joyful that they were made friends: for he had writ to his friends at Rome with all speed possible, that they should be favourable to Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod to Zephyria, and made him a present of thirty talents, and so took his leave of him. Herod as soon as he came to Jerusalem, assembled the people together, and in the presence of his three sons, he shewed them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God and thanked Cesar, who had appeased the discord of his family, and made his Sons friends; which he esteemed more than his Kingdom: And I (saith he) will make their friendship firm. For Cesar hath not only given me an absolute power in my State, but leave also to chuse whom I please of my Sons for my Successor. And now I declare my intention to divide my Kingdom amongst my three Sons: which purpose of mine, first I beseech Almighty God, and secondly you to favour: for one of them for his years, the other for their Nobility of Birth, have right to the Kingdom, which is so large that it may suffice them all. Wherefore honour those whom Cesar hath conjoynd, and I their father ordained my Successors: Give them the respects and duty according to their age which they have reason to expect from their Charge not the order established by nature. For a man cannot do a greater pleasure to the younger when he honoureth him above his years, than he shall give discontent to the elder. For which cause, I will constitute to every one of them such friends and well-willers, as with whom they may be most conversant; and of them I will require pledges of concord and unity amongst them. For I know that discords and contentions arise by malice of those who are conversant with Princes; and that if they be well disposed, they will increase friendship. And I require not only those, but also all such as bear rule in my army, that they regard me only for the present: for I give not my Sons the Kingdom, but only the hope and assurance thereof; and they shall have pleasure as though they were Kings themselves, yet I my self will bear the burden of affairs. every

After he had thus spoken he embraced them very lovingly and dismissed the people, some praying that it might be as he had said: others (who desired alteration) K making as though they heard nothing. Yet for all this, the diffention amongst the Brethren was not appeased, but they were more divided in heart than ever. For Alexander and Aristobolus could not endure that Antipater should succeed to part of the Kingdom, and Antipater was grieved that his Brethren should have a share with him; yet he so craftily carried himself, that no man could perceive his hatred towards them. And they derived of a noble race spake all they thought, and many endeavoured to set them on; and others, friends to Antipater, insinuated themselves into their company, to learn intelligence: so that Alexander could not speak a word, but presently it was carried to Antipater, and from him to Herod with an addition;
 so that when Alexander spake any thing simply, meaning no harm, it was presently interpreted in the worst sense possible: and if he chanced at any time to speak freely of any matter, presently it was made a great thing. Antipater suborned men to urge him to speak, that so their false reports might be shadowed with a colour of truth; and that if he could prove any one thing true, all lyes and tales else divulged might thereby be justified. All Antipater's familiars were either naturally secret, or else he topped their mouths with bribes, lest they should disclose his intents: so that one might justly have termed his life a mystry of iniquity. All Alexander's friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering speeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, and made them thieves and proditors of such things as were either done or spoken against him. But of all the means he employed to ruine his Brethren with the King, the most crafty and powerful was, that instead of declaring himself openly their enemy, he caus'd his confidants to accuse them, and at first made shew of defending them, but afterwards he clos'd in with the accusers and cunningly persuaded Herod to credit the accusations, which were, that Alexander was so desirous of his death, as to frame plots against his life: and nothing made so much credit be-given to these calumnations, as that Antipater colourably excused his brother. Herod incensed heret, every day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreased his love towards Antipater. The Nobility also were inclined after the same manner; some of their own inclination, and others out of compliance: so did Ptolemæus the chieftest of all the Nobility, and the Kings Brethren and all his kindred; for all mens expectation was upon Antipater. And that which grieved Alexander the more, was that all these conspiracies design'd for his overthrow were made by the counsel of Antipater's Mother: for the being Step-mother to him and his Brother, was the more cruel against them, because she could not endure their having the advantage above her Son of being born of so great a Queen. And although many followed Antipater, for the hope they had of him, yet were they also compelled thereunto by the King's command, who gave special charge to his dearest friends, not to follow Alexander or his Brother. And this Prince was a terror not only to those of his own Kingdom, but also to foreign Nations, because Cæsar had given him so great authority: for he gave him license to take any one that was a fugitive from him, out of any City, although it were not under his Dominions. Now the young men being ignorant of the offences laid to their charge, were in the greater danger; for their Father did not openly tell them of any matter; but they every day perceived his

A his good will towards them to decay, which so much the more increased their grief.
 In like manner Antipater by little and little animated Pheroras their Uncle, and Salome their Aunt, against them; to whom he spoke with the same liberty as if he had been his Wife.

Moreover, Glaphra, Alexander's Wife, contributed to the encreasing of these enmi-ties, by bearing her self above all women that were in the whole Kingdom; (for she derived her Pedigree by the Father's side from Timon, by the Mother's side from Darios, Son of Hystaspes;) and by inveigling very much against the baseness of Herod's Wives; who, the said, were chosen for their Beauty, and not for their Nobility of Birth. For Herod (as we have said) had many Wives, as it was lawful for him by the custom of the Country; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphra's Pride, and contumelious speeches. Aristobolus also, made Salome his enemy, although he were his Wife's Mother; because he often upbraided his Wife with her base Birth, still telling her that he had married a private woman, and his Brother Alexander a King's Daughter: Which his Wife often with tears told to her Mother; adding moreover, that Alexander and Aristobolus threatened, that if they got the Kingdom, they would make their Father's other Wives weave with their Maids; and his other Sons Notaries of Villages, because they applied themselves to Learning. Salome moved heretofore, could not contain her self, but told all to Herod; who easily believed her, because the spake against her Son-in-law. Moreover, another accusation was laid to their charge, wherewith the King was greatly moved; for he was informed that Alexander and Aristobolus did often bewail their Mother, and lament her hard fate, and cursed him: and that often, when he bestowed some of Mariamne's Cloaths upon his latter Wives, they threatened that in a short time, they would make them change them for Mourning. Whereupon, though Herod feared the fierce spirits of the young men, yet because he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them to him as he was to go to Rome; and as a King, threatened them in few words; and like a Father, gave them many admonitions, and requested them to love their Brethren, promising them forgiveness of their former offences, so that hereafter they mended all. But they believing him not to believe Accusations forged against them upon malice, and answering, that the effect of matters would easily acquit them; requested him, not so easily to believe tales, but to refuse malignant people opportunity and recourse unto him;
 for that there would always be some, that would maliciously invent tales to tell, whilst there was any one that would give them the hearing and believing. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their Uncle; and both of them much to be feared, especially Pheroras; who was fellow with his Brother of all, having the Crown, and had his own Revenues amounting to an hundred Talents a year, and received all the Profits of the whole Country beyond Jordan, which were given him by his Brother. Herod also, had obtained of Cæsar to make him Tetrarch, and had bestowed upon him for his Wife, his own Wife's Sister; after whose decease he offered him his eldest Daughter, and three hundred Talents with her for a Dowry: But Pheroras falling in love with a mean person, refused so honourable a Match; wherewith Herod being angry, married his Daughter to his Brothers Son, who was afterwards slain by the Parthians: Yet, after some time, he pardoned Pheroras's offence. Divers formerly were of opinion that in the life time of the Queen, he would have poisoned Herod; and Herod, although he loved his Brother very well, yet because many who had access unto him, told him so, he began to misdoubt: And therefore, examining by Torture many that were suspected, at last he came to some of Pheroras's Friends; but none of them confessed the Poyson, but only, that he was determined to flee to the Parthians with her whom he was so in love with, and that Costabarus, Salome's Hufband, was privy thereto, unto whom the King had married her, after her first Hufband, for suspicion of Adultery, was put to death. Salome her self was not free from Accusation; for Pheroras accused her, that she had purposed Matrimony with Syllanus, who was Procurator to Obodas, King of Arabia, a great enemy of the King's: And the being convicted both of this, and all things else, wherewith her Brother Pheroras accused her, yet obtained pardon, as likewise Pheroras did; so that the whole Tempest of all the Family was turned against Alexander, and fell upon his head.

The King had three Eunuchs whom he loved extremely, and every one known by Alexander's Offices; for one of them was his Butler. The other was his Cook, and the third waited upon him in his Bed-chamber: These three Alexander with great gifts corrupted. Which the King understanding, by torments forced them to confess and declare with what promises they were thereto by Alexander induced; and how he had deceived them by affirming that there was no truffling to Herod, who was a morose old man;

man; and that he died his hair, to make himself seem young; and that in despite of him, he would be his Successor; and then he would be revenged upon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and especially them: And that the whole Nobility secretly joyed with him, and the Captains of the Army and Governours privily came to him. Hereat Herod was so terrified, that he durst not presently divulge their confessions, but night and day he sent out spies to learn what was said or done; and whom he suspected, them he presently killed; so that his whole Kingdom was full of Bloodshed. For every one, as his malice moved him, feigned Calumniation; and many desirous of Bloodshed, abused the King's passion as they pleased against their enemies: Credit was given to every lie; and no man was so soon accused, but presently he was punished; and he who presently before he had accused others, was now accused himself, and carried to be punished with him whom he had accused. For the King's jealousy shortened the time of Trial for their lives; and he became so tyrannous, that he afforded not a good look, even to them that were not accused, but shewed himself most fierce and violent to his dearest friends: So that he banished many out of his Kingdom, and raised against such as he had no power over. Antipater increased this mischief more and more, by employing all his friends, to accomplish the ruine of Alexander. By whole rumours and tales the King was so possessed, that he fancied always that he saw Alexander before him with a drawn Sword. For which cause he suddenly cast him in Prison, and tortured his friends; many of which died in torments, because they would not confess more than in conscience was true: Others, not able to endure the torments, were forced to confess, that Alexander and his Brother Aristobolus designed Treason against their Father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; resolving with themselves, that having killed him, they would presently flee to Rome. Although these and such like Calumniation were no ways probable, yet extremity of pain forced men to invent them; and the King willingly believed them, as it were comforting himself thereby, that he might not be thought to have imprisoned his Son unjustly. Alexander perceiving that it was impossible for him to remove his Father's suspicion, thought it best to yield himself guilty: and so he made four Writings, wherein he confessed the Treason, and nominated his partakers therein, namely, Pheroras and Salome, who were the chief; which later he said had been so impudently unchaste, as to come in the night to him without his consent, and lie in his bed. These Writings, which charged the greatest amongst the Nobility with most heinous matters, were in Herod's hands when Archelaus, fearing his Son-in-law and Daughter to be in great danger, speedily came into Judaea, and by his prudence appeased the King's wrath: For so soon as he came to Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked Son-in-law of mine, or where may I see the face of that wretch that goeth about to murder his Father, that I may tear him in pieces with mine own hands, and marry my Daughter to a better Husband? For although she be not privy to his counsel, yet 'tis enough to make her infamous, that she is Wife to such a man. Nay, I admire your patience, who are in such danger, and suffer Alexander yet to live: For I came thus hastily out of Cappadocia, thinking he had been put to death, to talk with you concerning my Daughter, whom I married to him for your sake. Wherefore now let us take counsel what to do with them both; and seeing you are too Father-like, and not able to punish your Son, your teacher Son; let us change rooms, and let me be in your place to revenge you. How great forever Herod's choler was, this discourse of Archelaus disarmed it: And Herod shewed him the Books that Alexander had writ: And upon reading every Chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occasion fit for his purpose; and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and those that were accused in the Book. And perceiving the King to give ear unto him: Let us (said he) consider whether the young man hath not been circumvented by the treachery of so many malicious persons, and not of himself, formed a design against you: For there appears no cause why he should fall into such wickedness, who already enjoyed the honours of the Kingdom, and hoped to succeed you therein, had he not been persuaded thereto by other men; who seeing him a young man, enticed him to such an attempt. For we see, that by such persons, not only young men, but also old men, and most Noble Families; yea, and whole Kingdoms are ruined. Alexander answered him, that he knew no ways to obtain his Pardon, who was guilty of so heinous Crimes; and convicted, manifestly to have practised High Treason against the King's own Person; and to be

A “the cause of all these miseries that had now befallen the young man; except that he would lay aside all subtil dealing, and denying of his Fact, and confess the Crimes whereof he was accused, and so humbly go to his Brother, who loved him dearly, and crave pardon; promising that if he would so do, he would do him what good he could. Hereupon, Pheroras obeyed Archelaus's counsel; and putting on a black Attire, in a pitiful manner, and with tears, he prostrated himself at Herod's feet; and craving pardon, obtained it; confessing himself to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was objected against him; and that the cause which moved him to do all these things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into, for the love of that woman. After Pheroras had thus become his own Accuser, and a Witness against himself, Archelaus endeavoured to mitigate Herod's wrath towards him, and excuse his fault; by alleging for example, that his Brother had attempted greater matters against him whom notwithstanding, for Relation's sake, he had pardoned: Adding that in every Kingdom, as in mighty bodies, frequently some part begins to inflame, which notwithstanding, is not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by ease means. Archelaus using many speeches to Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath towards Pheroras, but still counterfeited himself angry with Alexander, affirming that he would take his Daughter away with him; till, at last, he brought Herod of his own accord to intercede for the young man, not to break the Marriage. Archelaus after much entreaty answered, that he was willing that the King should bestow his Daughter upon any, save Alexander, for he greatly esteemed his affinity. Herod replied, that if he would not divorce his Daughter from Alexander, he should think that he had bestowed his Son upon him again: For they had no Children, and his Daughter was dearly loved by the young man; so that if he would permit her to stay still there, for her sake he would pardon all Alexander's offences. Hereto Archelaus with much ado agreed, and so was reconciled to his Son-in-law, and he to his Father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome, to speak with Caesar, for he had written the whole matter to Caesar. Thus Archelaus craftily delivered his Son-in-law from danger; and after this reconciliation was made, they spent the time D in Feasting and Mirth. Upon Archelaus's departure, Herod gave him seventy Talents, and a Throne of pure Gold, adorned with Precious Stones; and Eunuchs, and a Concubine named Pantheis; and rewarded every one of his Friends according to their deserts. And all the King's Kindred, by his appointment, bestowed rich Gifts upon Archelaus; and both he, and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antioch. Not long after, there came one into Judaea far more subtil than Archelaus; who both disannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man, named Eurydes, was a Lacedemonian born; and brought to Herod rich Gifts, as it were for a bait of that he intended. He had so behaved himself in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his excess: And Herod again rewarded him with far greater Gifts than those were that he gave him: But he esteemed his liberality as nothing, except it were accompanied with the blood of the Princes. For which cause he circumvented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him feignedly, and especially by his own craft and subtilty: And quickly perceiving his inclination, he both in word and deed sought to please him; so that the King accounted him among his chiefest friends. And both the King and all the Court honoured him the more for his Country-sake, because he was a Lacedemonian. But he perceiving the distractions of Herod's House, and the hatred between the Brethren, and how the King was affected towards each of them, he first of all lodged at Antipater's house; making a

F past he had been much beloved by King Archelaus, his Father-in-law: And by this means he quickly insinuated into favour with him, and was considered as a friend, and a faithful friend. Alexander presently likewise, brought him into friendship with Aristobolus; and he having gained their affections, accommodated himself to their humours, in order to come; as his design of adhering to Antipater, and betraying Alexander. And he often used incensing words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that being eldest of the Brethren, he so slenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him besides the Crown which was his right. Many times likewise, he used the like words to Alexander; admiring that he who was born of a Queen, and Husband to a Queen, would permit one descended of a private woman, to succeed in the Kingdom; especially, seeing he had such a fair opportunity and means to effect the contrary; for he might assure himself of Archelaus's help in any thing. Alexander supposed he spoke as he thought, because he counterfeited friendship with Archelaus; so that misdoubting nothing, he disclosed to him all his mind concerning Antipater, saying, that it was no wonder though Herod did inherit them of the Kingdom, since he had slain their Mother formerly.

Eurycles, counterfeiting pity for them, and sorrow for their misfortune; enticed Aristobolus to speak to the like effect: And having animated them both to complain in this sort against their Father, he presently went to Antipater, and disclosed to him all their secrets, falsely adding also, a story of some Treachery which those two Brethren intended against him; which was to dispatch him with their Swords. Antipater rewarded 'em with a great Summ of Money for this advice, and commended him to his Father. And thus he, being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Aristobolus, became himself their accuser: Whereupon, he came to Herod, and told him, that in regard of those benefits he had received at his hand, he would now venture his life for him, by giving him notice of a thing which concerned his own; which was, that Alexander and Aristobolus had long since resolved together to kill him, and that he only was the cause that they performed it not, by promising them to assist them in the matter: That Alexander used these speeches, that Herod was not contented to enjoy a Kingdom which was another's right, nor yet to have put Queen Marianne to death, but he would also leave the Kingdom belonging to their Ancestors, to a pernicious Bastard, Antipater. But for this cause, he would revenge Hircanus and Marianne's death: And that it was not fit that such a man as Antipater should receive the Kingdom without blood: And every day, he had occasion given him to persist in this resolution, for he could speak nothing without being calumniated; for if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobility, presently he was upbraided without cause; for his Father would presently say, There is none Noble but Alexander, whose Father's base Birth is a shame and discredit unto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his Father was offended; if he praised him then it was said, he mocked: So that in every thing, he found his Father's affection, turned from him, and that he was only favourable to Antipater; so that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpose: If he killed him, his Father-in-law Archelaus would afford him safety, to whom he might easily flee. And after, he would go to Cesar (who, as yet, knew not Herod's manners) and he would not stand before him then, as he did before, terrified because his Father was present; neither would he only speak of his own wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole Nation, who were oppressed by exactions, even to the death. And then he would lay open on what pleasures, and after what sort, the money gotten with Blood was consumed; and who, and what kind of men they were, that were thereby enriched: and what was the cause of the affliction of the City: and there he would bewail the death of his Uncle, and his Mother, and unfold all Herod's wickedness; which being once made manifest to the World, no man would account him a Murderer of his Father. Eurycles having falsely reported this of Alexander, to Herod, fell presently to praise and extol Antipater; affirming that he only loved his Father, and hindered such practices.

The King, yet not thoroughly appeased for that which was past, grew into exceeding fury; and Antipater again suborned other false Witnesses against him, who affirmed that they were wont to have secret talk with Jucundus and Tyrannus, who sometimes were Officers of the King's Cavalry, and now displaced for some offence they had committed. Whereupon, Herod being very angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed, that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found, and brought to the King a Letter, pretended to be written by Alexander, to the Governour of the Castle of Alexandrium; requesting him, that he would receive him and his Brother Aristobolus into the Castle, when he had killed his Father; and to assist them both with Arms, and other Necessaries. Alexander affirmed that this Letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the King's Secretary; who was both malicious, and could counterfeit any one's hand; and who afterwards having counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Herod caused the Governour of the Castle to be tortured, but he confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proof of any thing, yet he commanded his two Sons to be kept in hold. He likewise termed Eurycles (who was the incendiary of his house, and the breeder of all the mischief) Author of his safety, and one who had well deserved at his hands, and gave him fifty Talents: Who, departing from Judea before matters were well known, went to Archelaus, and feigning that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he received there a piece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that which he had evilly got, in as bad manners as he had got it. Lastly, he was accused to Cesar, that he had caused dissension

A in all Achaia, and spoiled the Cities; for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment that was inflicted upon him for his treachery to Alexander and Aristobolus.

It is not amiss here in this place, to compare Avaratus of Coms, unto this Eurycles: who being a dear friend to Alexander, and arriving about the same time that Eurycles did; being put to his Oath, aware that he heard the young men say nothing; though indeed his Oath nothing prevailed nor profited them, for Herod would only hear and give ear to Accusations, and he highly esteemed them that would believe them with him, and shew themselves moved thereat.

Moreover, Salome increased his rage against his Sons; for Aristobolus minding to engage her to assist him, being his Mother-in-law and his Aunt, sent to her, to look to her self, as though the King was minded to put her to death, because it was reported to him, that she purposed to marry with the King's enemy, Syllaus the Arabian, to whom she privily revealed the King's Secrets: This was the utter ruine of the young men, wherewith they were overthrown, as it were with a violent Tempest. For presently Salome went to the King, and told him of what Aristobolus had admonished her: And he becoming outrageous, caused both his Sons to be bound, and imprisoned in several places. Then he sent Volumnius, General of his Army, and Olympus, one of his familiar Friends, to Cesar, to carry the Informations against his Sons in writing; who falling to Rome, after their arrival, delivered the King's Letters. And Cesar was very sorry for the young men; yet he permitted the Father to do what he would to his Children; and so writ to him, that he should have license to do what he thought good: Yet he signified to him, that he should do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquiry concerning the Treasons; and then, if he found them guilty of those things whereof they were accused, to put them to death.

Hereupon Herod, according to Cesar's direction, went to to Berytus, and there gathered an Assembly to sit in Judgment; the chief in that Judgment were the Governors that Cesar in his Letters appointed. Saturnius and Pedanius presided, and with them Volumnius, Intendant of the Province; next the King's Kindred, and Salome against Alexander and Aristobolus; and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus only excepted; who, because he was Father-in-law to his Son, Herod suspected him to be partial. But he suffered not his Sons to come into Judgment, for he knew that the very sight of them would have moved all men to compassion: And moreover, if they were permitted to speak for themselves, that Alexander would easily have acquitted them both: For which cause they were kept in Platan, a Village of Sidonia. The King beginning his Oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spoke: But he was half afraid to object any Treason against them, because he had no proof thereof; and therefore he aggravated their opprobrious words, injuries and offences, which they had committed against him, which he affirmed to be more unnumberable than death.

E At last (when no man contradicted him) he began to complain of their silence, which seemed to condemn him; and thereupon, requested every one to give their verdict. And first of all, Saturnius condemned his Sons, but not to die; saying, that he had three Sons present, and he could not be so severe, as to judge other men's Sons to death. The two other Delegates also affirmed the same, and some others followed their advice: But Volumnius was the first that pronounced the sorrowful Sentence; after whom all the rest followed; some to flatter Herod, some for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation against the young men. Then all Judea and Syria expected an end of this Tragedy; yet no man thought Herod such a Tyrant, as to put his two Sons to death. Herod caused his Sons to be brought to Tyre, and from thence, by Ship, he conveyed them to Cesarea, bethinking himself what death he should put them to. In the mean time, there was an old Soldier of the King's named Tyro, who had a Son belonging to Alexander, and highly in his favour, and he himself greatly loved the two young men: who being very much grieved in mind at that which had past, went about, crying, that Justice was trodden under foot, Truth oppressed, the Sentiments of Nature extinguished, and the Actions of Men full of iniquity; and whatsoever else, grief could put into the mind of a man, who nothing esteemed his own life. At last, this Tyro came boldly to the King, and said unto him. O King, thou seemest to me most unhappy, who givest credit to wicked and vile persons, against thy dearest Sons; for Pheroras and Salome thou believest before thine own Children, whom, notwithstanding, thou hast often found to have deserved death; and thou perceivest not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want lawful Successors, and leave thee none but Antipater, whom in their hearts they would have King, because they can rule him as they they left. But bethink thy self (O King) how all thy Soldiers will hate him for the death of his two Brethren; for there is no man that doth not pity the two young men, and many of the Nobility are displeased hereat. After he had spoken this, he named them who were displeased: Whereupon, the King commanded them, and him, and his Son to be laid hold on: And presently one of the King's Barbers, named Tryphon, shewing himself to be in I know not what fury, came forth, and said to Herod: Tyro perjur'd me to kill thee with my Razor; promising me, that if I would so do, Alexander would give me a great reward. Herod hearing this, caus'd Tyro, and his Son, and the Barber, to be tortured; the two former denied all, and the Barber affirm'd nothing more than he had already said. Then he commanded Tyro to be more tortured; whereupon, his Son, moved with compassion towards his Father, promised to disclose all the matter to the King, if he would pardon his Father: and being releas'd of his torments, presently declared that his Father, through Alexander's means and procurement, was purposed to have killed him. Many that were present thought it was a device of the young man, to free his Father from torments; but others were persuaded that it was true. Upon this, Herod made a speech unto the people, wherein he inveigh'd against the Officers of his Army, and Tyro, and made the people arm themselves, and kill them with staves and stones. After which, he sent his Sons to Sebaste, which was not far from Cesarea, and there he caus'd them to be strangled; and having quickly dispatch'd the matter, he order'd them to be brought to the Castle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their Mother's Uncle. And this was the end of Alexander and Aristobolus.

Herod commandeth his Sons to be strangled, and to be buried with Alexander, their Mother's Uncle.

C H A P. XVIII.

Of Antipater's Conspiracy against his Father Herod.

Antipater now hop'd without all controversy to succeed in the Kingdom, but he became generally hated of the whole Nation; for it was openly known, that he, by false calumnies, had caus'd his Brethren's death. And on the other side, he stood in no little fear of their Children, whom he perceived to begin to grow to years: For Alexander had by Glaphyra two Sons, Tygranes and Alexander; and Aristobolus had by Bernice, Daughter to Salome, five Children; to wit, three Sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobolus; and two Daughters, Herodias and Mariamne. Herod, after he had put Alexander to death, sent away Glaphyra with her Dowry into Cappadocia; and married Bernice, Aristobolus's Wife, to Antipater's Uncle; for Antipater had devis'd this Match to become friends with Salome, whom before he hated and envied. He also, by his great Gifts, sought to get Pheroras's favour, and the Friendship of such as were Friends to Caesar, sending to that end great sums of money to Rome. He gave Saturninus, and all the rest, great Riches in Syria. But the more he gave, the more he was hated of all men; for every one consider'd his Presents, not as proofs of his Liberality, but as effects of his Fear; so that he got not the love of them, upon whom he bestow'd them; and they to whom he gave nothing, were so much the more his enemies. Yet he continu'd his bounty rather than diminish'd it, when he saw, against his expectation, Herod made much of these Orphans, whose Parents he had slain. Intending to shew how much he repented their deaths, by the pity and compassion he took of their Children. For assembling together his friends, he caus'd the Children to be plac'd by him; and the tears standing in his eyes, he said, Since my ill Fortune hath taken away from me the Fathers of these Children, there is no care so great, which Nature, and my compassion of their present condition, obligeth me not to take of them. Wherefore I will endeavour, that seeing I have been a most unfortunate Father, I may be a most affectionate Grand-father; and leave them who are most dear unto me, to reign after me. In order whereunto Brother Pheroras (said he) I have sent your Daughter to Alexander's eldest Son, to the end, that this Alliance may oblige you to serve in stead of a Father to him: and to your Son, Antipater, (said he) I assure the Daughter of Aristobolus, that so you may be the same to her; and my Son Herod, Grand-son by his Mother to Simon the High Priest, shall marry her Sister. This is my will and pleasure, touching this matter, and let no man who loveth me seek to alter it. And I beseech Almighty God to prosper these Marriages to the good of my Country, and of these my Nephews; and to look upon these Children with a more favourable eye than he did upon their Fathers. Having thus spoken, he wept, and joined the Children's hands, and courteously saluting every one, dismiss'd the Council.

At

Antipater flattered by Gifts and Bribes, to creep into Herod's favours.

Herod grievously bemoaneth his Sons, expressing the same by his commiseration towards their Children. Herod bereth his Nephews.

At this action Antipater was so amazed, that all the Orphans well perceived it. For now he thought himself dishonoured by his Father, and that he stood in great danger, seeing that Alexander's Son was like to have both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to protect him. Moreover, he consider'd how he was hated, and how the people compassionated the children that were fatherless; and look'd upon him as the murderer of their fathers. Wherefore he resolv'd by all means possible to break these Marriages. Yet he feared to insultate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very suspicious and mistrustful; and therefore went openly unto him to make his humble suit and request to him, that he would not leave him without honour, nor deprive him of that Succession, which before he had judg'd him worthy of, by giving him only the bare Title of King, and leaving the authority of the Kingdom to other mens power. For it would be impossible for him to obtain the Kingdom, if Alexander's Son were (besides Archelaus his favour) made Son-in-law to Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly pray'd him, that seeing he had many daughters, he would change these Marriages: for the King had nine Wives, and by seven of them he had children; Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamne daughter of Simon the High Priest, Archelaus by Malthea the Samaritan, and a Daughter call'd Olympias, whom his brother Joseph married; and by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Herod and Philip, and by Pallas, Phajelus; he had two other Daughters also, Roxane and Salome; one of them by Phedra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wives, by whom he had no issue, his Cousin and Niece; and beside these he had two Daughters by Mariamne, Sisters to Alexander and Aristobolus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his Father had such choice of Daughters, requested the marriages to be altered.

The King, well perceiving his mind and purpose towards the Orphans, and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his Sons, whom he had put to death, he judg'd that if ever he found occasion, he would be as industrious to destroy the children by calumnies, as he had done their fathers; and so falling into great anger with sharp words he drove him out of his presence; yet afterward, he so flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And first of all he joyn'd Aristobolus's Daughter with Antipater himself, and his Son to Pheroras's Daughter. Here one may see what

Antipater could do by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although the was his Sister, and procur'd many times the Emperours Wife to speak for her, that she might marry with Syllenus the Arabian, yet was she not permitted to do so. But Herod swore that he would account her as an utter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose; and afterward, against her will, he married her to Alexander, a friend of his; and one of her Daughters to Alexander's son, and the other to Antipater's maternal Uncle.

As for Mariamne's Daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his Sisters Son, the other to Phajelus, his Brother's Son. When Antipater had quite overthrow'n the hope of the Orphans, and joyn'd affinity as he thought good, he now held himself on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intolerable to all men. And seeing he could not avoid their hatred, he now sought by fear to work his own safety; and so much the more, because Pheroras now assist'd him, as one that was confirm'd and established for King. Also the women in the Court fell at variance, and rais'd a new broil: for Pheroras's Wife with her Mother and her Sister, and the mother of Antipater did behave themselves very insolently in many things, towards two of the Kings daughters; of which Antipater, who hated them, was very glad, none of the other women except Salome daring to oppose this Cabal. But Salome went to the King, and told him that their meetings were not for his service.

The women understanding how he had inform'd the King, and that he was offended thereat, they met no more together openly, but abstained from their wonted familiarity; and in the Kings hearing feign'd to fall out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stuck not openly to affront Pheroras: notwithstanding they had meetings and banquets in the night; and the unity was the more confirm'd, the more they perceived themselves to be noted; for Salome knew all this and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and especially against Pheroras's wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and having call'd together all his kindred and friends, he accus'd her before them amongst other things, that she had behaved her self contumeliously towards his daughters, and that she assisted the Pharisees against him, and that by a poisonous drink she had made his Brother hate him. And turning himself unto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather renounce the friendship of him his King and Brother, or abandon his Wife. And he answering, that that he had rather die than lose his Wife; Herod doubtful what to do, turned him to the Antipater, and commanded him to have no commerce with Pheroras, or his wife, or any one belonging to them after that time. He obeyed this command openly in shew, but secretly went to their house: and fearing that Salome might perceive it, he by his friends in Italy procured himself to be sent for to Rome, by Letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that shortly after the receipt thereof, Antipater should be sent to Cesar. Wherefore Herod using no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessary, and a great sum of money; giving him likewise his last Will and Testament to carry with him to Cesar; wherein was written that Antipater should be King, and after him Herod, the Son of Mariamme, Daughter of the High Priest. But Syllenus the Arabian, neglecting Cesar's commandment, at the same time sailed to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controversy between him and Nicholus. He had also a great contention with Aretas his King, whose friends he had slain, and amongst others, Sobe-mus, the most wealthy man in all the Country of Petra; and Fabatus, Cesar's Procurator, whom he had corrupted, assisted him against Herod. But Herod afterwards giving Fabatus a greater sum of money, alienated him from Syllenus, and by this means dispatched that which Cesar commanded: and because Fabatus restored nothing, he accused him that he was Procurator, not for Cesar but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moved; and being as yet in great estimation with Herod, he disclosed Syllenus's his secrets, and signified to the King, how that Syllenus had corrupted Corinthus one of his Guard, whom he advised to be taken and kept in hold. The King more easily hearkened to his counsel, because Corinthus, though always brought up in the Kings Court, yet was born in Arabia. Wherefore he presently took him, and two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllenus's friend, and the other Phylarchus. Upon their examination they confessed, that Corinthus for a great sum of money was hired to kill the King. After this they were sent to Saturninus, Governor of Syria, and by him to Rome.

How Herod should have been poisoned, and how the treason was discovered.

Herod still urged Pheroras to forsake his Wife: for he knew not how else to punish her, having many matters against her: which because he would not yield to, at last he was so moved, that he banish'd them both. Pheroras taking this injury patiently, departed to his Tetrarchy, taking an Oath that his banishment should endure as long as Herod lived; and that whilst he lived, he would never come any more to him: And accordingly he would not come to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay on his death-bed, and would gladly have imparted something to him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, and afterwards Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble mind; for he went to him, and very kindly sought help for him; but he was too far spent, and a few days after died: and although Herod loved him until his dying day, yet was it brutied abroad, that he poisoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought to Jerusalem, and commanded all the Nation to mourn and buried him with a sumptuous funeral. Thus one of the Murderers of Alexander and Aristobolus came to this end: but shortly after, the revenge of that wicked fact fell upon Antipater, who was the chief Author thereof. For certain freed men that belonged to Pheroras came in mournful manner to Herod, and complained to him, that his Brother Pheroras was poisoned, and that his own Wife had given him a drink, which as soon as he had drunk, he presently fell sick; that two days before his sickness, there came a Witch out of Arabia, sent for by his Mother and Sister, to give him a Love-potion; and that three in stead thereof, through Syllenus's inducements, had given him poison; for the was of Syllenus's acquaintance.

The King moved with this discourse caused divers of Pheroras freed men and freed women to be put to torture; and one of them impatient of the pain, exclaimed in this wise: O God, ruler of heaven and earth, revenge us upon Antipater's Mother, who is the cause of these our evils. When the King understood thus much, he became more eager to search out the truth; and the woman disclosed Antipater's Mothers intelligence with Pheroras and the other women, and their secret meetings; and that when Pheroras and Antipater came from the Palace, they used to spend

A spend all the night in feasting, not suffering any servant or domestick to be in the room with them; and one of the Libertines wives reveiled this. And when every one of the women were tortured apart all their examinations agreed; so that now it was evident wherefore Antipater had comploted to go to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the River Jordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod having killed Alexander and Aristobolus, would next come to us and our wives: and that it was unlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her Sons; and therefore it was best to flee as far as possible from such a wild beast. They also depos'd that Antipater was often wont to complain to his Mother, that now he grew gray-haired, his Father became young and lusty; that himself might die perhaps before him, and that though his Father died first, yet he should enjoy the pleasure of the Kingdom but a short time. That moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexander and Aristobolus's Sons, began to spring up again: and that he could not reasonably hope to leave the Kingdom to his Sons, since Herod had declared that he would have it go after him to Herod the Son of Mariamme: wherein he was persuaded that he doated, if so be he thought his Will should be of force; for he would take such an order, that he would have none of all his Progeny alive; and that Herod was the greatest hater of his Sons of any Father in the World: and was not therewithal contented, but he also hated his own Brethren. A proof whereof was, that he not long ago gave him a hundred talents, that he should have no more commerce with Pheroras: and that when Pheroras asked wherein he had hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that he would take away all from us to our shirts, and leave us only our lives; but said he, it is impossible to escape this dangerous Beast, who will not not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Thus we are reduc'd to that pass that we cannot meet but in secret: yet if we bear the hearts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talk and meet openly. The women in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with the rest to Petra. Herod believed all these sayings, and the rather because of that which was said concerning the hundred talents: For he said nothing of the same to any one, but to Antipater.

D Now first of all he turn'd his fury upon Doris, Antipater's Mother: and taking from her all the Jewels which he had bestowed upon her, of the value of many talents, he banish'd her. When his wrath was somewhat appeased, he released Pheroras's women from torments; yet he became so prone to suspicion, that he tortured many that were innocent, lest he should let any escape that were guilty. Amongst others Antipater the Samaritan, who was Steward to his Son Antipater, through torments confessed, that his Son Antipater had procured poison out of Egypt to kill him, by means of a friend of Antipater's; which poison Thendion, Antipater's Uncle took of him, and delivered to Pheroras, whom Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whilst he was at Rome, far from suspicion; and that Pheroras gave his Wife the poison to keep. Whereupon the King calling for her, commanded her to bring forth the poison: and she, making as though she went forth to fetch it, cast her self headlong down from a Gallery, thereby to prevent the torments which, if she were convicted, they would inflict upon her. But by the providence of God (as it should seem) it came to pass that she fell not on her head, but on her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflict punishment upon Antipater. And being brought to the King, as soon as she was come to her self (for she was amazed with the fall) the King demanded of her, wherefore she had done so, and swore unto her, if that she would truly disclose all, he would pardon her; but if she told an untruth, her body should be torn in pieces with torment, and not be buried. She a while held her peace, and at last said, Wherefore should I keep any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to save Antipater, who hath caused all this mischief? Hear O King, and God, who cannot be deceived, be witness of the truth of what I shall say: When I fate weeping by Pheroras as he lay a dying, he called me to him, and said, See, wife, how much I was deceived concerning my Brothers love towards me; for I hated and sought to kill him, who thus loveth me, and sorroweth so much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am justly rewarded for my iniquity. And now (wife) bring me hither the poison which was left by Antipater in your keeping for my Brother, and make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to Hell a guilty Conscience for that crime. So I brought it as he desired me, and the most part of it I cast into the fire, where it was consumed, and kept a little thereof, for fear of mischances, and of you. And having thus said, he brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poison. Hereupon the King tortured the brother and mother of Antipater; and they also confessed that Antipater had brought a box out of Egypt, H and that he received it from his brother, who practised Physick at Alexandria. Thus it seem'd that the Ghosts of Alexander and Aristobulus went about the whole Kingdom, to discover the most hidden things, and to draw testimonies and proofs from the mouths of those that were furthest from all suspicion. For the Brothers of Mariamne, daughter of Simon the High Priest, being put to the rack, confess'd that she was acquainted with this conspiracy. Wherefore the King punish'd the mothers fault upon her child: for having writ in his Will, that Herod her son should succeed Antipater in the Kingdom, now for her fault, he raz'd him out.

CHAP. XX.

How Antipaters malicious practices against Herod, were discover'd and punish'd.

THE arrival of Bathyllus was the last proof of Antipater's Crime, and confirm'd all the rest. This Bathyllus was one of his freed men, and brought from Rome another sort of poison, compos'd of that of Asps and other Serpents; to the end that if the first proved too weak, and took not effect, then Pheroras and his wife might make an end of the King with this. And for the height of Antipater's wickedness, he also had given this man Letters, which he had written to Herod against Arelaelus and Philip his Brethren, who were at that time brought up at Rome to study, being very hopeful young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be some hindrance to him in that which he expected, he devis'd all means possible to make them away. And the better to effect this purpose, he counterfeited Letters in his friends name that were at Rome, and for money got others to write, that these two young men us'd in taunting wife to rail against their Father, and openly to complain of the death of Alexander and Aristobulus: and that they took it ill that they were sent for home (for their Father had sent word that they should come away) at which also Antipater was much troubled. For before his departure from Judea to Rome, he procured such like Letters to be forged against them at Rome; L and so delivering them to his Father, to avoid all suspicion, he seem'd to excuse his Brethren; affirming somethings that were written to be lyes, other things to be offences whereunto young men were prone. At the same time he gave great sums of money to them in whose name he had written the Letters against his Brethren:
hereby as it were hiring them to be secret. For the concealment of which suborna-tion from Herod's knowledge, he bought much rich Householdstuff and Tapitry of curious work, and Plate, and many things more, amounting by his account to the sum of two hundred Talents, which he pretended was to be employed in presents in prosecuting the business against Syllens. But the mischief which he provided against was inconsiderable in comparison of those which he had more reason to fear; M and it cannot be sufficiently admired, that though all those that had been tortured gave evidence against him, how that he practis'd his Fathers dearh, and the Letters witnessed how again he went about to make away other two of his Brethren; yet for all this, none of them who went out of Judea to Rome, bare him so much good will as to give him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was seven months before he return'd to Judea from Rome. Peradventure they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace, by consideration of the blood of Alexander and Aristobulus which cried for vengeance against him.

At last he sent Letters from Rome to his Father, that now he would shortly return home, and that Cesar had treated him very honourably. The King desired greatly N to have the Traytor in his power: and fearing that if he had inkling of matters he would look to himself, feigned great kindness towards him, and sent back again unto him very loving Letters, willing him to hasten his return: which if he did, possibly he might obtain pardon for his Mothers offence: for Antipater had understood that he was banished.

Antipater received a Letter at Tarentum, whereby he understood the death of Ph-roras, and greatly lamented it; which divers that knew nothing thought well of.
Yet as far as one may conjecture, the cause of his grief was, that his reason had not gone so far forward as he wish'd, and that he feared lest that which had pass'd might come to light, and lest the poison should be found. Yet when he came to Cilicia, O and there received his Fathers Letters before mentioned, he then made great haste homeward. When he came to Colenderis, he began to reflect more upon his Mothers disgrace,

A disgrace, his mind as it were prefiging some fliniter fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him, counsel'd him not to go to his Father, till such time as he were certain for what cause his Mother was banished and divorced. For it was to be feared, that he would be accus'd also of the same Crime that was laid to his Mothers charge. But the more imprudent being rather desirous to see their Country, than to contrive what was expedient for Antipater, press'd him to make haste, lest his long delay should breed any suspicion in his Father, and lest thereby he should give occasion to malignant people to raise slanders: For, said they, if any thing had pass'd against you, it was in your absence; and were you in presence no man durst do or speak against you; and it were a very unwise part, for uncertain suspicions, to deprive himself of certain felicity, and not to return speedily to his Father, and receive a Crown from his hands, which he could place upon no other head but his. This counsel (as his ill fortune would have it) Antipater followed, and so arrived in the in the Haven of Cesarea, having pass'd Sebaste; where contrary to his expectation, he was much surpris'd that all men eschew'd his company, and no man came near him. For although he was always hated, yet before they durst not shew their hatred. But now they abstained from coming to him for fear of the King; because the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was known in every City, and to every man, only Antipater himself was ignorant thereof. For there was never any man brought thither with greater pomp than he, when he was to sail to Rome; J and never man more basely entertained at his return. And now apprehending that danger at home, he craftily made himself ignorant thereof; and notwithstanding that he was almost dead for fear, yet in his countenance he counterfeited confidence.
For he could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himself out of the present danger: and yet he heard no certain news of matters at Court, because the King by an Edict had forbidden all men to give him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himself thus; that either all matters concerning him were yet secret; or if any thing was come to light, that he by policy and impudence could acquit himself thereof; for those two were his only weapons. Being thus determin'd, he went to the Kings Palace alone, without any of his friends and followers, who at the very D first gate were most contumeliously repuls'd. By chance Varus the Ruler of Syria was there; and then boldly going into his Father's presence, he advanced boldly near him, to salute him. But Herod putting him back with his hands, and shaking his head, cried out, What thou that hast attempted to murder thy Father, dar'st thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, being guilty of so many treasons! Mayest thou perish, wretch, as thy crimes deserve. Come not near me till thou hast cleared thy self of all that is laid to thy charge; for thou shalt have justice, and Varus shall be thy Judge, who is by good fortune now here. Go and premeditate how to acquit thee against to morrow, which is all the time I will give thee to do it.

Heretofore Antipater was so astonish'd with fear, that he was not able to reply any thing, but silently went away. Presently his Mother and his Wife came to him and told him all the proofs of treasons against him; then he considered with himself how to answer every point. The next day the King called an assembly of his friends and kindred, and to them admitted Antipater's friends: and he and Varus sitting in judgment, commanded all proofs to be brought, and the witnesses to appear: amongst whom were certain of Antipater's Mothers servants lately apprehended, who had Letters from her to carry to him, to this effect: Forasmuch as all things are known to thy Father, beware that thou return not unto him, before thou hast obtained some warrant of thy safety from Cesar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in after them, and prostrating himself before his Fathers feet, he said, I beseech you, sir, bear no prejudicate opinion against me; and lend me an open ear, whilst I purge my self for if you please to give me leave, I will prove my self guiltless. Herod commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus unto Varus: I know well, Varus, that you, or any other just and indifferent Judge, will find Antipater to have deserved death: But I fear lest you conceive an aversion against me, and think me worthy so great afflictions for having been so unfortunate as to have brought such children into the world. And yet this should move you to pity me, who have been so merciful to me, and careful for such wicked causes. For I had already appointed those young men that are dead to be Kings, and brought them up at Rome, and gotten them Cesar's favour: but they whom I had so much honoured, and exalted to the Crown, became traitors against my life. Their death G was very advantageous to Antipater, whose security I sought thereby, because he was a young man and the next that should succeed me: but this cruel beast hath discharged his rage upon my self, and thinks my life too long, and is grieved that I live to be old, and this to be heir of my Kingdom. I confess my error, that I incited them against me, by having for Antipater's sake deprived them of their right. For wherein had I so well deserved of them, as of Antipater? unto whom, during my life-time, I committed the sway and rule of my Kingdom, and openly in my Will and Testament declared him my successor:

 besides other gratifications, I bestowed upon him the yearly revenue of fifty Talents. And lately when he was to sail to Rome, I gave him three hundred Talents, and commended him to Cæsar, as the only Son of all my house, who had regard to his Father's life. And what was the offence of the others compared with Antipater's? what proofs were produced against them, equal to those that have shewed me more clearly than the day the conspiracy framed against me by this most wicked and ingrateful of all men? and is it now to be endured that he is so impudent as to dare to open his mouth, in hope to colour all again with craft and deceit. Beware, Varus, that he deceive you not: for I know this best, and I even now see by his feigned tears, how probable a tale he will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whilst Alexander lived, I should beware of him, and not put every one in trust with my person: This is he who was wont to go before me into my bed-chamber, and look about in every corner, lest any should have lien in wait to have attempted any treason against me: This is he who watched by me in my sleep, and in whom I thought my self secure; who comforted me when I mourned for them that were put to death. This is he who gave me good or ill characters of his Brethren when they were alive. This was my defender and champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and subtilties, and all his counterfeits, I wonder that I am yet alive, and how I escaped the hand of such a traitor.
 And seeing that fortune stirs up those of mine own house against me, and that those that I most esteem are my greatest enemies, I will bewail my hard fortune alone; and not one that hath thirsted after my blood shall escape, although proof be brought against every one of my children. Thus, his heart being furcharged with sorrow, he was forced to break off his speech: and presently he commanded Nicolas, one of his friends, to report all the proofs and evidences.

All this while Antipater lay prostrate at his Fathers feet; but now lifting up his head, he addresses to him and said: You Sir your self made my Apology: For how can be pass for a Parricide, who, as your self confess, always watch to preserve you from all dangers? Which if you say I did feignedly, is it probable that I would be so circumspect in our affairs and at other times, and now in so weighty a matter play the part of a sensible man? How could I think that such a design, though kept secret from men, could be hidden from God, who seeth all things? Was I ignorant what befel my Brethren, whom God so justly'd for their wicked conspiracy against you? Or what should cause me to aim at their life? The hope of the Kingdom? I possess'd it already: Or a suspicion of your hatred towards me? I knew you loved me passionately: Or any fear which I had of you? On the contrary, I rendered you formidable to others by the care I took of your preservation.
 Was it want of money? Nothing left; for who might spend more than I? Truly if I had been the wickedest person in the World, or the cruellest beast upon earth, yet I should have relented, being overcome by the benefits of so loving a Father's being, as your self said, you recall'd and prefer'd me before so many Sons, and being yet alive you proclaim'd me King, and made me a spectacle to all men to envie, through the benefits you bestowed upon me. O wretch that I am! O unhappy time of my absence out of my Country! what an opportunity hath it given to malicious and calumniating people! Tet, O Father, it was for your sake, and about your affairs that I went to Rome, to the end that Syllaus might not triumph over your old age. Rome can witness my piety, and Cæsar the Prince of the whole world, who often called me a lover of my Father, Receive here, O Father, his Letters, far more credible than those feigned calumniations against me: let these plead my cause, let these testify my affection towards you: remember how unwilling I was to go to Rome, knowing I had here in this Country many secret enemies. Thus you unwarily have been the cause of my ruine, by forcing me to that voyage which has afforded every time to frame accusations against me: but now I will come to the proof of these matters. Behold here I am, who, notwithstanding a Parricide, yet never suffered any misfortune by sea or land: is not this a sufficient argument of my innocency? But I will not insist upon this proof of my innocence, since I know that God hath permitted you to condemn me already in your heart. Only I conjure you, give not credit to depositions extorted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments upon me, spare not my body: For if I am a Parricide I ought not to die without all sort of torment. Antipater accompanied these words with so many tears, that he moved all that were present, and Varus also, to compassion; but Herod only abstained

A stained from weeping, for his anger against his unnatural Son fix'd his mind upon the proof of his Crime. And presently Nicolas at the King's commandment made a long speech concerning Antipater's malice and artifices, which he laid so open, that he extinguish'd all pity in the minds of the hearers. He ascrib'd all the mi-chief which had befallen that Kingdom unto him, and especially the death of his two Brethren, who through his calumniations were made away; affirming also that he used treacherous practices against those yet alive, fearing lest they should succeed in the Kingdom: for he who had prepared poyson for his Father would much less spare his Brethren. And then coming to the proof of his intent to poyson his Father, he declared in order all the evidences thereof, aggravating his offence by corrupting of Phororas, who by Antipater was drawn in to purpose the murder of his Brother and King, and how he had also corrupted the King's dearest friends:
 and so filled the whole Court with wickedness. When he had accused him of many other things, and brought proof thereof he ended his speech.

Then Varus commanded Antipater to make answer to these things, and seeing that he continued lying on the ground, and said nothing more, but God was witness of his innocency; he called for the poyson, and gave it one who was condemned to die, who having drunk thereof, presently died. Then Varus talked apart with Herod; and what was done there in that Council he writ unto Cæsar, and the next day he departed. And when Herod had put Antipater in prison, he sent messengers unto Cæsar, to inform him of his hard fortune and calamity. After this it was discovered that Antipater design'd the death of Salome. For one of Antipater's servants came from Rome, and brought Letters from Acme, who was one of Julia's maids, which she writ to the King, telling him that she found a Letter of Salomes among Julia's; which for good will she had sent him. These Letters which the affirmed to be Salomes, contained many invectives against Herod, and many accusations. But these Letters were feigned by Antipater, who for money had perwaded Acme to write them in her own name; as the Letter that she writ to Antipater evidently shewed; for the writ as followeth.

 I have performed all your requests, to be mindful of your promise. This Letter against Salome and others, being found to be counterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterfeited Letters; and he remember'd that he had almost put his Sister to death, through Antipater's device. Wherefore he resolv'd no longer to delay to punish him for all; yet was he hinder'd by a great sickness from accomplishing his purpose. He only sent Letters to Cæsar concerning Acme's treachery and false accusation of Salome; and changed his Testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his room writ Antipater, leaving out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder Brethren, because Antipater had render'd them odious to him.
 He bequeathed to Augustus a thousand Talents, besides many other rich gifts: and to his Wife the Empress, and Children, and Kindred, and Freed men, about five hundred; he also gave great gifts to others, either in land or money, and left to his Sister Salome great riches.

Of the Golden Eagle, and of Antipater's and Herod's death.

Herod's disease increased, partly through age, and especially by his grief and sorrow; for he was now threescore and ten years old; and his mind was so troubled for the death of his Children, that though he were in health, yet he took no pleasure in any thing; and his sickness was so much the more grievous to him, because that Antipater was yet alive; but he purposed to put him to death as soon as he was recovered of his sickness. To increase his calamity there arose a tumult among the people. There were in the City two Doctors reputed very skillful in our Country-laws: One of them was named Judas, the Son of Saripheus; the other was called Matthias, the Son of Margalote. These two were followed by a great number of young men; so that when they expounded the Law, they had an assembly like a great Army. And hearing that the King, partly by grief, and partly by his disease, was very like to die, they told their acquaintance, that now it was a fit time to revenge the injury which God received by those profane works, which were made against against his exprels Commandment ; which forbids to place the Images, or likenesses of any living thing in the Temple. This they said, because the King had set a Golden Eagle upon the chief Porch of the Temple, which they exhorted the young men to take away ; saying, that it was meritorious, although danger might ensue thereon ; yea, even to die for their Countrey-laws. For they that died for such a cause, should enjoy everlasting life and glory : And that many unwise men, ignorant of that Doctrine, so loved their lives, that they chose rather to die by sickness, than to spend their lives in so glorious an enterprize. While they spoke thus, there was a rumour spread, that the King was now at the last gasp ; whereby the young men being encouraged, about Noon, when many were walking in the Temple, they let themselves down from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and so with hatchets cut down the Eagle. I.

Whereof the Captain of the Soldiers being advertised, he went with a great many Soldiers speedily to the Temple, and took almost forty of the young men, and carried them to the King : Who asked them if that were true, that they were so bold as to cut down the Golden Eagle : They confessed they had done it. Then he demanded by whose Commandment ? They answered, by the Commandment of the Law. After this, it was asked them, why they, who were presently to die, were so joyful ? They answered, Because after death, they hoped to enjoy Eternal Bliss. The King heretofore was so greatly moved with anger, that for all his disease, he went forth and made a Speech to the people wherein he inveighed against these persons, as Sacrilegious ; who, under pretence and colour of their Countrey-laws and Religion, attempted some great matter ; and he adjudged them as impious people, worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learn who had favoured the act, requested him that only the Authors and Actors of that Crime, might receive punishment ; and that he would remit the offence to all the people besides. The King, with much ado entreated, caused the young men that let themselves down with Cords, and the two Doctors, to be burned ; and the rest which were taken in the act, to be beheaded. After this, the King's sickness spread over his whole body, and he was afflicted with most grievous pains : For he had a great Fever, and an Itch over all his body, which was insupportable, and a daily Collick ; and his feet were swelled, as though he had the Dropsie : His belly also, was swelled, and his privy members putrified, so that the worms lived in the putrified places. He was also grievously tormented with difficulty of breath, and a Convulsion of the whole body ; so that some said, that this was a punishment laid upon him, for the death of the two Doctors. Herod, notwithstanding he was afflicted with so many and grievous sicknesses, yet he was desirous to live, and sought remedy, in hope of health. At last, he passed over Jordan, where he used the warm Waters of Calliroe, which run into the Lake of Asphaltites ; and are so sweet, that men use to drink of them. There the Physicians caused his body to be bathed in hot Oyl, and he was therewith so weakened, that his sense failed, and he was as though he were dead ; whereat those that were about him being troubled, with their cries they caused him to look up ; and now despairing of life, he caused fifty Drachmes to be distributed to every Soldier, and great Sums of money to the Captains and his friends. M.

As he returned, When he came to Jericho, he was in a very great likelihood to die ; and his melancholly put into his head a wicked resolution : For he caused the chief men of every Town and Village in all Judaea to be assembled together, and then he shut them up in a place called the Hippodrome : And calling unto him his Sister Salome, and Alexas her Husband ; I know (said he) that the Jews will make Feasts for joy of my death ; yet if you will do what I desire, it shall be mourned for, and I shall have a remarkable Funeral. As soon as I have given up the Ghost, cause my Soldiers to encompass these men whom I have here in hold, and kill them all : By this means all Judaea, and every House hold thereof shall have cause to lament. After he had commanded this to be done, those whom he had sent to Rome, brought him Letters, wherein was shewed how Acme, Julia's Servant, was by Cesar's Command put to death, and Antipater adjudged worthy to die : yet Cesar writ, that if his Father had rather banish him, he permitted it. Herod with this news was something pleased, yet presently his pains and a vehement Cough seized him with that violence, so that he thought to hasten his own death ; and taking an Apple in his hand, he called for a Knife (for he was accustomed to cut the meat which he did eat) and then looking about him, left any standing by should hinder him, he lift up his arm to strike himself. But Archelus his Nephew run hastily to him, and stayed his hand ; and presently there was made great lamentation throughout all the King's Palace, as though the King had been dead. Antipater having speedy news hereof, took courage, and promised the Keepers a piece of money to let

A let him go. But the chiefest of them did not only deny to do it, but also went presently to the King, and told him what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted up his voice with more strength than was meet for a sick man, and commanded his Guard to go and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Castle called Hircanian. And now again he altered his Testament, and appointed Archelus his eldest Son King, and Antipater his younger Brother Tetrarch. Five days after the death of his Son Antipater, Herod died ; having reigned thirty and four years after he slew Antigonus, and thirty seven years after the Romans had declared him King. In many things he was as fortunate as any man ; for being born but a private person, he got the Crown, and kept it, and left it to his Posterity : But in his Domestick Affairs, he was most unfortunate. B Salome, before it was known to the Soldiers that the King was dead, went forth with her Husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the King had commanded to be slain ; saying, that the King's mind was altered, and therefore he gave them all Licence to depart : And after their departure, the King's death was published to the King's Soldiers, who, together with the other multitude, were assembled in the Amphitheatre at Jericho, by Ptolomey, Keeper of the King's Seal ; who made a Speech to them, and told them that Herod was now happy ; and he comforted the multitude, and read unto them a Letter which the King left, wherein he earnestly requested the Soldiers to favour and love his Successor. After the Epistle read, he recited the King's Testament, wherein Philip was appointed Heir of Trachonitis, and the places thereunto adjoining ; Antipater Tetrarch, and Archelus King. He commanded his Ring to be carried to Cesar, to whom he referred the cognizance and disposal of all with full Authority ; requiring, that as to any thing else, his said Testament should be performed.

This was no sooner read, but presently the Skies were filled with the voices and cries of the people, who congratulated Archelus ; and the Soldiers and the People promised to serve him faithfully, and wished him a happy Reign. This done, the next care was about the King's Funeral, on which Archelus spared no cost, but buried the King with all Royal Pomp possible. The Herse whereon he was carried, was adorned with Gold and Precious Stones ; upon it lay a Bed wrought with Purple, whereupon was laid the dead Corps of the King, covered also with Purple, a Crown and Diadem of pure Gold on his head, and a Scepter in his Right hand. About the Herse were his Sons and Kinsfolk ; and the Guard, and Bands of Thracians, Germans and Gauls, all went before in order, as though they had gone to Wars. The rest of the Soldiers, in Warlike order, followed their Captains and Leaders ; and five hundred of his Servants and Freed-men carried Perfumes. And thus the Corps was carried the space of two hundred furlongs from Jericho, to the Castle of Herodion ; where, as himself had appointed, it was interred.

CHAP. I.

Of Herod's Successor Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple; and the Mutiny that arose for the revenge of those that were executed, for taking down the Golden Eagle.

Archelaus being acknowledged Successor in the Kingdom to Herod, lately dead, necessity constrained him to go to Rome, to the end he might be confirmed by Augustus; which Journey gave occasion of new broils. For after that for seven days he had celebrated his Father's Funeral, and largely feasted the people (for this is a custom amongst the Jews, which bringeth many of them to poverty; and yet he that doth not so, is reputed impious) he went to the Temple, attired in a white Garment, where he was, with great joy, received of the people, and he himself sitting in a Tribunal, upon a Throne of Gold, very courteously admitted the people to his Presence, and thanked them for their diligent care used in his Father's Funeral, and for the Honours they had rendered to himself, as to their King. Yet he said, he would not take upon him either the Authority or Name of King, till such time as his Succession was approved of by Cæsar, who by his Father's Testament, was Lord and Master of all; and for that cause, he had refused the Diadem offered him by the Soldiers at Jericho, when they would have Crowned him. But he promised, that if he were confirmed King by the hands of the Emperour, he would largely recompence both the Soldiers and the people for their good will; and that he fully purposed to be more favourable unto them, than his Father had been. The multitude hereat greatly rejoiced, and made present tryal of his mind and purpose; for some cried out, requesting that the Tributes might be lessened; Others desired that the new Imposts might cease; others requested him to set all Prisoners at liberty. Archelaus, in favour of the people, granted all these requests; and then offering Sacrifices, he banquetted with his Friends. But suddenly, a little after Noon, a great multitude desirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the King's death being ceased) began a private mourning, bewailing their misfortune, whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the Golden Eagle from the Porch of the Temple. This sorrow was not secret; but the whole City resounded with lamentations for them, that were thought to have lost their lives for the Temple, and their Country Laws. They also cried, that revenge was to be taken upon them, whom Herod for that fact, had rewarded with money. And that first of all, he who by Herod was constituted High Priest, was to be rejected, and another more honest and devout was to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was herewith offended, yet, because he was presently to take such a Journey, he obtained from violence, fearing lest he should render the multitude his enemies. Wherefore he sought rather by admonition, than by force, to reclaim those that were seditious; and he sent the Governour of the Soldiers to request them to be pacified. But the Authors of the Sedition, so soon as he came to the Temple, and before he spake one word, threw stones at him; and in like manner they used others, sent afterwards by him, to appease them; for Archelaus dispatched many messengers unto them, whom they contumeliously treated; so that if they had been more in number, their fury would have proceeded further. Wherefore, when the Feast of Unleavened Bread drew nigh, which the Jews call Passover, wherein an infinite number of Sacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all Villages thereabout, for devotion sake, to the Temple: Solemnity: And they who so lamented the death of the Doctors, remained in the Temple, seeking by all means to promote the Sedition. Which Archelaus fearing, sent a Band of Soldiers, and a Tribune with them, to take the chief of the Seditious, before such time as they had drawn unto them the multitude of the people; against whom the whole people being stirred up, flew a great many of them with stones; and the Tribune himself being sore hurt, had much ado to escape. And when they had so done, they presently went and offered Sacrifice, as though no hurt had been done. But

Archelaus

The year of the World, 3964, after Christ's Nativity. Archelaus persuaded himself, that the multitude would not be appeased without laughter: wherefore he sent against them the whole Army, the Foot into the City, and the Horse into the Field; who assaulting the seditious people as they were sacrificing, slew of them almost three thousand, and scattered the residue into the Mountains adjoining. There were also some who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by virtue of his Command, that every one should depart home to his house; as accordingly, notwithstanding the holiness of the day, they did. But he, accompanied with his Mother, Poppa, Ptolomey and Nicolaus his Friends, went to the Sea-coast, leaving Philip Governour of the Kingdom, and of his Household: With them departed Salome and her Children, and the Kings Brethren and Kindred, under pretence to assist Archelaus to the Crown; but indeed, it was to inform Caesar of the Murder committed in the Temple against the Law.

Sabinus coming into Judea to seize the Fortresses, and keep the Treasure. When they came to Caesarea, they met with Sabinus Governour of Syria, who was coming towards Judea, to take into his custody Herod's Treasure. Varus, to whom Archelaus had sent Ptolomey about this matter, forbade him to proceed further. And so Sabinus, in obedience to Varus, neither entered the Castles, nor took Herod's Treasure from Archelaus; but promised, that he would let all alone, till Caesar's pleasure were understood. But so soon as one of them that hindered him was gone to Antioch, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome; he still remaining at Caesarea, now hastened to Jerusalem, and took the King's Palace: Where, calling for the chief of the Guard, and the Purveyors, he exacted of them an account, and sought to take into his custody the Castles and Strong Holds. But the Captains of the Garrisons, mindful of the charge which Archelaus had given them, refused him entrance; saying that they kept them more for Caesar than Archelaus. At this time also, Antipas, one of Herod's Sons, went to Rome with a design to obtain the Crown; alleging that Herod's first Testament was of more force than the last, and that he in the first was declared King and both Salome, and divers others of his Kindred, who sailed with Archelaus, promised him their aid. He took with him his Mother and Ptolomey, Brother to Nicolaus, in whom he had great confidence, because he had been always faithful to Herod, and was held by him in great credit. But none had so much encouraged him, as Irenaeus the Orator, who had an excellent faculty of speaking. Trusting to these, he refused the counsel of them who sought to persuade him to yield to Archelaus, both as the elder, and appointed by the last Testament of his Father. Now, when they were all arrived at Rome, those of the Kindred that hated Archelaus; and especially those that looked upon it as a sort of Liberty to be governed by the Romans, favoured Antipas; in hope, that if their design of being freed from the Rule of Kings did not succeed, they should, at least, have the comfort to be commanded by him, and not by Archelaus.

Antipas collected King by his former Testament, driven with Archelaus for the Kingdom. And to further him the more, he obtained Sabinus's Letters to Caesar; wherein Archelaus was accused, and Antipas commended. Salome, and the rest of the Complices, presented Accusations against Archelaus, to Caesar; who, after them, delivered also his Justification in writing; and withal, his Father's Ring, and an Inventory of his Treasure, by Ptolomey. Caesar pondering with himself what both Parties alleged, and the greatness, and large Revenues of the Kingdom, and the number of Herod's Children; and having also read the Letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chief of the Romans to Council; where Caius, the Son of Agrippa, and his Daughter Julia, whom he had adopted by his assignment, sat in the first place, and so he licenced the Parties to plead their Rights. Antipater, Salome's Son, being the greatest of all Archelaus's Adversaries, spake first, and said, that Archelaus now only for form disposed for the Kingdom, of which he had already possessed himself without waiting to know Caesar's Pleasure; and that he did now strive in vain, to render Caesar favourable to him, whom he would not attend to judge of his Lawful Succession. That after Herod's death, he furnished some to offer him the Diadem: And that sitting on a Throne of Gold in Kingly manner, he had changed all Orders of the Soldiers, disposed of Offices, and granted unto the people their Requests; which could not be effected but by a King. That he had also set at liberty many men, who for great Crimes were imprisoned by his Father. And having done all this, he came now to Caesar, to crave the shadow of the Kingdom, the substance and body whereof he already possessed; so that herein he left nothing to Caesar to dispose of, but the bare Title. Moreover, he alleged that Archelaus did but counterfeit sorrow for his Father's death, feigning himself to mourn in the day time, and in the night he would be drunk and riotous. By which carriage, he said, that he had caused the Sedition of the people, and incurred their hatred. After these Accusations, he insisted upon the horrid laughter of the multitude about the Temple: for he said, that they only came against the Festival Day, to offer

That Herod, after Christ's as his Understanding failed him; when being more sick in mind than body, he knew not whom he named his Successor in his last Will; whereas, he had nothing whereof he could blame him, whom in his former Will, he had appointed his Successor, when he was in health, both of mind and body. Yet (said he) put the case, Herod in his extremity, knew what he did, yet Archelaus hath rendered himself unworthy of the Kingdom, by having committed many things against the Laws. For (said he) what will be after he hath received Authority from Caesar, who before he received any, hath murdered so many? Antipater having spoken more to this effect, and at every Accusation taking Witness of his Kindred that stood by, ended his Speech.

Nicolaus defended Archelaus. Then Nicolaus stood up, and first of all shewed, that the slaughter of them in the Temple was necessary and unavoidable; for they, for whose death Archelaus was now accused, were not only enemies of the Kingdom, but also of Caesar: And for other Crimes objected, he shewed how that they were done, even by the counsel and perswasion of the Accusers. He also urged, that the second Testament might be of force, for that therein Herod had referred it to Caesar, to confirm his Successor. And he who had such remembrance, as to leave the Arbitriment of his Will to him who is Lord of all; could not be thought to mistake himself in appointing his Heir, nor yet deprived of his Senses, seeing he knew by whom he should be established. When Nicolaus had ended his Speech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus coming into the midst of the Council, prostrated himself at Caesar's feet. Augustus courteously raised him from the ground, and declared him worthy to succeed his Father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive Sentence; but the same day, the Council being dismissed, that he might deliberate with himself at more leisure, whether any one single person of those nominated in the two Wills, should succeed their Father in the Kingdom, or that the Kingdom should be divided amongst the whole Family; because they were many in number, and had all need of Estate to support themselves with honour.

C H A P. II.

Of the Fight and Massacre at Jerusalem, between the Jews and the Sabinians.

Ant. lib. 17. esp. 14. Before Caesar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malibae, the Mother of Archelaus, fell sick and died; and many Letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Jews had rebelled. Which Varus foreseeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, had gone to Jerusalem to repress the Authors of that Sedition: And because the multitude would not be quiet, he left one Legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the City, and so returned to Antioch. But Sabinus coming afterwards to Jerusalem, was the cause that the Jews began a new Broil: For he forced the Garrisons to render to him the Castles, and rigorously made search for the King's Treasure: And he was not only assisted by those that Varus left there, but also he had a great multitude of his own Servants all armed, to further his Avarice. And in the Feast of Pentecost (so called, because it happens at the end of seven times seven days) the People gathered themselves together, not for Religion's sake, but for anger and hatred; so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee, and Idumaea, and Jericho, and the Countreys beyond Jordan. Yet the Jews which were Inhabitants of the City, surpassed the rest both in number and courage; and they therefore parted themselves into three Bands, and made three Camps; one on the North side of the Temple, another on the South towards the Hippodrome, the third on the West, near the Palace; and so they besieged the Romans on every side, Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, sent many Letters to Varus, earnestly requesting him with all speed to bring succour; for if he did not, the whole Legion would be destroyed. He himself got into the highest Tower of the Castle of Phasaelus, so called from the name of Herod's Brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence he gave a sign to the Roman Soldiers to issue out suddenly upon their enemies; for himself was in such a fear, that he durst not come down to the Soldiers of whom he was Commander. The Soldiers obeying his Command, attacked the Temple, and there fought a fierce Battel with the Jews; who having none to assist them, and being unexperienced in Warlike Affairs, were soon conquered by them that were skilful. At last, many Jews got upon the Porches, and cast Darts at them from the Pinacles, so that they killed many: But the other could not revenge themselves of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustain the force of them who joyned Battel with them; till at last the Romans fired the Porches, which for greatness, and curious work, were admirable. By this means many Jews were either destroyed with the suddain fire, or else, leaping down amidst their enemies, were by them slain; others going backward, were cast headlong from the Wall; others despairing of life, killed themselves with their own Swords; and they who privily came down the Walls, being assaulted by the Romans, and astonished with fear, were easily overcome: Till at last, all being either put to the Sword, or fled through fear, the Treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of Keepers; so that the Soldiers took away thereof about four hundred Talents; and that which they left, Sabinus got.

But this loss of men and money stirred up many more Jews, and those more brave than the first, against the Romans; whom they besieged in the King's Palace, and threatened all their destructions, unless they would presently depart from thence: Yet promising Sabinus and the Legion leave to depart, if he so liked. Part of the King's Soldiers, who of their own accord fled to them, assisted them. But the most Warlike and valiant amongst them, were three thousand men of Herod's Army, whose Leaders were Rufus and Gratus; one of the Foot; and the other of the Horse; both which, although they had had no Soldiers with them, might yet for their Valour and Counsel, have been considerable to the Party of the Romans. The Jews earnestly continued the Siege, and assaulted the Castle-Walls, crying upon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now, after so long time, to recover their Country's Liberty. Sabinus, though with all his heart he wished himself away, yet he durst not trust them; but he suspected, that their courtesie was but a plot to entrap him. And on the other side, hoping that Varus would come and help him, he still endured the danger of the Siege.

At the same time there were tumults in many places of Judea; and many, through opportunity of the time, aspired to the Kingdom. For in Idumaea two thousand old Soldiers, who had born Arms under Herod, gathering together, and having armed themselves, went to attack the King's Forces commanded by Achiab, Herod's Nephew; who, because they were old Soldiers, and very well armed, durst not meet them in the Field, but withdrew into some Fortresses. At Sephoris also, a Town of Galilee, Judas the Son of Ezechias, Captain of the Thieves which formerly were defeated by King Herod, and had waited the Country; gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the King's Armory, and armed all his Company, and fought against them who affected the Royal Dignity. Also, beyond the River, one Simon, who had been Herod's Servant; being a goodly man, and of a huge stature, put a Crown upon his own head; and gathering together a company of Vagrants, went about with them to Jericho, and burnt the King's Palace, and many fair and sumptuous houses there, and so got a great Booty there; and he had surely fired all other Buildings of Note, had not Gratus, Captain of the King's Footmen, made haste to fight him with the Bow-men of Trachon, and the most Warlike men of Sebastie. Simon lost many men in this Encounter; and when he fled into a strait Valley, Gratus overtook him, and cut him overthwart the neck, so that he fell to the ground. In like manner, other of the King's Palaces near Jordan, by Bethara, were burnt by a multitude of other Rebels, gathered together in Bands from beyond the River. At this time a Shepherd, named Athrongau, pretended to make himself King: His Birth was so low, that formerly he had been but a simple Shepherd; and he had no other merit, but that he was very large and strong of body, and despised death. With this resolution he armed his four Brethren, each of which had a Company armed, and they were as his Lieutenants, to make Incursions; whilst he, like a King, meddled only with great Affairs, and wore a Crown upon his head: And thus he continued a long time waiting the Country, and killing, not only the Romans, and King's Soldiers; but also the Jews, if there was hope to gain any thing by them. One day he met a Company of the Romans at Emmans, who carried Corn and Armour unto the Legion; he fought with them, and killed one Arus a Centurion, and forty of the most valiant amongst them upon the place; the rest being in like danger, through the help of Gratus with the Soldiers of Sebastie, escaped. After they had done many things in this manner against their own Country-men as well as strangers, at last, three of them were taken; the eldest by Archelaus, and the two other, who were eldest after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolemy;

A Ptolemy; and the fourth yielded himself to Archelaus upon Composition. Such was the success of the bold Enterprize of these five men. But at that time a War of Thieves filled all Judea with Troubles and Robberies.

Varus, Governour of Syria for the Romans, represses the Insurrections in Judea.

WHEN Varus had, by the Letters of Sabinus, understood the danger wherein the whole Legion was, being besieged in Jerusalem; he halted to succour them: But first he went to Ptolemais with two other Legions, and four Cornets of Horse; where he had appointed the King's Forces, and the other Auxiliary Troops to meet gaint the him. As he passed by Beritus, the Inhabitants gave him fifteen hundred men. Archelaus the King of Arabia, for the hatred he bare to Herod, sent him a great number, both of Horse and Foot. As soon as the Host was assembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his Army into Galilee, adjoining to Ptolemais; and appointed a friend of his, the Son of Cains their Governour, who presently put all to flight against whom he was sent; and having taken the Castle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made all the Inhabitants thereof Slaves. Varus, with the rest of the Army, went to Samaria, and took it; yet he did the City no harm, because he found, that amidst all these Tumults, they had been quiet. When he had pitched his Tents at a Village called Arus, which belonged to Ptolemy, the Arabians sacked it, for they hated those that loved Herod. From thence they went to Sampha, another strong Burrough; which they in like manner sacked and destroyed, without sparing any thing. All was filled with the slaughter and fires which the Arabians made, there was no end nor hindrance of their Avrice. Also Varus commanded Emmans to be burnt, being angry for the death of Arus; and the rest that were slain there; and the Inhabitants thereof abandoned it, every one by flight seeking to save himself. From thence he went to Jerusalem; and at his approach, the Jews that besieged the Roman Legion fled and scattered themselves; some here, some there, all about the Country: They that remained in the City excused themselves, that they were not consenting to the Tumult; but that for the Celebration of the Feast, they permitted those Seditious to come into the City; affirming that they had rather have been besieged together with the Romans, than have joyed with those of the Sedition; and so they laid the cause of that Tumult upon others. But first Josephus, Archelaus's Cousin, with Gratus and Rufus, went to meet him; leading the King's Army, and the Sibaitians, and the Roman Soldiers, adorned in their accustomed Apparel. Sabinus durst not be seen by Varus, and therefore got him out of the Town before, and went to the Sea-coast. Varus divided his Army, and sent some Parties into the Country, to seek the Authors of the Tumult: And those that were brought to him who were in less fault, he committed to Prison; those who were the chiefest, he crucified, to the number of two thousand.

And understanding that in Idumaea there yet remained ten thousand men in Arms, he presently sent the Arabians home, because he perceived that they did not serve as they that came to help him, but as they themselves pleased, waiting the Country against his Orders; and so, accompanied with his own Army, he halted against the Enemies: But they without any fight, through Achiab's Counsel, yielded themselves to Varus. And he pardoned the Common Soldiers, and sent the Captains to Cesar to answer the matter: Who, pardoning most of them, yet punished those that were of Herod's Kindred, because they had rebelled against their own King. Varus having thus quieted the Estate of Judea and Jerusalem, left in the Fortres of Jerusalem, the same Legion that was there before, and departed to Antioch.

Now Archelaus met a new obstacle at Rome; for the Jews, who before the Sedition, with the lieve of Varus, were gone to Rome, to crave the liberty of their Country. Those who went as Ambassadors in their Country's behalf, were fifty in number; and they were assisted by more than eight thousand Jews, that lived at Rome. Whereupon, Caesar called a Council of the Nobility of Rome in the stately Temple of Apollo, which he had built on Mount Palatine. The whole Body of the Jews appeared with the Legats against Archelaus and his friends. Archelaus's Kindred neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Jews: with him they would not joyn, for envy; and with the Jews they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip, the Brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous manner to assist his Brother; or to the end, that if it should please Caesar to divide Herod's Kingdom among his Children, he might have a part. The Ambassadors spoke first, and began to decium against Herod's Memory: First of all they said, that they found him not a King; but the most cruel Tyrant that ever was; and that he had murdered many; and those whom he left alive, endured such misery, as they thought themselves far more unhappy than those that were so butchered. For (said they) he was not only content to tear his Subject's bodies with torments, but also defaced and ruined the Cities of his Country, to adorn and beautify the Cities of Strangers: And he permitted Foreigners to massacre the Jews without revenge. And instead of their ancient and wonted happiness, which Judea enjoyed by a Religious observation of the Law, the Country was by him made so poor, and so wasted with Injustice, that within these few years that Herod reigned, they have suffered more Deaths and Massacres, than all their Ancestors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, in the Reign of Xerxes, to the days of Herod; and being, by enduring such misery, now accustomed to the Toke, they had willingly subjected themselves to his Son Archelaus after that Herod his Father was dead, notwithstanding he was the Son of such a Tyrant; and had publicly mourned for the death of Herod, and offered Sacrifice for the prosperity of his Successor. But he, to show himself Herod's true Son, began his Reign with the slaughter of three thousand Citizens; and because he had so well deserved the Kingdom, he offered so many men to God for a sacrifice; and on a Festival Day, filled the Temple with so many dead bodies. Wherefore, 'tis not strange that they who escaped that Massacre, consider their own calamity; and as in Battel, turn their faces against those who wounded them, and beseech the Romans, that they would think the remainder remnant of the Jews worthy of compassion; and not abandon and expose the residue of their Nation as a Prey to them, by whom they are like to be most cruelly butchered; but that it may please them to adjoyn their Country to Syria, and to let them be ruled by the Romans; that so they may find that the Jews, though now counted seditious and rebellious, are under peaceable and quiet Governments, a peaceable Nation. With this Petition the Jews ended their Accusation. After this, Nicolaus stood up against them; and first of all acquitted the King of the Crimes laid to their charge, and then reproved his Countrymen, as people not to be easily Governed, and of their own nature averse, except forced, to obey their King: And by the way he also blamed the Kindred of Archelaus, who joyned with his Accusers. Caesar having heard what both parts could say, dismissed the Assembly. And within few days after he gave Archelaus half the Kingdom, with the Title of Ethnarch; promising moreover, to make him King, if he behaved himself well; the other half he divided into two Tetrarchies, and gave the same to the rest of Herod's Sons; one to Philip, the other to Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the Crown. Antipas his Part lay from Galilee, beyond the River Jordan; the Revenues whereof amounted to two hundred Talents a year. Philip had Batanea, and Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of what belonged to Zenodorus near Jamnia; the Revenues whereof amounted to one hundred Talents a year. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumaea, and all Judea and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of the Tribute, because they had not rebelled with the rest. These Cities also, were given him, Straton's Tower, Sebaste, Joppa and Jerusalem. But Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippon, Caesar took from the Kingdom, and joyned them to Syria. Archelaus's yearly Revenues amounted to four hundred Talents a year. Caesar also, besides that which Herod had left Salome, as Jamnia, Azotus and Paphlagonia, gave her the Palace at Ascalon; all which amounted to threecore Talents a year. But Caesar obliged her to live in the Country subject to Archelaus. And having confirmed the rest

Of the Impostor Alexander, Herod's pretended Son, and how he was taken.

At the same time, a certain young man, a Jew born, brought up by a Freed-man of Rome in the Town of Sidon, being very like Alexander whom Herod had put to death, went to Rome, having one of his Countrymen for his companion, who knew very well the Estate of the Kingdom; and by whose instructions he affirmed, that they who should have put him and Aristobulus to death, being moved to compassion, let them go, and put two others in their room like them. With this tale he deceived many Jews living in Crete, where he was honourably received: From thence he failed to Melos, where he was entertained with greater pomp; and enriching himself, he used such means, that he got his Hosts (which gave him entertainment) to accompany him to Rome. At his landing at Puteoli, he received great Presents from the Jews who dwelt there, especially those that were well affected to his Father, honoured him as a King. For he was so like Alexander, that they that had been Alexander, and knew him well, would have sworn he had been the same. Wherefore, when he arrived at Rome, all the Jews desired to see him, and an infinite multitude followed him whithersoever he went in the streets; and they flocked upon him, that they carried him in a Horse-litter, and at their own proper cost and charges, prepared for him a Royal Train.

But Augustus well remembered Alexander's visage (for Herod had accused him before him) and although, before he saw him, he judged that he was some Impostor, yet he made as though he believed all; and sent one Celadus, who knew Alexander well, to bring this young man to him. Celadus no sooner beheld him, but forthwith he perceived the difference betwixt them; and especially, when he took notice of his hard flesh and servile shape, he presently understood the whole matter. But he could not but be greatly surprized at his bold speeches; for when they demanded of him what was become of Aristobulus, he answered, that he was alive; but on purpose tarried behind, and lived in Cyprus, because, being asunder, they could not both so easily be entrapped. Celadus taking him apart from the rest of the Company, told him, that Caesar would save his life, if he would truly confess, by whose counsel he feigned himself to be Alexander. He, accepting this proffer, followed him to Caesar, and declared to him the Jew, who, for lucre sake, had made use of his likeness to Alexander; confessing that he had received as great Gifts of the Cities by which he passed, as they would have given Alexander, if he had been alive. Caesar laugh at the Cheat, and condemned this false Alexander to the Gallies, but put the other Jew to death, who had induced him to this Imposture. And as for the Jews at Milo, he thought that they had punishment sufficient, in losing all that which they had laid out, and bestowed upon him.

Of the Banishment and Death of Archelaus.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembered the contests past; and in revenge thereof, he ill treated, not only the Jews, but also the Samaritans. But in the ninth year of his Reign, the Jews and Samaritans sent Ambassadors against him, by whom he was banished to Vienna, a City of Gallia, and all his Goods confiscated. 'Tis reported, that before he was summoned to appear before Caesar, he had a strange Dream, in which he saw nine great Ears of Corn devoured by Oxen; and presently fending for some Chaldeans, he demanded what that Dream betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and some another; but one Simon an Eliean told him, that the nine Ears of Corn betokened the number of years he had reigned, and the Oxen signified the change of his Fortune; for as much as these creatures in labouring the Land, turned up and altered the face of it: And therefore, nine years being past since he had been established Prince, he was to prepare himself for death. Five days after this Interpretation, Archelaus was sent for to Rome, to answer before Augustus the things whereof he was accused. I have also thought it worth rehearsing, to set down the Dream of his Wife Glaphyra, Daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was first married to Alexander, Brother to this man, and Son to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we have said before: After whose death, she was married to Juba, King of Lybia; and he being dead, she returned home to her Father; where living in her Widowhood, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was so inflamed with her love, that presently he divorced his Wife Mariamne, and married her. Soon after the came into Judea, she dreamed that the law Alexander her first Husband, standing before her, and saying unto her; It had been enough for thee to have married the King of Lybia; but thou, not contented therewith, comest again to my house, greedy of a third Husband; and which is worst of all, art now married to mine own Brother. I will not conceal nor dissemble this injury which thou dost me, but I will recover thee against thy will. And the scarcely lived two days after she had related this Dream to her friends.

Of Judas the Galilean, who established a fourth Sect; and of the three Sects amongst the Jews.

After that Archelaus's Dominions were reduced into a Province, a certain Roman Knight called Coponius, was made Governour thereof. During his Administration, a certain Galilean named Judas, incited his Country-men to revolt; reproaching them for paying Tribute to the Romans, and for being subject to any but to God. This Judas was Author of a new Sect of his own devising, nothing like other Sects. For there are three Sects of Philosophers amongst the Jews; one is that of the Pharisees, another of the Sadducees, and the third of the Essenes, which is the most famous of all the three. The Essenes are Jews born, but live in the greatest union together imaginable: They consider all Pleasures, as Vices that are to be avoided; and esteem Contenance and Victory over the Passions, as the greatest Vertues. They reject Marriage, and account other men's Children, put to them to be taught whilst young, as their own Kin-men, whom they diligently instruct in their Manners and Opinions; not for that they condemn Marriage and Propagation of Mankind, but to avoid women's incontinence; for they think that none of them keep themselves true to one man. Also, they condemn Riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongst them is richer than other. And they have a Law amongst themselves, that whosoever will embrace their Sect, he must make his Goods common; for so, neither any amongst them seems abject for Poverty, nor any great for Riches; but they have, as it were, all equal Patrimonies like Brethren. They account it a shame to anoint the body with Oyl; and if any man, though against his Will, be appointed therewith, they use all diligence to wipe it away: And they account themselves fine enough, if their Cloaths be white. They have amongst them Stewards, to oversee all things for their common benefit; who are chosen from amongst them, by a common consent. Their Revenue is distributed according to the need that every one hath. They have not one certain City, but are dispersed in many Cities; and if any of their Sect, though a stranger, come to them from another place, they give him any thing they have, as if he were their ancient Acquaintance. In like manner, they go boldly to those, whom they never in their lives saw before, as though they were familiarly acquainted with them: And therefore, when they take a journey, they only arm themselves against Thieves, and carry nothing with them else. In every City there is one appointed, whose Office is to receive and lodge those of their Sect that come thither; and to see that they neither want Cloaths, nor any thing else necessary for them. All Children under Government, brought up by them, go apparelled alike; and they never change their Apparel nor Shoes, except they have worn out their first Apparel. Among themselves they neither buy nor sell; but every man that hath any thing which another wanteth, giveth him it, and taketh that of him which himself needeth; yea, every one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaseth, without any change. Above all, towards God they are

A are very Religious; for before the Sun rise, they speak of nothing but holy things, and then they make certain Vows and Prayers after the custom of their Country, as it were praying that God would please to make it rise upon the earth. After this, every one is dismissed to practice the Art he knoweth: And when every one hath diligently laboured till eleven a clock, they all meet together again, and being covered with linen cloaths, they wash their bodies with cold water: and having thus purged themselves, they go to their Cells, into which no man that is not of their Sect is admitted: And then they come to the Refectory, as into a holy Temple; where all sitting down with silence, there is set before every man in order, a loaf, and a little mess of pottage, all of one sort. Before they eat a Priest giveth thanks, and no man may eat any meat till this Prayer be made to God. Likewise, when dinner is ended they pray again; for both before and after, they give thanks to God, the Giver of all: And then putting off that Apparel as Sacred, they apply themselves to their work till evening. At supper they do as before, causing their Guests to sup with them, it by fortune any come. Their house is never troubled with cries or tumults, for every one is appointed to speak in his turn; so that their silence produces respect in strangers. The cause of this moderation is their continual sobriety, and that every one is limited how much to eat or drink. And although, that in all other matters they are ruled by their Superior, yet in these two, to wit, compassionating and helping, they may do as they think good: for every one may when he pleaseth, help those whom he thinketh deserve help; and when he pleaseth, give meat to them that are in need. Yet may they give any thing to their Kindred, without the leave of their Superior. They take great care to suppress their anger; they keep their promise, and maintain peace; and people account every word they speak of as much force, as if they had bound it with an oath: and they shun oaths worse than perjury; for they esteem him a liar, who is not to be believed, without he call God to witness. They study diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their Writings, what is most convenient for the soul and the body. Out of them they learn Remedies for Diseases, and the Vertues of Herbs, Stones and Metals. Those who are desirous to be of their Order, do not straightway converse with them; but for a year before, live out of the Colledge, and have the same diet, a little hatchet, and such a girdle as is before spoken of, and a white garment. But at the years end, if they perceive such a person to be continent, they give him a diet more agreeing with their own, and he is permitted to wash himself in cold water, to the end, to purify himself; yet is he not admitted in common amongst them, till for two years more, they have observed his life and manners: And at last, when he is thought worthy, he is admitted to their common company. But before he is received to the common Table, first he is to profess solemnly to honour and serve God with all his heart, to observe Justice and Fidelity towards all men; never willingly to hurt any man, nor injure any for another man's command; but always to hate the wicked, and assist the good; to keep his faith to all, but especially to his Superiors; because they hold their power from God. To which they add, that if he be put in Authority over others, he never will abuse it to the prejudice of those that are under him; and neither exceed the rest in apparel, nor any other ambitious pomp: that he will always love the truth, and severely reprove liars: and that he will keep his hands and soul pure from all theft and unjust gain: and that he will not conceal any mysteries, or secrets of their Religion from his companions, nor reveal them to any strangers, although he should be thereto threatened by death. Adding moreover, that he will never deliver any Doctrine, save that which he hath received; and diligently preserve the Books, as well as the Names, of those from whom they received it. These Professions they oblige those to take solemnly, who enter into their Order, to the end, to fortify them against Vices. Those of the Society who transgress notoriously, they thrust out of their company: and whosoever is so punished, for the most part dieth a miserable death; for, it being not lawful for him to eat with any stranger, he is reduced to feed on grass like beasts, and so he perisheth through Famine. For which cause oftentimes they are moved with compassion, to receive many into their Order again, when ready by Famine, to yield up the ghost; judging them to have endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almost brought to death's door. They are very severe and just in their judgments; and to decide any matter, there is never fewer of them than an hundred; and that which is by them agreed upon, is irrevocable. Next after God, they reverence their Law-giver, inasmuch that if a man one revile him, they forthwith condemn him to death. They take it for a great duty to obey their Elders, and what is appointed by many; so that if ten of them sit together, no man of them must speak, without he be licenced thereto by nine of the company.

pany. They account it a great incivility to be in the midst of the Assembly, or on their right hand. And they are more severe than any other Jews in observing the Sabbath; for they do not only abstain from dressing meat (which they dress the Evening before) that day, but also, they may not remove any vessel out of its place, nor falsifie the necessities of Nature. Upon other days they dig a pit a foot deep in the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before said) every one, at his entrance into their Order, hath given him; and then covering themselves diligently with their garment, as if they feared to be irreverent to the light of Heaven, in that pit they ease themselves; and then cover their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit: And this they do in most secret places. And although this purging of their bodies be natural, yet do they by walking purify themselves after it, as after great uncleanness. Furthermore, amongst themselves they are divided into four Orders, according to the time which they have continued this exercise of life; and they that are Juniors bear such respect to the Seniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they are obliged to purify themselves, as though they had touched a stranger. They are long-lived, so that most of them live an hundred years, which I judge is by reason of their well ordered diet, and their temperance. They condemn adultery, and by constancy and fortitude triumph over torments. They prefer an honourable death before life. The Wars which the Jews made against the Romans, shewed what invincible courage and hardiness they have in all things; for they tolerate the breaking of the members of their bodies, fire and Sword, and all kind of Tortures, rather than be brought to speak the least word against their Lawgiver, or to eat meats forbidden: They could not be forced to any of these, neither would they entreat the Torturers, nor threw any sorrow amidst their torments: Yea, in the midst of their pains they scoffed at their Tormentors; and joyfully yielded up their souls, as though they hoped to pass to a better life. For it is an Opinion amongst them, that the body is mortal and corruptible, but the souls remain ever immortal; and being of a most Pure and Ethernal Substance, wrap themselves in bodies as in prisons, being drawn thereto by some natural inclination: But when they are delivered out of these Carnal Bonds, then presently, as freed from a long Bondage, they joyfully mount into the Air. And of the good souls they say, as did the Grecians, that they live beyond the Ocean in a place of Pleasure, where they are never molested with rain, nor snow, nor heat, but have always a sweet and pleasant Air. But the wicked souls (as they say) go into a place very tempestuous, where there is always Winter weather, always lamentations of those who for ever are to be punished. For I judge that the Greeks are of this opinion, when they say there is an Isle for the virtuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods; and that the souls of the wicked go to a place in Hell, where it is feigned, that some are tormented, as Sisyphus, Tantalus, Ixion and Titius. These Essenes also believe that they are created immortal, that they may be induced to Virtue, and averted from Vice; that the good are rendered better in this life, by the hope of being happy after death; and that the wicked, who imagine they can hide their evil actions in this world, are punished for them in the other with eternal torments. This is the Essenes Opinion, touching the excellency of the soul; from which we see very few of those depart, who have once embraced it. There are also some among them, who promise to foretell things to come; which faculty is obtained as well by the studying of Holy Books and Ancient Prophecies, as by the care they take of sanctifying themselves: And their predictions seldom fail.

There is another sort of Essenes, agreeing with the former, both in apparel, diet and kind of life, and observance of the same Laws and Ordinances; only they differ in the matter of Marriage: Affirming, that to abstain from Marriage, tends to abolish mankind. For (say they) if all men should follow this opinion, presently all mankind would perish. Notwithstanding, these people use such moderation, that for three years space they observe the women they intend to marry; and then, if they appear found enough to bear Children, they marry them. None of them lie with their Wives when they are with child; so few that they do not marry to falsifie Lust, but to have Children. When their Wives wash themselves, they are covered with a Garment, as the men are, and this is the manner and custom of this Sect. Of the two former Sects, the Pharisees are said to be most skillful in Interpreting the Laws. The chief Article of their belief is; that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate; yet so, that every man may in many things, of his own power, do good or ill; though destiny may help much therein: And that the souls of men are all incorruptible; but only the souls of good men go into other bodies, and the souls of wicked men are sent into everlasting pain. But the Sadducees deny Fate, and affirm, that as God is the Author of no evil, so he takes no heed to what men do; that a man hath power to do well

A well or ill, and every man may chuse whether he will be good or bad; and they generally deny both pains and rewards for souls after this life. The Pharisees are as the Sotables and loving one to another, as the Sadducees are at discord amongst themselves, living like savage beasts, and as uncourteous to their own Sect, as to strangers. This is all which I have to speak concerning the Philoophers among the Jews. Now I will return to my purpose.

B of the Cities which Philip and Herod built; and of Pilates Government.

As Rebelaus his Ethnarchy being now made a Province, the rest of his Brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod, who was surnamed Antipas, continued to govern their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying, left Julia by her Testament the Toparchy which she ruled, as also Jamnia, and a ground set with Palm-trees in Phasels. When Tiberius the Son of Livia, upon the death of Augustus, (after he had reigned seven and fifty years, six months, and two days) was made Emperour of Rome, Philip built a City near the head of Jordan in the Country of Panade, and called it Caesarea; and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Tiberias, and another in Perea on this side Jordan, which he named Julias. Pilate being sent by Tiberius to be Governour over the Jews, caused in the night some Ensign on which was the Image of Caesar to be brought into Jerusalem; which thing, within three days after, caused a great tumult among the Jews: for they who beheld this action were astonished, and consider'd it as a violation of the Law of their Country, which forbids expressly, any Picture or Image of men or other creatures to be brought into the City. At their lamentation who were in the City, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the villages adjoining, and they went presently to Pilate then at Caesarea, beseeching him earnestly that the Images might be taken away out of Jerusalem, and that the Laws of their Country might remain inviolated. When Pilate denied their suit, they prostrated themselves before his house, and there remained lying upon their faces, for five days and nights, without moving. On the sixth day Pilate sitting in his Tribunal-seat, call'd all the Jews together before him, as though there he would have given them an answer: but on the sudden a company of armed Soldiers (for so it was provided) compassed the Jews about on all sides: The Jews were hereat amazed, seeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receive the Images of Caesar he would kill them all; and to that end made a sign unto the Soldiers to draw their swords. The Jews, as if they had agreed together, fell all down at once, and offered their naked necks to the stroke of the sword, crying out that they would rather lose their lives, than suffer their Religion to be profaned. Then Pilate admiring the constancy of the people in their Religion, presently commanded the said Ensigns to be taken out of the City of Jerusalem.

After this, he caused another tumult among them; for they have a sacred Treasure called Corban, which Pilate resolv'd to make use of to bring water into the City, four hundred furlongs off: for this cause the people murmured; so that when Pilate came to Jerusalem, they flock'd about his Tribunal to make their complaint. Pilate foreseeing a tumult, caused Soldiers secretly armed to mingle themselves among the people in private apparel, and commanded them not to use their swords, but to beat those with clubs whom they saw make such clamours. And when he had thus plotted the matter, sitting in his Tribunal, he gave a sign unto the Soldiers; and presently the Jews were beaten; and many of them, partly with blows, and partly trodden upon by the multitude, died miserably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of those that were slain, held their tongues. For this cause Agrippa Son of Arisbala, whom Herod the King his Father put to death, went to Rome, and accus'd him to Caesar. Tiberius not admitting his accusation, he remained still at Rome, and sought the favour of other great men there, and especially he courted Caius the Son of Germanicus, he being yet a private person: and upon a certain day, having invited him to a banquet, he stretched forth his hands, and openly pray'd Almighty God in stead of Tiberius Caesar he might see him Lord of all the world. Tiberius having notice hereof by one of his familiar friends, caus'd Agrippa to be imprison'd; where he endured hard and strait imprisonment till the death of Tiberius, which was six months after. After he was dead (having reigned two and twenty years, six months, and three days) Caius Caesar, who succeeded him in the Empire, freed him from prison, and gave him the Tetrarchy of Philip, who was newly deceased, and the title of King. When Agrippa came into his Kingdom, Herod the Tetrarch began to envy his estate; and Herodias his wife still urged him forward, in hope that he should be made a King also: for (said she) thou wastest that dignity only through foolishness, because thou wouldest not go to Cæsar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a private man, how caust thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrarch? Herod herewith perwaded, went to Caius Cæsar, who greatly reproached his ambition, inasmuch as he fled into Spain: for Agrippa had followed him to Rome to accuse him before Cæsar; and Caius gave him Herod's Tetrarchy. And so Herod remained in Spain with his wife till his death.

C H A P. IX.

The Emperour Caius orders Petronius Governour of Syria to constrain the Jews by arms to receive his Statue into the Temple. Petronius forbears to do it. The death of Caius saves him from punishment.

Caius Cæsar so abused his Authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and so called. Also he put many Noble men of his Country to death by his cruelty; which he likewise extended even to Judea: for he sent Petronius with an army to Jerusalem, commanding him to set his Statues in the Temple; and if the Jews refused to receive them, that those who withstood him should be put to the sword, and the rest led away captive. Almighty God did otherwise dispose this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three Legions, and many assistants out of Syria, came with all speed from Antioch to Judea: many of the Jews would not believe any war towards, notwithstanding that they heard a general report thereof: and they that believed it, could not bethink themselves of any means to resist. Suddenly all were in a great fear; for the Army was now come to Ptolemais, which City is situate by the Sea-shore in Galilee, in a fair Field; and on the East-side it is compassed with Mountains, distant from it threecore furlongs, which belong to Galilee; on the South-side it is invested with Mount Carmel, which is distant an hundred and twenty furlongs: on the North-side it is environed with an exceeding high Mountain, which the Inhabitants call the Tyrians Ladder: this Mountain is an hundred paces distant from the City. Two miles from this City there is a River running by, called Pelrus, a very little one, near which is the admirable Sepulchre of Memnon, which is a hundred cubits high and of a concave form. In this place is seen a sort of Sand as transparent as Glass, which many ships carry away for Ballast; but though they empty the place of it, yet that place is presently after covered with the like sand again. For there are winds which as it were on purpose, carry this sand from the higher places round about it thither; and this sand being put into the furnace is presently changed into Chrystal or Glass. And that which in my opinion is more to be wondered at, is, that the sand being so turned into Glass, if afterward any part thereof be cast upon the brink of this place, it is again turned into ordinary sand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Jews with their wives and children gathered themselves together in the field where the City Ptolemais is situate, and humbly besought Petronius not to violate their Country-laws, but to have compassion on them. Petronius seeing the multitude that humbly sued to him, and how earnestly they sought his favour, left Cæsar's statues at Ptolemais, and himself went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Jews and Nobility together, he represents to them the power of the Romans, and how dreadful Cæsar's threatnings ought to be to them; adding moreover, that the Jews supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all Nations under the dominion of the Romans (the Jews only excepted) had already placed Cæsar's Statues in their Temples among those of their gods: and herein they did as it were revolt from the Emperour, and affront him their Governour who represented his person. They answered, it was against the Laws and Customs of their Country: for it was not lawful for them to have the Image of God, much less of a man; and that they were not only forbidden by the Law to have an Image in the Temple, but also to have it in any prophane place. Petronius replied, if you observe your Laws so religiously, I must also observe my Lord's command; for if I do not, but spare you, I shall be justly punished: and 'tis not to me, but to him you must make your addresses; for I myself, as well as you, am subject to him. At these words the whole multitude

A multitude cried out together, that before they would see their Religion violated, they would willingly expose themselves to any danger. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Cæsar? The Jews answered, No, we every day offer sacrifices for Cæsar and the Romans. But if Cæsar must needs place his Image in the Temple, he must first kill us all with our wives and children. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, and moved to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Jews in their Religion, and so great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled only the Nobility of the Jews, and spoke to them both generally and one by one, exhorting them to obey Cæsar's command, and sometime admonishing them, otherwise threatening them, and putting them in mind of the power of the Romans, and Cæsar's indignation, and that he must of necessity do as he was commanded. But they were moved by none of these. Whereupon Petronius, fearing the ground would be left untill'd, (for it was now seed-time, and all the people had remained idle in the City for fifty days space) calling them together, he said, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger him self. For (said he) I will either (God assisting me) appease Cæsar's wrath, or else I will lose mine own life to save such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him, he led his Army from Ptolemais to Antioch, from whence he presently sent to Cæsar in all haste, re-counting to him with how great an Army he went into Judea, and that all the whole Nation made supplication to him; whose request and humble suit if he denied, he must utterly destroy the men and their Country; for they remained resolute in their Country-religion, and vehemently resisted any new Law. Caius writ an answer of these Letters to Petronius, threatening him, that it should cost him his life, because he made no more haste to execute his command. The messengers that brought these Letters, were tossed in a tempest upon the Sea three whole months together; but others coming after them to bring news of Caius's death, had a prosperous wind: so Petronius received the Letters of Caius Cæsar's death twenty seven days before the other threatening Letters came.

The Roman Army declares Claudius Emperour. Of the Reign and Death of Agrippa.

Caius Cæsar being assassinated, after he had reigned three years and six months, Claudius was made Emperour by the Army which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturninus, and Pomponius Secundus, commanded three Legions of Soldiers to keep the City, during the Council holden in the Capitol; and abhorring Caius Cæsar's cruelty they determined to fight against Claudius, and to reduce the Empire to the ancient Government; that as before-time, so for ever after, those should rule that the Senate judged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent to him, requesting him to come and take place in their Council. Claudius also desired him to take part with the Army, intending to use his help where need required. Agrippa perceiving that Claudius was in a manner already Emperour for his power, he took part with him; who presently sent him as Ambassador to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the Soldiers, whether he would or no, set him in that dignity; and it had been in him an undiscreet part, to have forsaken such an offer from the Soldiers, who did it for good will; that if he had refused it his life had been in danger; and it was sufficient danger, that he had been elected Emperour. Moreover, he purposed to rule, not as a Tyrant, but as a good Prince: for he would be contented only with the Title of Emperour, and do nothing without the common consent of them all. And although he was not naturally inclined to modest and courteous behaviour, yet he had a sufficient example to beware, that he abused not his authority, by Caius Cæsar's death. Agrippa carried this message to the Senate, who answered, (as though they trusted to their Soldiers and the Justice of their Cause) that they would not thrust themselves into voluntary bondage, Claudius receiving this answer, sent Agrippa again to tell them, that nothing could cause him to abandon them by whom he was made Emperour: and that he was forced to make war against them, with whom he was very loath to contest; and therefore willed them to chuse a place out of the City for the battel to be fought in: for it stood with no reason to deface the City with civil wars and Massacres, for the obitancy of some few. Agrippa did this message also to the Senate; and one of the Soldiers that were for the Senate drew his Sword, and said, Fellow Soldiers, what should move us to massacre our Friends, and Kindred, and Parents, who follow Claudius? especially, seeing we have an Emperor with whom we can find no fault; unto whom we should rather go forth with Congratulations, than with Arms. When he had said this, he passed thorough the midst of the Court, and all the Soldiers followed him.

The Senate, being thus left desolate, and abandoned by their Forces, began to be in great fear; and seeing it was no standing out for them, they followed the Soldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the City Walls, there met them some that endeavour to shew themselves dutiful to Claudius for his Fortunes sake; who, having their Swords drawn, had killed the foremost before Cesar understood any thing of their coming, had not Agrippa halted to advertise him of the matter. He told him, that if he did not presently appease the Soldiers fury, now raging against the Citizens, all the Nobility would presently be destroyed, and he should be left Emperor of a desolate place.

When Claudius heard this, he repressed the Soldier's fury, and very honourably received the Senate into his Camp; and went forth presently with them, and offered Sacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good Estate of the Empire, and to give him thanks for that Sovereignty which he held of him. Also, he presently made Agrippa King of all his Father's Dominions; giving him likewise, all that Augustus had given Herod, to wit, Trachonitis and Auranitis, and besides them, another Country, called the Kingdom of Lysania; and published this his Gift by Edict to the people, and commanded the Senate to engrave that Donation in Brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capitol. Moreover, he gave the Kingdom of Chalcis to his Brother Herod, who was become also his Son-in-law by the marriage of Bernice, his Daughter. Agrippa now received greater Revenues of his Kingdom than he could desire; which he spent not vainly, but in building such a Wall about Jerusalem, as, had he finished it, the Romans could never have taken it: But before he could end that work, he died in Cæsarea; having reigned three years with the Title of King, and other three years before that of Tetrarch. He left behind him three Daughters, which he had by Cypria; Bernice, Mariamne and Drusilla; and one Son by the same Wife named Agrippa, who, because he was very young Claudius reduced the Kingdom into a Province, and made Cyprius Fadus Governour thereof. After whom succeeded Tiberius Alexander; who nothing violating the Laws of the Nation, ruled them in Peace. After this, Herod, King of Chalcis, died; leaving behind him two Sons, which he had by his Brother's Daughter Bernice; to wit, Bernicianus and Hircanus; and by his first Wife Mariamne, Herod, his other Brother also, Arifobulus, died a private person, leaving one Daughter, Jotapa. And these were the Posterity of Arifobulus, Son of King Herod by Mariamne, whom he put to death: But his elder Brother Alexander's Posterity reigned in the greater Armenia.

Of divers Tumults in Judæa and Samaria.

After the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa, the Son of the former Agrippa, King of Chalcis, his Uncle's Kingdom: And Cumanus was made Ruler of the other Province after Tiberius Alexander; under whom many new tumults and calamities befel the Jews. For when they were assembled together at the Feast of Unleavened bread in Jerusalem, the Roman Soldiers standing in the Porch of the Temple (for always armed men kept that place upon Festival days, left the people gathered together should make any tumult) one of the Soldiers taking up his coat, turned his bare buttocks against the Jews faces, speaking words as unbecomly as his gesture. At which insolenace the whole multitude began to murmur; and they flock-ed about Cumanus, requesting him to punish the Soldier for his midemeanour: And some of them, rash young men, and prone to Sedition, began to revile the Soldiers, and throw stones at them. Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Jews would violently move against him, called to him many armed Soldiers, and sent them to seize the Gates of the Temple. The Jews being in great fear, fled, and left the Temple; and there was such a throng, that as they halted to flee, above ten thousand people were preft and trodden to death: So that this Festival day was turned into woful lamentations and mournings in every place. This calamity was followed soon after by another;

A another; for near Bethoron, one Stephanus, Servant to Cesar, carrying some rich household stuff, was robbed of it in the High-way. But Cumanus sending for those in the Villages next adjoining, in order to discover the Thieves, commanded them to be bound and brought to him, because they had not taken the Thieves: In one of which Villages a certain Soldier finding the Book of the Holy Scripture, cut it in pieces, and burnt it. Hereupon all the Jews of this Country gathered themselves together from all places, being no less incensed, than if they had seen their Country set on fire; and carried by zeal for their Religion, they forthwith went to Cæsarea, to Cumanus, there beseeching him, that the Soldier, who had affronted God and their Law, might not escape unpunished. Cumanus perceiving that the Jews would not be appeased without some satisfaction, condemned the Soldier to death, and sent him to Execution in their presence; which done, they all departed.

At the same time there arose a great difference between the Galileans and Samaritans; for at a Village called Geman, situate in the great Plain of Samaria, a certain Galilean, of the number of the Jews that came to the Feast, was slain: For which fact many Galileans joyned together, to be revenged of the Samaritans: And the Principal of the Country went to Cumanus, requesting him, before any more harm were done, to go into Galilee, and punish the Authors of this Murder. But Cumanus being bussed in greater Affairs, sent them away without granting their request. When this murder was known in Jerusalem, all the multitude left the solemnity of the Festival, and went to Samaria, refusing to be restrained by the Magistrates. Of this their Tumult and Sedition, the Son of Dinaus, called Elezar, and one Alexander, were Captains; who, with violence entering the Borders of the Country of Lacabatanis, killed man, woman and child, and burnt the Towns. When Cumanus heard this, he took the Cavalry of Sebas, and went to help them that were thus oppressed; and he killed and made Prisoners many of them who took part with Elezar. Now the Magistrates of Jerusalem went out to the rest of the Jews which so waited Samaria, clothed in sack-cloth, and altes upon their heads, and beseeched them not to seek revenge upon the Samaritans, lest thereby they moved the Romans to destroy Jerusalem; but to be merciful to their Country, the Temple, their Wives and Children, and not at once hazard all, and overthrow their whole Country and Nation in revenging the death of one Galilean. The Jews hereby were pacified, and departed. At the same time there were many that made it their Trade to rob and steal (as most commonly people by long peace grow indolent) so that they robbed in every part of the Country, and the strongest and most audacious oppressed those that were weaker. Hereupon the Samaritans went to Tyre, to pray Numidius Quadratus, Governour of Syria, to revenge them of those that so robbed and spoiled their Country. The chief men of the Jews went thither also; and Jonathas, the Son of Ananias, who was High Priest, defended the Jews against the Samaritans Acculation; affirming, the Samaritans to have been cause of that tumult by killing the Galilean; and that Cumanus was cause of the rest of their calamities, who refused to punish the murderers. Quadratus for that time sent away both Parties, promising them that when he came into their Country, he would diligently enquire of the matter: And coming from thence to Cæsarea, he crucified all those whom Cumanus had made Prisoners. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritans complaints, and sent for eighteen men, whom he understood for certain to have been in that broil, and beheaded them, and sent the two High-Priests, Jonathas and Ananias, and his Son Ananias, with some of the most considerable Jews, to Cesar; and also, the chief of the Samaritans. He likewise commanded Cumanus and Celer the Tribune, to go to Rome, and justifie themselves to Claudius, for that which they had done in that Country.

F This done, he went from Lydda to Jerusalem; and finding there the multitude celebrating the Feast of Unleavened Bread, without any tumult or disorder, he returned to Antioch. Cesar at Rome hearing the Allegations of Cumanus, and the Samaritans (Agrippa was also there, earnestly defending the Cause of the Jews; as also Cumanus was assisted by many Potentates) he pronounced sentence against the Samaritans, and commanded three of their chief Nobility to be put to death, and banished Cumanus, and sent Celer the Tribune bound to Jerusalem, that the Jews might draw him about the City, and then cut off his head. This done, he sent Felix, Brother to Pallas, to govern Judea, Samaria and Galilee. And he preferred Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater Kingdom; making him King of that Province, whereof Philip had been Tetrarch; to wit, Trachonitis, Batanea and Golanitis; adding therunto the Kingdom of Lysania, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus had been Governour. Claudius having reigned thirteen years, eight months, and thirty days, departed this life, leaving Nero to succeed him.

him, whom by the persuasions of his Wife Agrippina he adhepted to the Empire, though he had a lawful Son of his own named Britannicus, by his former Wife Messalina; and a Daughter called Octavia, whom he married to Nero: He had also another Daughter by Agrippina, named Antonia. How Nero abused his Wealth and Felicity; and how he slew his Brother, Mother and his Wife, and afterwards raged against all his kindred; and how in a mad vein he became a Player on a Stage; because it requireth a long Narration, I will speak nothing thereof.

BUT I think my self to relate particularly the Actions of this Emperour towards the Jews. He made Aristobolus, Herod's Son, King of the lesser Armenia; and added to Agrippa's Kingdom, four Cities, and the Territories belonging unto them: Two of them, Abila and Julias, were in the Countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichea and Tiberias, were in Galilee: And he made Felix Governour over the rest of Judæa. This Felix took Elezar, Captain of the Thieves, after he had robbed and spoiled the Countrey twenty years, and many more with him, and sent them bound to Cæsar; and he crucified a great number of them, who either were Thieves and his Confederates, or else had assisted him. The Countrey was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of Thieves arose in Jerusalem, called Scarii, from their short Swords, who at high Noon in the midst of the City killed many in every place; and especially at the celebrating of Holy Feasts, they mixed themselves with the multitude, having short Swords under their coats, and therewith killed those to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell down dead, they amongst the rest, cried out of the murder. By this deceitful means they were a long time unsuspected and unknown. And first of all, they killed Jonathan the High Priest, and after him, every day some were slain; and the City was put in no less fear, than if it had been in a time of War, for each man every moment expected death, and cast a diligent eye upon those that came near him, and no man trusted his familiar friends; and yet were they murdered, whilst they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these Thieves cover and conceal their actions. Moreover, there arose another sort of mischievous people, who did not so much harm with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsel more; and did no less trouble the quiet Estate of the City, than did the Thieves. These people being Vagabonds and Juglers, desiring alteration under pretence of Religion, made the people frantick; for they led them into the Wilderness, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of his purpose to set them at liberty. Felix, perceiving that these Assemblies tended to Rebellion, sent an Army of Horse and Foot against these people, and killed many of them.

But a certain Egyptian, a false Prophet, occasioned a far greater Massacre among the Jews than this: for being a Magician, he came into the Countrey; and calling himself a Prophet, he gathered unto him almost thirty thousand Jews, who were by his Magick Arts seduced: and leading them from the Wilderness to Mount Olivet, he determined from thence to go to Jerusalem, and to drive thence the Forces of the Romans, and there to fix the seat of his Dominion over the people. He chose for his Guard a good number of his followers. Felix foreseeing his intent, met him with his Legions of Romans, and a great number of other Jews; and fighting against him, the Egyptian being defeated, fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to Prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselves into their Countrey. These being thus repressed, another part (as it happeneth in a sick body) began to rise: For some Magicians and Thieves being gathered together, exhorted the people to shake off the Roman Yoke, and threatened present death to those that continued to suffer so shameful a Servitude; so that they forced them who were contented with their subjection to the Romans, to disobey them. These people being dispersed all over the Countrey robbed and sacked rich men's houses; killed them, and fired the Villages; so that all Judæa was in extreme fear of them, and every day their cruelty encreased.

At this time arose another tumult at Cæsarea, between the Jews that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Jews challenged the City to be theirs, because it was founded by Herod, who was a Jew. But the Syrians denying not that the builder of the City was a Jew; yet affirmed, that it ought to pass for a Greek City; for (said they) the Founder

A Founder would not have placed in it Shrines and Statues, if he had meant that it should have belonged to the Jews. Hereupon there arose a great controverſie among the Jews and Syrians, so that the matter came to blows; and every day, those that were the hardiest of both parts, fought together. For the wilful sort of the Jews could not refrain those of their Nation from being seditious; and the Greeks scorned to give place to the Jews. The Jews surpassed them in Riches and strength of body, and the Grecians trusted to the help of the Roman Soldiers; for a great many of the Roman Army being levied in Syria, were ready to assist the Syrians, because of Kindred and Conſanguinity. The Officers that commanded them endeavoured to appease the Tumult, and took those that were most seditious, and beat them, and cast them into Prison. But the punishment of those that were apprehended, terrified not the rest; on the contrary, they were hereby more tumultuous. Felix finding them at blows as he passed into the great Market-place, commanded the Jews, who had the advantage, to retire; and because they obeyed not, he sent for Soldiers, who slew them, and plundered their Goods. The Sedition being still on foot, he sent some of the Nobility on either Part, to Nero, to plead their Cause before him. Felix succeeded Felix, who vigorously persecuted them that troubled the Countrey, and destroyed many Thieves.

C H A P. XIII.

Of Albinus and Florus, Presidents of Judæa.

ALBINUS, who succeeded Felix, followed not his steps; for there was no mischief so great, which he was not guilty of: For, he, not only took away by force men's Goods from them under colour of Justice, and at his own pleasure exacted a greater Tribute; but also freed and let loose any one, whom, either the Magistrates of the City took, or his Predecessors had left in Prison, so that their Friends would give a piece of money; and they only, who were not able to give money, were imprisoned as most heinous Offenders. At this time, they in Jerusalem that desired alteration, began to take courage; and those that were rich among them feed Albinus with money, to have his Protection: and the common people that loved not to be in quiet, were much pleased with Albinus's Government; and each of the most wicked, had a Troop of Thieves after him: But Albinus himself was over them all, as chief of the Thieves; whom he used as his Guard to rob the meaner sort. They, whose houses were sacked and spoiled, were glad to hold their peace; and they, who yet had escaped, were glad to be very officious towards those who deserved death, for fear they should suffer it. In general, no men could trust one another. Every one trembled under the Rule of so many Tyrants: And all these mischiefs were the Seeds of the Servitude, which after beset this miserable City.

sident of Judea, full of Judicia, full of wickedness.

The Seditious

to wink at their Robberies.

Notwithstanding that Albinus was of such behaviour, yet Gessius Florus, who succeeded him, so behaved himself, that in comparison of him, Albinus might have been thought a good Governor. For Albinus did all things secretly and craftily, but Gessius committed any iniquity, how great soever, so openly, as though he gloried in mischief; and behaved himself, not as a Ruler of the Countrey, but as a hangman sent to execute Malefactors; omitting no manner of Theft, nor any means whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to have shewed pity, there he was a Tyrant; and where he ought to have been ashamed, there he shewed himself shameless. No man ever could invent more means to betray the truth, and devise more subtil ways to do harm, than he; for it sufficed him not, for his own gain to abuse men one by one at his pleasure, but he waited and spoiled whole Cities at once, and destroyed the people in great multitudes. He was not ashamed, by the publick voice of a Crier, to proclaim it thorough the whole Countrey, lawful for any one that would, to rob and steal, so that they would bring him a part of their Booty. In brief, his Avarice was such, that the Countrey was almost left desolate; people forsaking their own native home, and fleeing into strange Lands. And all the time that Gessius Gallus was Governour of Syria, no man durst go to him, to make any complaint against Florus. But when, at the Feast of Unleavened Bread, Gallus came to Jerusalem, there met him a multitude of the Jews above three hundred thousand; all beseeching him to help and succour their afflicted Countrey, and banish Florus, who was the very Pest of their Nation. Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing these Out-cries against him, he was no whit moved, but laughed at it. Cessius for that time appeased the people gether in the upper part of the City in the Market-place, and with great cries complain that so many were slain, and especially used contumelious words against Florus: which the Nobility and high Priests (fearing death) apprehending, beleeched them to abstain from such words as had already caused that calamity in the City, and not to provoke Florus to greater indignation. And so the multitude was pacified for their sakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would desist from such cruelty. Florus, when he saw the multitude quieted, was sorry: and that he might again provoke them, he assembled together the Nobility and high Priests, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not seek alteration any more, if they would go in courteous manner and meet the Soldiers which were coming from Cesarea, whereof there were two Legions. Having thus assembled the Jews together to meet the Soldiers; he also sent and commanded the Centurions not to salute the Jews who came to meet them: and if therefore the Jews were offended, and gave any hard speeches, they should fall upon them with their weapons. The high Priests assembling themselves together in the Temple, desired them to go, and solemnly meet and entertain the Soldiers, for fear of a greater inconvenience. Notwithstanding this counsel, those that were seditious refused to do as they were requested: and others for grief of them that were slain, took part with the seditious.

Then all the Priests and Levites brought forth the holy vessels and ornaments of the Temple, and with Harps, songs, and musical instruments came before the multitude, and on their knees conjur'd them by the care, that they ought to have of the honour and preservation of the Temple, not to provoke the Romans through contumelious words, lest they should sack the Temple. There might you have seen the chief of the Priests with albes upon their heads, and their cloaths rent, so that their naked breasts were perceived; calling every Nobleman by his name, and speaking to all the multitude, requesting them not for a small offence, to betray their whole Country to them, who still gaped after the destruction thereof. For what thanks shall ye have from the Romans for your former salutations, if now in hope of amendment of your miseries you go not forth to meet them? contrariwise, if you would go to them in solemn manner, then you take from Florus all occasion of violence, and save your Country from ruine, and your selves from further calamities. Adding that it was a great shame that such a multitude should be led away with a few seditious persons; and that it was more fit that so many should force those few seditious people to obey them, and joy with them in opinion.

With these persuasions they mollified the obstinacy of the Jews, and also persuaded many of the seditious people, some with threats, and some with reverence of themselves to be pacified. And so they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Roman Soldiers. At their coming near them they saluted them; who answering nothing again, those of the Jews that were seditious, began to rail against Florus, by whole order this was done: whom presently the Soldiers apprehending, beat them with clubs; and the rest flying, the Roman horsemen pursued them, and trode upon them with their horses. Many were slain, by the Romans, and more were killed in the throng, one tumbling upon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the City; for every one halting and striving to get in, hindered themselves and others. Many died most miserably in the throng, and some were stifled, and some prest to death and trodden upon; so that their neighbours coming to bury them, could not know them. The Soldiers also cruelly assaulted them, killing all that they could come to, and hindered the people from going in by the gate called Bethetha, because they desired first to recover the Temple and the Castle called Antonia.

At the same time Florus coming with a party of Soldiers out of the Palace pursued them thither, striving to get the Castle; yet he did not prevail: for the people made resistance, and threw down stones from the houses tops, and killed many of the Romans; who being pester'd with stones and darts cast from aloft, could not resist the people, who on every side came against them, but retired themselves to the rest of the army at the King's Palace. Those that were seditious, fearing that Florus would again assault them, and by the Castle Antonia get entrance into the Temple got upon the Galleries that reached from the Porch of the Temple to Antonia, and beat them down, hereby to defeat the covetousness of Florus, who greedily gaped after the sacred Treasure, and strived to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take it: but seeing the Porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high Priests and Nobility, he said that he was content to depart out of the City, but he would leave them as great a garrison as they would request. Where-

A unto they answered, that nothing should be alter'd, if he would leave one company to keep all quiet; provided he left not that, which lately so ill treated the people, because the people would not easily brook them, for that which they had suffered at their hands. Florus, as he was requested, changing the garrison, with the rest of the army went to Cesarea.

C H A P. XVI.

Of Politianus the Tribune: King Agrippa's speech to the Jews, exhorting them to obey the Romans.

Florus yet devised another way to stir the Jews to rebellion: for he first word to Cestius that the Jews were revolted, impudently belying them to have committed that which indeed they endured at his hands. The Nobles of Jerusalem and Bernice certified Cestius of all that Florus had done. He receiving Letters from both parties, deliberated with his Officers what to do. Some counselled Cestius to go into Judea with an army, and punish the Jews, if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirm them in their obedience. Yet it pleased him better to send some about him thither before, to bring him true news of their estate, and what had hapned. So he sent Politianus the Tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa in Jamnia as he was returning from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was sent. Here also were present the Priests and the chief of the Jews, to welcome Agrippa; and having saluted him as courteously as they could, they presently bewailed the misery which had befallen their Nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa compassionated, yet he made as if he were angry with the Jews whom he greatly pitied; purposing hereby to allay their passions in stead of further irritating them by testifying the same sentiments to revenge. All the better sort, who for the sake of their lands and estates desired quietness, well perceived that the Kings reprehension was not of malice, but for their good.

D Also the people of Jerusalem went out to meet the King threecore furlongs off, and received him and Politianus very courteously; yet the women lamented the death of their husbands slain, and with tears moved the whole multitude to sorrow, who besought Agrippa to have compassion on their Nation, and entreated also Politianus to go into the City, and behold what Florus had done. There they shewed him the Market-place desart, and the houses destroyed; and by means of Agrippa they persuaded him to go round about the City as far as Siloa, only with one man, and behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romans in all things, and only were enemies to Florus who had used them so cruelly. Politianus having gone about the whole City, ascended into the Temple where he well perceived many arguments of the Jews fidelity towards the Romans; and calling the people there together, he praised their loyalty, and exhorted them still to continue in like obedience, and worshipped God and the holy places, as far as the Law permitted him: and so he returned to Cestius. After his departure, the multitude of the Jews came to Agrippa and the high Priests, requesting them to send Ambassadors against Florus to Nero, because otherwise they should give occasion to think it a voluntary rebellion, by not complaining of such murders: For Florus would make him believe that they had rebelled, except they went to him to shew that Florus gave first occasion; and it was certain that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindered that Embassy. Agrippa thought it would be an hateful matter to send Ambassadors to Rome to accuse Florus; and on the other side he perceived, that it was to no purpose to contradict the Jews, who were ready now to rebel: wherefore calling the people together he made a speech to them, having seated his sister Bernice in an eminent place in the house of the Astomaneans. The porch wherein he called them together was in such a place that it overlook'd all the higher part of the City, for there was only a bridge between it and the Temple, which joyned this and that together; and there he spake to the Jews in manner following: If I saw that you were resolved to make war against the Romans, and Agrippa that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, I would not have come into the unto you, nor have presumed to have consulted you in any thing. For it is in vain to give counsel of such things as are expedient, where all the Auditors are already determined to follow that which is contrary to the counsel given them. But for that I see how great what misery War produces, because by reason of their young men they have not known it, others are moved with a rash and unadvised desire of liberty, and others are drawn by covarice and hope of gain in combustions, I thought good to assemble you all together, and declare unto you what means are to be used to restrain such people, that the good may the better know how to resist and overcome the practices of the wicked. But let no man murmur, if he hear that which displeaseth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which seemeth expedient for you. For they that are so bent to rebellion, that they will not be recalled, may for all my words continue in the same mind still. And I will speak nothing at all, except you will all keep silence. I know many seek to aggravate the injuries that are done by the Rulers of this Country, and highly commend and extol liberty: yet before I begin to declare unto you the difference between you and those against whom ye purpose to make war, I must first divide and separate two things; which you think inseparable. I

For if you seek only to get satisfaction upon those that have injur'd you, why do ye so extol liberty? or if you think it not tolerable to obey any other, these complaints against your Rulers are superfluous: for although they were never so mild, still would subjection be intolerable. Call all things to mind, and consider what a small cause of war is given you.

And first of all weigh with your selves the crimes and offences of your Rulers: for you ought to shew your selves humble and dutiful to those that are in authority, and not exasperate and provoke them to wrath by reproachful speeches. For in reviling them for small offences, you incite against you those whom you so revile: and whereas before they only did you a little injury, and with some shame, now being moved by your resistance, they will openly set upon you and destroy you. There is nothing that so restraineth K cruelly as patience: so that oftentimes the patience of them who have suffered injury, makes them that did the injury ashamed thereof. Be it so that they, which are sent into the Provinces and appointed by the Romans for your Governments, are grievous to you: yet all the Romans do not oppress you, nor Cæsar, against whom you must take arms. For they command no cruel Governments to come to you: nor can they who are in the furthest part of the West, easily know what is done in the East, or indeed be exactly informed thereof. And truly it is a thing most against reason to take arms for so small a cause, especially, when they against whom you take arms know nothing of the matter. But there is reason to hope, that these matters you now complain of will not be always so: For there will not be always the same Governour: and it is credible, that they who succeed this, will be more gentle and courteous. But if once you begin to make war, it is not easy to end or sustain it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after liberty, diligently advise with themselves, that they do not bring upon their necks a greater bondage. Slavery is a cruel thing: and it seemeth a lawful cause to make War to avoid being brought into it: yet be that is already in bondage and revolteth, is rather a rebellious slave, than one who loveth liberty. You should therefore have endeavoured to resist the Romans, when first Pompey entred this Land: but then our ancestors and their Kings far exceeding you in riches, strength of body and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the Roman forces: and do you who are their successors, and far weaker than they, having succeeded them in subjection, think that you are able to resist all the whole power of the Romans? The Athenians, who sometime to preserve the liberty of Greece, feared not to set their own City on fire, and with a small fleet defeated that proud Xerxes, whom they forced to flee with one ship (though he had such a navy that the seas had scarce room for one ship to sail by another, and all Europe was not able to receive his army) and got that famous victory over Asia, near the little Isle of Salamina, yet now are subject to the Romans, and that City, the Queen of all Greece, is now ruled by the commands it receives from Italy. The Lacedæmonians also, after they had gotten such a victory at the Thermopyles, and under their General Agellus sacked Asia, acknowledge now the Romans for their Lords. The Macedonians also, who had before their eyes the valour of Philip, N and Alexander, and promised themselves the Empire of the whole world, now patiently bear this change, and obey them whom fortune hath made their masters. Many other Nations, who for their power and strength have far more cause than you to seek their liberty, yet patiently endure to serve the Romans: But you only think it a disgrace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole World. And where are the armies that you trust in or your navy to make you masters of the Roman Seas? Where are your treasures to effect what you intend? Think you that you are to war against the Egyptians or Arabians? and do you not consider the bounds of the Roman Empire? Do you not consider your own inability? Know you not that your neighbour-nations have often by force taken your City? and that the forces of the Romans have passed thorow the whole world unconquered, and as it were searching for something greater than the world? Their dominion towards the East is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Ister, and towards

A East is extended beyond Euphrates and towards the North beyond Ister, and towards the South beyond the Wilderness of Libya, and towards the West beyond Gades: they have found another World beyond the Ocean, and with an army entred Britain, where never any came before. Are you richer than the Gauls, stronger than the Germans, wiser than the Greeks: are you more in number than the whole world beside? What hope can you have to encourage you against the Romans? But some of you will say, that bondage is a grievous thing. But how much more should the Greeks think so, that were thought to be the noblest Nation under heaven, and had such large dominions: yet now obey the Roman Governours? as also the Macedonians do, who have greater cause than you to seek their liberty? What shall I say of the five hundred Cities of Asia? do they

B not all obey one ruler, and the authority of one Consul, without any garriſon? What shall I speak of the Enochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Hellespont, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times past had no masters, no, not of their own Nation, yet now three thousand Soldiers keep them in awe: and forty long Gallies keep peaceably those seas that were never sailed on before? What think you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and those of Pamphilia, Lydia and Cilicia, could say for their liberty, who notwithstanding peaceably pay tribute to the Romans? What of the Thracians, whose country is five days journey in breadth, and seven in length, far more inaccessible and stronger than yours, by reason of the mountains of Snow and Ice? yet do they obey two thousand Romans, who are in garriſon? Beside them the Ilyrians, whose country reacheth to Dalmatia and Ister, are kept in obedience only by two Legions, with help of whom they also resist the Dacians. The Dalmatians themselves, who have so often attempted their own liberty, and still as their wealth increased rebelled, are now in peace under one Legion of the Romans. Nay, if any have reason to rebel, 'tis the Gauls, whose country is by nature strong, being on the East-side compassed with the Alpes, on the North of France, with the River of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenean mountains, on the West with the Ocean. Notwithstanding, having amongst them three hundred and five Nations, and as it were the very fountain of plenty of all sort of goods and commodities wherewith they enrich the whole World: yet do they pay tribute to the Romans, and account that their happiness depends upon that of the Romans: and that neither for want of

C courage in them or their ancestors, who fourscore years long fought for their liberty. They could not see without astonishment, that the valour of the Romans was attended with such success that they gained more by fortune, than they did by courage in all their wars. Yet now they obey a thousand and two hundred Soldiers, having almost against every Soldier a City.

Neither could the Spaniards, though Gold grew in their Country, keep themselves from being subject to the Romans. Nor the Portugals and the Warlike Cantabrians, for all the distance of Sea and Land between them and Rome. The Ocean, whose waves beating against the shoar, terrifie the Inhabitants adjoining, could not stay them, but they passed it, and carried an Army beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and passed the tops of the Pyrenean

E Mountains, which reach to the Clouds, and so made all those people subject to them: And for all that they were so Warlike a Nation, and so far from Rome, the Romans have left only one Legion for Garriſon amongst them. Which of you hath not heard of the multitude of the Germans: whose Vertue, and mighty bodies, I think you have often seen, for in every Country the Romans have them for Captives: Tet they, whose Country is so large, having hearts far bigger than their bodies, and souls that contemn death, and are more cruel than brute beasts: yet are they now limited by the River Rhine, and kept in subjection by eight Legions of Romans: and those that were taken were made slaves, and the rest chose rather to save themselves by flight than fight. Moreover, you who have such confidence in the Walls of Jerusalem consider the Walls of Britain: which Country, though compassed

F with the Ocean, and almost as great as our whole World: the Romans failing to it, have conquered: and four Legions keep that so populous an Island. What shall I say more, when the Parthians, a most Warlike people: who lately reigned over so many Nations, and abound in so much Wealth, are now compelled to send Hostages to Rome: Nay, you may see all the Nobility of the East at Rome: where, with the Pretext of Peace, they shadow their Captivity. Almost all the Nations under the Sun tremble and dread the Roman puissance: and will you only war against them? Do you not consider what befell the Carthaginians, who boasted themselves of that great Hannibal, and were sprung from the Noble Race of the Phenicians: yet, at last, were destroyed by Scipio? Neither the Syreanians, who descended from the Lacedæmonians, nor all the Race of the Marmaridians, extending as far as the Deserts (which are very scarce of Waters), nor the Syries, nor the Nazomoniens, nor the Moors, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidians, have been able to resist the power of the Romans: who by force of Arms, have conquered that third part of the World

G

The Britains I subject to the Romans. The Parthians. The Carthaginians made subject by Scipio's hands. The Romans govern the Moors.

(the Nations whereof can hardly be numbered) which from the Sea Atlantick, and Hercules's Pillars, unto the Red Sea, containeth all Ethiopia, and innumerable Cities: Who, besides that, they pay so much Fruits and Corn to the Romans, as for eight months in every year, will keep and sustain all the people of Rome, do also pay Tribute; and moreover, assist them in any way they can, and never murmur at it, as you do: And there is only one Example left to keep them in obedience. But what should I need to tell you of Foreign Legions, to convince you of the Power of the Romans, seeing you may well understand it by what they have done in Egypt, your neighbour Country; which reaching to Ethiopia and Arabia the Happy, and bordering upon India, and having in it an infinite number of people, besides the Inhabitants of Alexandria (which is easy to be counted, by the Tribute paid of every person by the Poll) yet they disdain not to live under the Dominion of the Romans. Alexandria is both populous and very rich, in length thirty Furlongs, in breadth ten, and pays more Tribute in a month, than you do in a whole year; and, besides their money, finds all Rome with Corn four months in the year: And is on every side compassed about, either with a vast Wilderness, by which none can pass; or the fierce Sea, which is boundless; or with great and strong Rivers; or muddy and dirty Quagmires, and Marshy-grounds: Yet all this little avails them to withstand the force of the Romans. For two Legions only placed in the City, keep all the great Country of Egypt, and the Nobility of Macedon in awe. Now, since all the inhabited World is subject to the Romans, what Associates will you have from some Country not inhabited, to aid you against the Romans? Except peradventure some of you hope for help from beyond Euphrates, and that your Country-men of Adiabena will help you: But they will not entangle themselves in these dangerous Wars, without reasonable cause; and if they would consent to so bad counsel, the Parthians will not suffer them: For they are careful to maintain their League with the Romans; and would think it violated, if any under their Dominions should war against them. It remaineth then, that you must only trust that God will help you; but you see God doth assist the Romans: For it is impossible that such an Empire should have been without the help of God. Besides, consider that although you were to war against far weaker than your selves, yet you could not promise to your selves favourable success; and it may so come to pass, that if you Religiously observe the custom of Sabbaths, and in them do nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your Ancestors found by experience with Pompey; who designed all his Enterprises for that day, wherein his enemies were idle, and made no resistance. But if in War ye transgress your Country laws, I know not then for what you should rebel. For truly, all of you, at this time, are of that mind, that you take Arms to maintain your Country Laws. And I pray you, how will you request help at God's hands, if wilfully you break his Laws? All that begin War, either trust in Humane Riches, or Divine Succour: and they that war, having no probability to hope for any of those, wilfully lead themselves into open destruction. But if you cannot resist the passion which transports you, let every man with his own hand, butcher his Wife and Children, and consume this goodly Country with fire; for so you shall gain this, not to abide the shame of a Conquest. It is good, O Friends, it is good, whilst yet the Ship is in the Haven, to fore-see and provide for future Tempests; and not, whilst they begin to fear, when you are amidst the Waves and Surges of the Sea. They who fall into misery not fore-seen, are worthy to receive compassion; but they that run into wilful calamity, deserve no pity, but reproach. Unless perhaps ye think that the Romans will fight with you, on certain conditions; and that if they overcome you, they will not use you hardly, nor fire and destroy this Sacred City, and all the whole Nation, as they have done others. If ye be overcome, whose escape hath unskilled, can have no place of refuge; for all Nations either are already subject to the Romans, or fear that they shall be shortly. So that not only you shall be in danger, but also all Cities wherein any Jews remain. For there is no Nation nor people in the whole World, among whom some of your Country-men are not, who all shall be most cruelly put to death, if you rebel: And for the wicked counsel of a few men, all Cities shall flow with the blood of the Jews; and no man shall be punished for killing Jews, because of your offence. But if you think the Romans will not execute all this Outrage after your Rebellion, then consider how impious a thing it is, to rebel against so mild Governours. Take compassion, if not of your Children and Wives, yet, at the least, of this City, which is the Mother-city of all your Nation. Have some regard to these Holy Walls, and the Sanctuary, and your Holy Laws: Assure your selves, that if the Romans again overcome you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more grateful unto them, for preserving them before. I protest before God, your Holy Temple, and all the Angels of Heaven, and our whole Country, that I have kept back no counsel which I think profitable for you. Now, if you consider those things which are profitable for you, ye shall live with me in peace: But if you follow your private passions, I will not be partaker of the miseries and dangers you thrust your selves into. King Agrippa thus ended his discourse, which his

A Sister Bernice, standing by him, accompanied with her tears: And these reasons and testimonies of affection touched the hearts of the people; so that their fury being somewhat allayed, they cried out, that they meant not to take Arms against the Romans and Caesar; but against Florus, for the injuries he had done them. To this, Agrippa answered; But your deeds shew that you mean War against the Romans; for you have not paid your Tribute to Caesar, and you have beat down the Gallery which joins the Temple to the Castle of Antonia: But if you would stop your Rebellion, repair with speed the Gallery, and pay your Tribute; for this Fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the Money. Herewith the people were content; and ascending into the Temple with Agrippa and Bernice, they began to re-edify the Gallery; and the Officers went about and gathered the Tribute in every Village, and quickly brought forty Talents (for so much money was behind.) And thus Agrippa stilled the beginning of the War. After this, he began to persuade the people to obey Florus, till such time as another were sent to supply his place. Herewith the multitude was so moved, that they contumeliously reviled the King, and threw stones at him, and drove him out of the City. The King seeing that their Sedition would not be quieted, complaining of the injury done to him, he sent some persons of the best rank to Florus, who was at Caesarea; that he might with chafe whom he would amongst them, to gather the Tribute thorough the whole Country. And so he departed into his own Kingdom.

Of the Rebellion which the Jews began against the Romans.

AT this time, some of the chief Incendiaries, assembled together, suddenly assaulted a Castle called Masfada, which they took by surprise, and killed all the Romans and in their places put a Guard of their own Company. In the Temple also, Eleazar, Son of the High Priest Ananias, a bold and desperate young man, Captain of the Soldiers; persuaded them who offered Sacrifices, not to offer any, but those that were given by Jews. And this was the ground and cause of the War that ensued: For they rejected those Sacrifices that were wont to be offered in the name of the Emperour. And although the High Priests, and People of Account, requested them not to omit that Custom of sacrificing for their Kings and Governours; yet they refused so to do, trusting greatly to their Faction: All those of the City that desired alteration, were of this mind, and especially Eleazar, who at that time was General, as is before said. Wherefore all the chief men, High Priests, and Principal of the Pharisees, assembled themselves; and perceiving into how great danger those Rebels brought the City, they determined to make trial of the courage of the seditious people: Wherefore, they assembled them together before the Brazen Gate, which was in the inner part of the Temple, towards the East. And first of all, they greatly complained of their rash and unadvised Rebellion, and that they sought to stir up so great a War against their Country; inveighing against the cause that moved them thereto, as being without reason: Telling them, that their Ancestors, for the most part, adorned the Temple with the Gifts of Gentiles, never refusing the Offerings of Strangers; and not only not refused their Offerings (for that were an impious fact,) but also placed in the Temple the Gifts that they sent, which were yet to be seen. And that it was strange, that now only they thought to provoke the Romans to War, by making new Laws: And besides other danger also, to make the City guilty of a great Crime in matter of Religion, as though it were such, wherein none might offer Sacrifice but Jews, nor any but they adore God. If we should make such a Law against any private person, he had just cause to accuse us of Inhumanity. But now the Romans are despised, and Caesar himself accounted prophane; and it was to be feared, that if the Jews disdained to accept of Caesar's Offerings, Caesar would hinder them from offering any: And the City of Jerusalem would presently be accounted as an enemy to the Empire, unless they presently accepted Caesar's Sacrifice; and before such time as they heard these news, against whom this outrage was attempted. Having thus spoken, they brought forth the most learned amongst the Priests, to recount from time to time how their Ancestors had always accepted of the Sacrifices of Strangers. But none of the Mutineers gave ear to any thing that was said, and the Levites came not to serve at the Altar, as now preparing for War. When the Nobility saw that they could not appease this Sedition, and that they themselves should first feel the Romans power, they devised all means to pacify the Tumult, and sent some Deputies to

Florus;

Florus 3; the chief whereof was Simon, the Son of Ananias 3; others also, were sent to Agrippa, of which the chief were Saul, Antipas and Costobarus (who were all a kinn to the King) requesting them both to come with an Army to the City, and suppress the Sedition which was raised, before it went further. Florus was glad of these tidings; and desiring nothing more than War, gave no answer to the Deputies. But Agrippa, willing to spare both parts, as well the Good as the Rebels; and to preserve Judea to the Romans, and the Temple to the Jews; thought it not meet for him to busy himself in such affairs, but sent three thousand Horse to aid the people against the Rebels; which Horse were of Auranitis, Batanea and Trachonitis; and he made Darius their Captain, and Philip, Son of Joachim, General of all the Army. These coming into the City, the Nobility, with the High Priests, and the rest of the people that desired Peace, received this succour in good part, and quartered them in the higher part of the City 3 for the Rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple. The War began instantly with Darts and Slings, and shooting of Arrows; and sometimes they encounter'd one another hand to hand. The Seditious were more valiant, but the King's Soldiers were more skilful in War, and chiefly endeavoured to get the Temple, and expel out of it those who thus profaned it. The Rebels, with Eleazar, endeavour'd, besides that which they had already, to get also into their hands the higher part of the City. Wherefore, during the space of seven days, there continued a great Conflict betwixt them, and either part kept what they had. When the Celebration of the Feast called Xylophoria was come, wherein every one carrieth Wood to the Temple, to keep a fire continually upon the Altar; the Rebels would not suffer their enemies to do their Devotion.

Now many of the Sicarii or Thieves, who carried short Poiniards under their Coats, went amongst the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practice. By which, those of the King's side were forced to leave the higher part of the City; which the Rebels presently entering, set the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa and Bernice, on fire; and forthwith went to the place where all Charters were kept, purposing there to burn all Bonds and Obligations of Debtors, thereby to defraud the Creditors; and so to joyne all the Debtors to their Faction, and stir up all the poor people against the rich. The Keepers of these publick Writings fleeing, the seditious persons fell all on fire: And so having destroyed those Records, which were in a manner the publick Estate of the City, they address'd themselves against such as refused their Proceedings. Some of the High Priests and Nobles hid themselves in Vaults; others fleeing with the King's Soldiers into the higher Palace, locked up the doors after them; amongst whom was Ananias the High Priest, and Exechias his Brother, and they who (as is before spoken) were sent Deputies to Agrippa: And so the Seditious were satisfied that day with the Victory, and firing of the houses aforesaid.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of August, they assaulted the Castle Antonia; having besieged it two days, they took all that guarded it and killed them, and placed in it a Garrison of their own company. This done, they went to the King's Palace, whither Agrippa's Soldiers were fled; and dividing their Company into four parts, they began to pull down the Walls; none of them that were within durst come out for fear of the multitude, but went up to the Towers of the Palace, and killed all those that offered to come up, and many of the Thieves under the Walls, with things that they cast down. This Conflict continued day and night, for the Rebels thought that those within could not hold out long for want of Victuals; and they within thought that the Seditious being wearied, would soon give over. In the mean season, one Manabem, the Son of Judas of Galilee (that most crafty subtil Sophister, who reproached the Jews in Cyrenius's time for paying Tribute, and for being subject to any but to God) taking with him certain Nobles, went to Masfada, where King Herod's Army was; and breaking into it, he armed the common people, and the other Thieves; and having them for his Guard, he returned again to Jerusalem as King: And being thus made Head of the Rebellion, he prepared the Battery against the King's Palace. But they wanted Engines, and could not openly undermine the Walls, by reason of the enemies, who continually cast down Darts upon them. Wherefore they began a Mine a great way off, till it came under one of the Towers, which then they supported with Posts of wood; and they set fire on the Wood supporting it, and went their way; so the Supporters being consumed with fire, the Tower presently fell down. But those within, foreseeing their Adversaries intent, perhaps by the shaking of the Tower; had built a Wall behind it, to keep out the Rebels, between them and it. The Seditious verily thinking that with the fall of the Tower they should be Victors, when they saw another Wall, were amazed. Yet the besieged sent to Manabem and others, that were chief

A chief of the Rebels, requesting them to give them licence to depart; which Manabem only granted to the King's Soldiers, and to the Jews; who, presently accepting thereof, departed, and so left the Romans in great fear; for they were not able to resist so great a multitude, and they thought it a shame to entreat that they might depart; besides, that it was dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore, leaving the lower place which was called Stratopodon, because it might easily be taken, they retired into the King's Towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phasaelus, the third Mariamne. The Rebels that were with Manabem brake presently in to the lower part that the Romans had forsaken, and killed all that they found there; and when they had sacked it, they set it on fire: And this was done the sixth day of September.

C H A P. XVIII.

Of the death of Ananias the High Priest, Manabem and the Roman Soldiers.

THe next day following, Ananias the High Priest was taken in one of the Water-conduits of the King's Palace, where he had hid himself, and was there killed with his Brother Exechias, by the Seditious: And the Rebels besieged all the Towers round about, and kept diligent watch, lest any of the Romans should escape. But Manabem, both upon his good success in destroying the strong Holds, and upon the death of Ananias, the High Priest, became so proud and insolent, that he thought none so capable as himself for Government; and became an intolerable Tyrant. Now Eleazar and some of his Companions assembled together, said, that it would be shameful for them that had revolted from the Romans, only to recover their liberty, to receive for master one of their own Nation, who, although he were not so violent as Manabem, yet was so inferior to them. And if it were so, that it were expedient to have one Ruler over all the rest, Manabem ought to be the last that should be chosen to command them. Being thus agreed, they set upon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pomp, apparelled like a King, and having about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleazar his followers set upon Manabem, the people all took up stones to stone him, hoping that by his death the sedition would be extinguished. The guard of Manabem at first made some resistance; but when they perceived the whole multitude against them, every one shifted for himself as he could; and those that were taken were put to death, and they that escaped were afterwards sought for: only a few of them fled to Masfada, amongst whom was Eleazar, the son of Jairus, Manabem's kinsman, who afterward became a Tyrant there. But Manabem fled into a place called Ophias, where he hid himself; and being taken, he was drawn out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him all the chief ministers of his Tyranny, and particularly Abisalomon, who was his chief Officer. E And in this matter (as I have said) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to have some end of that sedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manabem, to the end to extinguish sedition, but to the intent to rob and plunder more freely.

The people indeed with many intreaties besought them to let the Romans alone, whom they besieged; but they were so much the more earnest against them: till being no longer able to make resistance, with the consent of Metilius their Captain, and some other of more Authority, they sent to Eleazar, requesting him to give them licence to depart with their lives, and leave their baggage to the Jews. He accepting their offer, sent to them Garon, the son of Nicodemus, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Judas the Son of Jonathan, to confirm the promise of their lives. Which done, Metilius led away the Soldiers: and whilst the Romans had their weapons, none of the Rebels durst attempt any of their treachery against them: but so soon as, according to covenant, they had laid down their shields and Swords, and so departed mistrusting nothing, Eleazar's Guard set upon them, and kill'd them; they neither made resistance, nor any entreaty for their lives; only put them in mind of their Promise and Oath. So they were all slain, save only Metilius; who, greatly entreating for his life, and promising that he would become a Jew in Religion, and be circumcised, they spared him. Though this was a small loss to the Romans, Law, are all because there were but a very few slain of their great, and almost infinite Army; yet it was easy to judge, that it would cause the Ruine and Captivity of the Jews.

When they saw themselves to have given sufficient cause of a War, and that the City was now so filled with iniquity, that the wrath of God hung over it; though there had been no fear of any harm to them by the Romans, yet the whole City mourned, and was sorrowful and desolate, lamenting as though they themselves should answer for the Seditious, for that murder which was committed on the Sabbath, when it is not lawful for the Jews to do even any good work.

C H A P. XIX.

Of the great Massacre of the Jews at Cæsarea, and in all Syria.

The Jews spoil the Villages, and burn the Cities of Syria.

AT the same hour, on the self-same day, it happened, as it were, by God's Providence, that the Inhabitants of Cæsarea massacred the Jews that dwelt among them; so that at one time above twenty thousand were slain, and not one Jew left alive in all Cæsarea: For those that escaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound to the people. After this Massacre done at Cæsarea, the whole Nation of the Jews was enraged: And dividing themselves into Companies, they wafted and destroyed in short time all the borders of Syria, and the Cities thereof; so to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Gerasa, Pella and Scythopolis: Also, they took by force Gadara, Hippou and Gaulanitis; pulling down some places, and firing others. From thence they marched towards Cedaja, a City of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaza and Cæsarea; and neither Sebast nor Acalon could resist them, but they also were consumed with fire. Likewise they destroyed Antbedon, with Gaza: And most places belonging to these Cities were sacked, to wit, the Fields and Villages; and a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these Towns. The Syrians made as great a Massacre of the Jews as this, among them; for all the Jews inhabiting among them were murdered, not only for an old grudge, but also, to render their own danger less, by diminishing the number of their enemies. By this means all Syria was in a most deplorable condition, and every City was exposed to the disorders and violences of two several Armies, each of which placed their safety in making a great Effusion of Blood: The days were spent in blood-shed, and the nights in fear, worse than death it self. For though they only pretended to destroy the Jews, yet were they drawn to suspect other Nations, that followed the Jews Religion; and because they were, as were, the Tyrians thought it not good to destroy them; but, on the other side, for their agreeing in Religion with the Jews, they were constrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before seemed modest, were now through Avarice incited to meddle in this Murder; so that every one took the Goods of them that were slain, and carried them to other places, as Conquerors. He was most renowned that had stolen most, or killed most. There might you see in several Cities, the dead bodies of all Ages unburied; old men, and children, and women, lying in most shameful manner, their secret parts being uncovered. Briefly, all the Country was filled with exceeding great calamity; and the fear of yet greater misery to come, was unspeakable.

All Syria full of miserable calamities.

Jews against Jews.

These were the Conflicts between the Jews and Strangers. But afterwards, making incursions upon the Borders of Scythopolis, the Jews there dwelling, became their enemies. For they conspiring with the Citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their own Commodity and Security before Kindred and Conlanguinity, joyned with the Gentiles against the Jews; and yet, for all that, they were suspected for their forwardness. For the Scythopolitans fearing that they would assault the City by night, and execute their revolving by their great misery, commanded all the Jews, that if they would help themselves truly to the Gentiles, they, with all their Children, should go into a Wood hard by. The Jews forthwith did as they were required, suspecting nothing; and the Scythopolitans were quiet for two days after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent forth Scouts to see what they were doing; who finding most of them asleep, they surprized them in a moment, and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thousand; and afterwards, took their Goods. Here I think it not amiss to speak of the death of Simon, who was the Son of Saul, whose Race was very Noble: He was a man of great courage, and strength of body, both which he used to the great hurt of his own Nation; for he daily killed many Jews who dwelt near Scythopolis, and often scattered divers Companies, and put whole Armies to flight; but at length he had an end worthy of his deeds, and the murder of his Country-men. For when the Scythopolitans had compassed the Wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Jews in every part thereof. Simon not drawing his Sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies; for he saw that it was bootless to strive against such a multitude. But pitifully crying out, I receive, O Scythopolitans, a worthy reward for that

The Scythopolitans kill thirteen thousand Jews.

Simon daily kills many of his Country-men in Scythopolis.

A that which I have done; who, to shew my fidelity towards you, have killed so many of mine own Country-men: And it is a just Plague, that a strange Nation should be false to us, who impiously forsake our own Brethren. I am not worthy to receive death from the hands of my enemies, and therefore I will kill my self with my own; and this death will be a sufficient Punishment for my Offence, and a full Argument of my magnanimity, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor injure me. When he had thus said, he beheld all his Family with compassion and rage mixt together, as his Wife and Children, and aged Parents. And first, taking his Father by the hair of the head, he stood upon him, and thrust him thorough; after him he killed his Mother, who was willing to die; after them his Wife and Children, every one of them as it were offering their bodies to the Sword, and desirous to prevent the enemies. When he had slain all his Kindred, himself remaining alive, he stretched forth his arm, that they might see what he would do; and thrust his Sword into his own body, up to the Hilt. A young man, who, for his magnanimity, and strength of body, was worthy to be pitied; yet he had a just and deserved end for uniting himself to Strangers against his own Country.

Simon kills his Parents, his Wife and Children, and at last himself.

Cruelties exercised against the Jews in divers other Cities, and particularly by Varus.

AFTER this so great a Massacre of the Jews at Scythopolis, other Cities also, where they inhabited, rose against them; and two thousand five hundred were slain at Acalon, and two thousand at Ptolemais; and the Tyrians killed divers, and put more in Prison: Likewise, they of Gadara and Hippou slew the most valiant, and those of least courage they cast into Prison. All the other Cities, who either feared or hated the Jews, rose up against them. Only they of Antioch, Sidon and Apamea, spared those that dwelt with them, and neither killed nor imprisoned any of them; perhaps they stood in no fear of them if they should have risen, because their City was so populous; yet I think they spared them only for pity sake, because they saw they were quiet, and not seditious. The Inhabitants, also, of Gerasa did no harm to the Jews among them; but when they desired to depart, they conducted them safely to the end of their Borders. In the Kingdom, also, of Agrippa much cruelty was shewed against the Jews; for he being gone to Cælius Gallus at Antioch, left the Rule of his Country to one of his Friends named Varus, Kinsman to King Sobemus; to whom there came seventy of the chief Nobility of the Country of Batanea, requesting a Garrison to repress those that should attempt Rebellion amongst them. Varus, instead of receiving them well, sent certain of the King's Soldiers by night, and killed them all as they were coming to him. He committed this Murder without Agrippa's consent, only for Avarice. But being emboldened by this Fact, he ruined the whole Realm; E still continuing such Cruelties and Violences against his Nation, till such time as Agrippa understood thereof; who, for Sobemus's sake, durst not put him to death; but dispossessed him of his place. In the mean while the Revoltors took the Castle of Cyprus, which is situate above Jericho; and after they had killed the Garrison, they destroyed the Fortrefs. At the same time a multitude of Jews laid Siege before the Castle of Macheron, and persuaded the Soldiers left in Garrison, to yield the Castle; who, fearing that if they denied, they should be compelled thereto, delivered it to them, upon condition, that they might quietly depart: Which done, the Jews placed a strong Garrison in it.

Fifty thousand Jews slain at Alexandria.

THE Citizens of Alexandria had always a quarrel against the Jews that lived with them, since the time that Alexander the Great, for their help against the Egyptians, permitted them to inhabit Alexandria, and to have the same Privileges with the Grecians. This Honour and Privilege was also continued to them by the Successors of Alexander; who also gave them a certain place in the City to dwell in, that they might live more commodiously, and not be mingled with the Gentiles: And permitted them also to call themselves Macedonians. Afterwards, when Egypt was brought under the rule of the Romans, neither Cæsar, nor the following Emperors, diminished the

the Jews Privileges which Alexander had given them. But there were daily contests H between them and the Greeks; and although the Judges on both parts still punished those that were in fault, yet the Sedition more and more encreased; and though all Cities else were filled with Troubles, yet here the Tumult was most vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people, to determine of an Embassy to Nero, certain Jews mingled themselves amongst the Greeks, and so went into the Amphitheatre: Who being espied by their Adversaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Jews were enemies, and came as Spies; and so they laid violent hands upon them. Some of them fled, only three of them were taken by the Greeks, whom they drew to a place to burn them alive. All the Jews of the City came to succour them; and first they threw stones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ran in a rage into the Amphitheatre, and threatened to burn all the people there assembled; which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander, Governour of the City, had not appeased their fury; who did not at first use Force of Arms against them, but sent some of their chief men to persuade them to cease, and not to incite the Roman Army against them. But the seditious Jews refused this advice, and mocked Tiberius: Who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two Legions of Romans, and five thousand other Soldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia; and gave them charge, not only to kill them, but also to fire their houses, and take their Goods. The Soldiers presently went into the place called Delta (where the Jews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, though not without a bloody Victory. For the Jews gathering themselves together, placed those amongst them that were best armed, in the Front, who held out for a long time: But when they began to flee, they were mangled like Beasts; some of them were killed in the field, some were burnt in their houses; the Romans first taking what they found, and sparing neither Infants nor Old men, but killing all Ages and Sexes. So that all that place flowed with blood, for there were slain fifty thousand Jews; and all the rest had been extinguished, had not Alexander (moved to compassion by their entreaties) commanded the Soldiers to leave off; who being obedient to him, presently departed: But the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from the Massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceived against the Jews; and with much ado, they were withheld from tyrannizing over the dead bodies. And this befel the Jews of Alexandria.

C H A P. XXII.

Of the Massacre of the Jews by Cestius Gallus.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestir himself, for as much as the Jews were now hated every where; and taking with him the twelfth Legion out of Antioch, two thousand chosen Foot, and four Companies of Horse, out of the other Legions, and with them the King's Forces that came to help him, to wit, two thousand Horsemen of Antioch, three thousand Foot all Bow-men, and three thousand Foot, sent by Agrippa, a thousand Horse, and four thousand which Sobemus brought, whereof the third part were Horse, the rest Foot, and for the most part Bow-men; he went towards Ptolemais. Many joyned themselves to them out of every City, who, though they were not so skilful in War as the Romans, yet their hatred was more than theirs. Agrippa himself was there with Cestius, commanding those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the Army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest City of Galilee, called also Andron, and parts the Borders of the Jews from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate of Inhabitants (who were fled into the Mountains) but full of Riches; N giving licence to the Soldiers to sack it, he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was not inferior to Tyre, or Sidon, or Beritum) and after spoiled all the Territories about it. When he had burnt all the Villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Berith, stayed still behind to get Booties: Which when the Jews understood, and that Cestius was departed, they took courage, and came and set upon them, and killed of them two thousand. Cestius departing from Ptolemais, went to Cesarea, and sent part of his Army before to Joppa; commanding them to keep the Town, if they could get it; and if the Town-men made any resistance, that then they should stay till he came with the rest of the Army. Some of them attacked it by Sea, some by Land; by which means they easily took it. The people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themselves to fight; but they were all killed with their Families. After the sack-

ing

A ing of the Town, they set it on fire. The slain were 3400. In like manner he sent part of his horsemen to Narbatena in the Toparchy near Samaria, who spoiled the Country, killed a great number of the inhabitants, rob'd and burnt the villages, and carried away much booty with them.

Of Cestius his Battel against Jerusalem.

He sent also Cesennius Gallus, General of the twelfth Legion, into Galilee, and gave him as many other Troops as he thought sufficient to conquer that nation. The strongest City of Galilee called Sephoris open'd the gates to them, and other Cities followed their example. They that were seditious and gave themselves to robbing, retired to the Mountain of Azamon which is situate in the midst of Galilee over against Sephoris: These Gallus went to attacke with his Army; and so long as they kept the higher part of the Mountain, they easily repelled the Romans, and killed above 200 of them: But when they saw the Romans had gain'd a higher place than that wherein they kept, they resisted no longer: for not being armed, they could not stand out, and if they should have fled, they could not have escaped the Horsemen; so that only a few who hid themselves in difficult places escaped, and above 2000 of them were slain. Gallus finding he had no more to do in Galilee, returned with his troops to Cesarea, and Cestius with his whole Army went to Antipatris: were understanding that a great company of Jews were gathered together in the Tower called Aphec, he sent some before to attacke them: but the Jews would not abide battel, and the Romans burnt their Tents and the Villages adjoining. Cestius going from thence to Lydda found the City desolate; for all the people were gone to Jerusalem, because of the Feast of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty persons whom he found there, he fired the Town, and went by Bethoron to Gabaon, which is but fifty furlongs distant from Jerusalem. When the Jews saw the War draw near to capital City, they left their solemnity, and run to their arms: and having got together a great multitude, they went to fight with the Romans, observing no order, nor regarding the Sabbath, which formerly they held in so great estimation: and the same fury that made them leave their devotion, made them also victorious in the battel; for they assaulted the Romans with such courage, that they brake their body, and killing all that resisted, pressed into the midst thereof: and if a fresh supply both of Horse and Foot had not come in time, all Cestius's Army had been in danger. There were slain five hundred and fifteen Romans, whereof four hundred were Foot, and the rest Horse; but of the Jews only two and twenty. The most valiant in this combat were Monobazus and Ceneleus, Kinsmen to Monobazus King of Adiabenas; and next to them Parades Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who had fled to the Jews from King Agrippa, whom he had lately served. But at length the Jews being repulsed, returned to Jerusalem; and Simon the Son of Gioras attacked the Romans, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and slew many of the Rearward, and took many Carts and much Baggage, which he brought into the City. Cestius staid three days in the Field, and the Jews kept the high places, observing which way he would go, with a purpose to set upon the Romans if they stir'd.

C H A P. XXIV.

Of the Siege of Jerusalem by Cestius, and of the Massacre.

Agrippa perceiving the Romans to be in great danger, because all the Mountains were covered with infinite numbers of Jews, he purposed to try, if with gentle words he could persuade them to desist from war; or if some refused, to receive those that were willing. Wherefore he sent unto them Borcens and Phabus, two of his Captains, whom they well knew, with charge to promise them pardon in the name of Cestius, and of the Romans, for all that they had already done, if they would lay down their Arms and return to their duty. But the Revolters fearing that all the multitude, in hope of safety would joyn with Agrippa, determined to kill these Deputies; and they slew Phabus before he spake a word; Borcens, being wounded, escaped. But the people were angry hereat, and with stones and clubs drave them into the Town that were the authors of this fact. Cestius perceiving them divided H among themselves, thought that he had now a fit opportunity to assault them, and so came upon them with his whole Army : and putting them to flight, he pursued them to Jerusalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, seven furlongs from the City, he did nothing against it for three days space ; perhaps hoping that they within would relent ; and in the mean time he sent a great many Soldiers into the Villages adjoining to fetch Corn. The fourth day, which was the thirteenth of October, he came against the City with his Army in battel array. The Jews were so surpriz'd and terrified to behold the Roman Discipline, that they forsook the outmost parts of the City, and retir'd into the Temple. Cestius passing Bethzeta, burnt Scenopolis, and the place called the new Market ; and coming to the higher part of the City, he took up his quarters near the King's Palace : and if at any time he had violently given the assault, he had taken the City, and ended the War. But Tyrannus Priscus General of the Foot, and many other Rulers and Captains of the Horse, being corrupted with money by Florus, hindred that his purpose ; whereby the War was prolonged, and a thousand Calamities befel the Jews. In the mean time many of the chiefest among the Jews, and Ananus the Son of Jonathas made an offer to Cestius to open the Gates to him : but either through anger or diffidence, he contemned the offer. The Rebels understanding this Treason, with stones constrained Ananus and his complices to throw themselves over the wall for their safety. Which done, they retired themselves to the Towers, from whence they beat back those that scaled the walls. The Romans for five days space assaulted the walls on every side, but all in vain ; and the sixth day, Cestius with many chosen Soldiers and Bowmen assaulted the Temple on the North-side. The Jews valiantly made resistance out of the Porches, and often repulsd the Romans, as they approach'd the Walls : yet at last by the multitude of their adversaries darts, they were forced to give back. Then the foremost of the Romans holding their shields over their heads, and leaning against the wall, they in the second rank also held their Shields against those in the first, and so in order until the last, thereby making a Tortoise, as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their shot and darts could do them no harm ; so that the Soldiers safely undermined the walls, and attempted to fire the Gates of the Temple.

The seditious were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City as if it would presently be taken. But the people were as glad of it as the Rebels were dismayed, and came to the Gates to open them to Cestius, as one who had well deserved at their hands. And truly if he had but a little longer continued the siege, he had taken the City. But I think that God being angry with these wicked persons, would not suffer the War to be ended at that time. For Cestius neither regarding the good will of the people, nor the desperation of the Rebels, removed his Army from thence ; and having received no loss, very unadvisedly departed from the City : at whose unlooked for flight, the Rebels took heart ; and making after him, they killed some Horse and foot of his Rear. Cestius quarter'd that day in the Camp which he had fortified near Scopion. The next day he went further into the Country, whereby he more encouraged the Rebels ; who following, killed many of his Rere, because the place thorough which the Romans march'd was narrow, the Jews assaulted them on the flank, and the last durst not cast any darts against them who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them ; and they were not able to resist them that assaulted them on each side, being heavy arm'd and not daring to break their order ; whilst on the contrary the Jews were active and light : so that the Romans endured much harm at the hands of their Enemies, and did them none. And thus were they beaten all the way long, and many of them killed ; amongst whom was Priscus Captain of the sixth Legion, and N Longinus the Tribune, and Emilius Jucundus Campmaster of a Regiment of Horse. And so with much ado, they came to Gabio ; where they first pitch'd their Tents, casting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Cestius staid there two days, doubtful what to do. The third day he perceived his enemies increased, and all places about filled with Jews : whereby he saw that his flow-ness was to his disadvantage, and the number of his enemies would still increase, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flee speedily, he caus'd the Soldiers to call away all those things that might be a hindrance to them, and to kill their Mules and Ases, and Cattel, saving only those that carried munition ; fearing that if he should not destroy them, the Jews might make use of them against him ; and so he led his Army toward Bethoron. The Jews in large passages little molested his Army : but when they were to pass a strait, then they set upon those of the

A the Rere, and drove others down precipices, and all the army of the Jews were spread upon the eminent places, where the Romans were to pass, expecting to well come them with their Arrows. While the Roman Foot were in this extremity, the Horse were in greater danger ; for they could not keep their ranks for the multitude of darts and arrows ; neither could they get up to their enemies, the ascent to the top of the Mountains was so steep : and they were compell'd on each side with Rocks and deep Valleys, so that if any went out of the way he fell down and was killed ; and thus there was no way either to flee or to resist. In this desperation they fell to lamentations and outcries, which the Jews answered with shouts of joy, encouraging one another to play the men, being glad of their enemies adversity : and all the Army of Cestius had there perished, had not the night come on and helped them, which by the darkness gave leisure to the Romans to flee into Bethoron. In the mean while, the Jews kept all the places thereabouts besieged, and guarded the passages. Cestius seeing it not possible to march openly, thought best to flee, and chose almost 400 of his strongest Soldiers, and set them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they should cry as they did before, that the Jews might think that the whole Army was there, and so he with the rest of his Army marched quietly 30 Furlongs. In the morning, the Jews perceiving the Romans to be fled, assaulted the 400, by whom they were deceived, and presently killing them with Darts, they pursued Cestius : who having fled away in the night, made more haste the next day ; so that the Soldiers for fear, left their Arms and Instruments to beat down Walls, and Slings, and much other munition ; which the Jews taking, after used against them. Thus they followed the Romans to Antipatris : and seeing they could not overtake them they returned, bringing with them the warlike Instruments, and rifling those that were slain, and taking whatsoever the Romans had left behind ; and so singing Songs of Victory, they returned to Jerusalem, having lost very few of their company, and slain 5380 of the Roman Foot and their Auxiliaries ; and 980 Horse. And this was done upon the eighth day of October, and in the twelfth year of the Reign of Nero.

C H A P. XXV.

Of the Cruelty of those of Damascus against the Jews, and of Joseph's affairs in Galilee.

AFTER this ill success of Cestius, many of the chiefest among the Jews daily fled and forsook the City, as a ship presently ready to sink. Costobarus and Saul two Brethren, and Philip the Son of Joachim General of Agrippa's Army, retir'd themselves to Cestius. As for Antipas, who was also besieged by them in the Kings Palace, he would not flee with the rest, and so was killed by the Rebels. But Cestius sent Saul and the rest of his Company into Achaia unto Nero, to inform him of the cause of his retreat, and to shew how Florus had caus'd all these wars : for so he hoped that Nero would turn his anger against Florus, and free him from danger. Then the people of Damascus understanding the defeat of the Romans, devised how to destroy the Jews which inhabited amongst them : and they thought it was easy to be accomplished, for that the Jews were already assembled in the common places of exercise, for fear of some such matter : yet they mistrust'd their own Wives, who all, except a few, were Jews in Religion. Wherefore they took great heed to conceal their intent from them ; and so assaulting the Jews in a narrow place and unarmed, they put them all to the sword, to the number of ten thousand. After the Rebels that had pursued Cestius were returned to Jerusalem, they laboured to joyn all to them that favoured the Romans, either by force or by flattery ; and assembling themselves in the Temple, they determined to chuse a great number of Captains to carry on the War. Joseph the Son of Corion, and Ananus the high Priest, were appointed Rulers high Priest, of the City, and especially to see the Walls thereof repaired. Eleazar the Son of Simon was put into no authority, notwithstanding that he had in his custody great prey and spoil taken from the Romans, and Cestius his money, and a great part of the publick treasure ; because they perceived he aspir'd to a Tyranny, and had his greatest Confidants about him as his Guards : yet in time Eleazar by money and craft persuaded the people to obey him in all things. They also chose other Captains, to be sent into Idumea, who were Jesus the Son of Sapphus, and Eleazar the Son of the new high Priest ; and they commanded Niger who was born beyond Jordan to obey these Captains, who was therefore called Peraiter, and was then Governour of Idumea, they neglected not to do the like by other Regions : for Joseph the Son of Simon was sent

The Damascenes kill 10000 Jews in one hour. Joseph the Son of Corion, and Ananus the high Priest, were appointed Rulers high Priest, of the City, and especially to see the Walls thereof repaired. They also chose other Captains, to be sent into Idumea, who were Jesus the Son of Sapphus, and Eleazar the Son of the new high Priest ; and they commanded Niger who was born beyond Jordan to obey these Captains, who was therefore called Peraiter, and was then Governour of Idumea, they neglected not to do the like by other Regions : for Joseph the Son of Simon was sent sent to Jericho, and Manasses beyond the River, and John the Elfean to Tamna, every one to assume the Government of his Country as a Toparchy. Lydda, Joppe and Amas were annexed to John the Elfean, and John the Son of Ananias was appointed Governour of Gophnitis and Acrabatena. Joseph the Son of Matthias was made Ruler over both Galilee, unto which was joyned Gamala the strongest City in all that Country.

Each of these Governors discharged his place according to his wisdom and dexterity. When Joseph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his first care was to get the good will of the Inhabitants; knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he should offend: considering that he should have the most considerable persons his friends, if he made them partakers of his Authority. He chose seventy of the most ancient wife men among them, and made them Rulers over all Galilee, and elected seven Judges over the lesser Towns to judge inferior matters: but he reserved all great affairs and Criminal Causes to his own hearing.

Moreover, having ordained a form of Justice that those seventy should follow, he took counsel how to provide for his security abroad. And being assured that the Romans would come into Galilee, he compassed those places with strong Walls that were fit for his purpose, to wit, Jotapata, Berjaba, Selamis, Perea, Japha and Sigoph, Ta-

Of Joseph's danger and escape; and of the malice of John of Giscala.

While Joseph thus ordered the Estate of Galilee, there arose a Traytor born in Gifcala, John the Son of Levies, a most subtil and deceitful man, who by wile means was now become the richest person in that Countrey, having before been very poor, and unable to put his Villanies in practice. He could live at his pleasure, and thought deceit a Virtue, which he used even towards his dearest friends; he was also a

B great Counterfeiter of Humanity; and yet for the hope of gain became a cruel Murtherer. He always aimed at high matters, with an aspiring mind, and at first nourished his hope with small Villanies. For first he was a Thief alone, and lived in Woods and solitary places; at last he got to him a company of audacious people like himself, at first small, but afterwards he greatly encreased it. He also had a great care to chuse no weak persons; but such as were strong of body, valiant of mind, and skilful in Martial Affairs: Of these he gathered four hundred, most of them out of Tyre, and the Villages thereof; and with them he waited all Galilee, and killed many of those whom the fear of War had driven thither. This man, long time before, had desired to be General of a formed Army, and aspired to greater matters, only the want

C of money hindered him: And perceiving that Joseph considered him as a servicable man, he perswaded him to suffer him to build the Walls of that place where he was born, and which was now desolate; and to accomplish this, he gathered great fumms of money of the richer sort. After which, having perswaded Joseph to give order to all the Jews that were dispersed over all Syria, that they should lend no Oyl to the neighbouring places, save only that which was made by their own Nation, he caused great quantities of Oyl to be brought to the Confines of Galilee, and buying four Barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted to four Attick Groats) he sold them again to the Syrian Jews; the half of one Barrel for as much as all four cost him. And for that Galilee abounded with Oyls, and especially at that time, he conveyed it to

D such places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himself. By this means he gathered an infinite mass of Money, which presently he returned to the prejudice of him who had given him licence to get it. And thinking that if he could depose Joseph, he might come to be Ruler over Galilee, he commanded his followers to rob and spoil more than they did before; and so to trouble the Countrey, that he might either kill the Governour treacherously, if he sought to redress it; or if he neglected it, to accuse him of slothfulness, and so make him odious to the people. Moreover, he had already given out speeches, that Joseph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans; and he devised many things to this effect, to work Joseph's Overthrow. It happened that at that time, some of the Village of Dabarita, who watched in the

E field, set upon Ptolomey, who was Steward to King Agrippa, and his Sister Bernice, and plundered all his Carriages, wherein was much costly Apparel, and many Silver Vessels, and six hundred pieces of Gold. And for that they could not carry this secretly, they brought all the whole Booty to Joseph, at Tarichea: who, reproving them for offering violence to the King's Servants, commanded the things to be kept at the house of Aeneas, who was one of the richest men in the Town, and should restore them to the owner when time served; wherein, thinking to do himself great good, he brought himself into much danger. For the Thieves being offended that they received no part thereof, and seeing that Joseph would restore to Agrippa and his Sister Bernice that which they had laboured for, they went round about the Villages in the

F night, and spread this false report in every place, that Joseph was a Traytor to his Countrey; and with the same rumour also, they filled the Cities thereof. So that early in the next morning, ten thousand men armed assembled themselves together in the Theatre at Tarichea: the greatest part of them cryed out in their fury, that the Traytor Joseph ought to be stoned, others that he ought to be burned; and John himself, with one Jesús the Son of Sapphira, who at that time was Magistrate in Tiberias, omitted nothing to animate the people yet more against him. All the Friends of Joseph, and his Guards, being terrified with such a multitude, fled, four only excepted. Joseph in the mean while was asleep; and had he slept a little longer, they had set his house on fire. The Tumult awakened him, and the four that remained with him, counselled him to flee: But he not dismayed for that he was left alone, nor that so great a multitude came against him, went boldly towards them with his Garment all torn, and Ashes upon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his Sword upon his neck. At this sight they that bare him good will, especially the people of Tarichea, H were moved to compassion; but the Country people, who thought he overlaid them with Taxes and Tributes, cursed him; and bad him bring forth the publick Treasure, and confests his Treason; for seeing him in this plight, they thought he would not deny any thing whereof he was accused; and that he came fo only to move them to compassion, in order to obtain pardon for his offence. This his humility stood him in good stead; for hereby those that before were enraged against him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalf, when he promised to confests the whole matter: And having obtained licence to speak, he said: I was never minded to send back that money to Agrippa, nor to keep it to my private use. For (God forbid) that I should ever hold him for my friend, who is your open Enemy; or that I should so seek my own profit, as thereby to damnifye you all. But (O ye Jews of Tarichea) for as much as I perceived that your City especially had great need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the Walls, and for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adjoining, who still gaped after this Prey and Wealsh that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get those spoils for you, to re-edifice your Walls. If ye mislike this, I will bring out the Treasure, and give it to be divided amongst you: But if you like thereof, then you are obliged to defend me.

This Speech of his well pleased the people of Tarichea, who gave him great Praises, and displeased them of Tiberias, so that they breathed out threatnings against him. Thus they both left Joseph, and contested one against another. Joseph now having many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almost forty thousand) spake more boldly to the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; telling them, that it was necessary to strengthen Tarichea with that present money, and that he would also provide to strengthen other Cities; and that they should not want money, if they would agree and conspire together against those from whom they might get it, and not offer violence to him, who could procure it for them. The multitude being thus deceived, though they were angry, yet departed: Yet two thousand of those that were animated against him, offered to set upon him: but he being already retired into his house, they there besieged him. Wherefore Joseph used another device likewise to repels L them: and getting to the top of the house, he beckned unto them with his hand, to keep silence; and then said, that he was ignorant what they requested at his hands; for he could not hear one for another, because their voices were confounded with their number; but if they would send some into the house to talk friendly with him, he would do whatsoever they requested. The Nobles and Magistrates hearing this, presently entred into the house; whom, when he had led into the innermost part of the house, and shut the doors, he caused to be beaten so long, till that their ribs appeared. The doors in the mean time being fast, the people stayed before the house, thinking that the cause of their long tarrying was to debate reasons to and fro: But presently Joseph opening the doors, put them forth amongst the people all bloody as they were; whereat they were so daunted, that leaving their Weapons behind them, M they ran away. Hereat John took occasion to encrease his hatred and jealousie against Joseph; and having ill success in this policy, he till attempted other plots to bring Joseph in danger. First he counterfeited himself sick, and requested Joseph to permit him to go to Tiberias, and use the hot Baths, in order to recover his health. Joseph, not having yet perceived his Treason, writ Letters in his behalf to the Governour of the Town, to provide John with good accommodation, and to let him want nothing that he needed. Two days after his arrival there, he went about the business which he delighted; and enticed some with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Joseph. Silar, whom Joseph had made Governour of the City, understanding this, presently by Letters gave notice thereof to Joseph; who receiving the same in the night, went to N Tiberias very early in the morning. All the people, except those that John had corrupted, went out to meet him: but John, notwithstanding he judged that he came against him, still counterfeited himself sick in bed, and sent a man of his acquaintance to excuse his absence for not coming to meet Joseph. Then Joseph assembled the Tiberians together in a place to speak to them, concerning that which was written to him: And John sent armed men thither with Commandment to kill Joseph. The people perceiving them to draw their Swords, cryed out; and Joseph at their cry looking about him, and perceiving their Swords even almost at his throat, he leaped down a little Hill upon the Shore, which was six cubits high, upon which he stood to speak to the people: And going into a boat with two of his Guard which he found there, he went O into the midst of the Lake; and presently his Guard taking their Weapons, assaulted the Traytors. Joseph fearing that a great conflict would ensue, and so the whole City, for

But those that inhabited about the City, and heard of the Treason, and by whom it was attempted, armed themselves and came against John; but he, before their coming, fled to Gisgala, where he was born. In the mean while, all Galilee came and joyned with Joseph; and there were many thousands of Armed men gathered together, affirming that they came against John, and to fire that City which had received him. Joseph thanked them for their good will, saying, that he had rather conquer his enemies by moderation, than by fire and Sword; and therefore requested them to B be content. He also published an Edict, wherein he declared, that all those that had rebelled with John, and did not forsake him within five days next following, should lose all their Estates, and their houses should be sacked and set on fire. Hereupon, three thousand presently forsook John, and came and laid down their weapons at Joseph's feet, prostrating themselves before him; so that there remained with John but two thousand fugitive Syrians. By whom being assisted, he again went secretly to work, having had so ill success by open dealing; and so he privily sent messengers to Jerusalem, to accuse Joseph that he had gathered a great Army, and that except he were quickly prevented, he would come and usurp Dominion over the Mother-city. But the people understanding before of John's hatred, did not regard it; yet divers C rich men and Magistrates who envied Joseph, secretly sent money to John, to hire Foreign Soldiers, that he might make War against Joseph; whom they determined amongst themselves to displace: And thinking that their order was not sufficient to effect it, they sent moreover two thousand five hundred men, and four of their Principal Nobility with them, to wit, Joazar the Lawyer, and Ananias the Saducee, and Simon and Judas, the Sons of Jonathan; all very eloquent men, and learned in our Laws, to withdraw the people's minds from Joseph; giving them charge, that if he of his own accord came to them, then they should permit him to speak for himself; but if he refused so to do, then they should hold him as an enemy. Joseph's Friends at Jerusalem gave him intelligence that an Army was coming against him, but for what cause D they knew not, because it was kept secret. And hereupon, before he could prevent it, four Cities revolted from him, to wit, Sephoris, Gamala, Gisgala and Tiberias, which nevertheless he soon after easily recovered, without Force of Arms: And having taken the four Captains and Counsellors of his enemies, he sent them to Jerusalem; against whom the people being incensed, would have killed them, and those that sent them, had they not fled in good time.

NOW John, for fear of Joseph, kept himself within the Walls of Gisgala; and a few days after Tiberias revolting again from Joseph, the Inhabitants called in Agrippa, covered by who came not at the day appointed, only a few Roman Horse shewed themselves. Joseph and Joseph understanding this at Tarichea; and having sent his Soldiers to fetch Corn, he thought not good to go alone against the Rebels; nor yet did he think it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whilst he delayed, King Agrippa would come and possess the Town; besides that, the next day being the Sabbath, he could do nothing. At length he resolved to overcome the Rebels by policy; and so he commanded the Gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his intent might not be revealed to them, of Tiberias. Then taking all the Boats that were in the Lake, in number two hundred and thirty, and in every one of them four Sailers, he speedily sailed to Tiberias: And when he came near the City, yet so far off, that the Inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he commanded all the Boats to stop, and the rowers to beat the water fill as if they were rowing; and taking only seven of his Guard with him, unarmed, he went near enough the City, that they might see him. When the Rebels perceived him, and thought that the Boats were full of Armed men, they threw down their Weapons, and held up their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the City. Joseph, with many threatening and bitter Speeches, reproached them first, that having undertaken War against the Romans, they with Civil Diffentions consumed their own G Forces: Secondly, that they had fought his life, from whom they ought to expect their safety; and that they were not ashamed to shut the Gates against him, who had built build the Walls; yet if any would come and talk with him, and give him assurance of their fidelity, he would not refuse them. So ten of the chiefest among them came to him, whom he carried away in a Fisher-boat far from the City, and he demanded fifty Senators, as though he required their promise also. And devising new Causes, he still under pretence of agreement sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the Boats: which done, he commanded all the Boatmen with all speed possible to go to Tarichea, and put them in Prison; so he carried away all the Council, which were in number six hundred, and 2000 more, all whom he brought to Tarichea. But they which remained in the City, cried with one voice that one Clitus was cause of the revolt, and therefore besought Joseph to punish him for all. Joseph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his Guard, called Levi, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himself amongst so many enemies, refused to do execution. Clitus perceiving that Joseph was angry, and ready to come out of his Boat to do it himself, besought him to grant him one of his hands; which Joseph did upon condition that he should cut off the other himself. So Clitus drawing out his Sword with his right hand, cut off his left. After this manner Joseph brought Tiberias again under his subjection. And within a few days after, he took Gisgala and Sephoris, which had revolted, having given the spoils thereof to his Soldiers; yet afterward he restored most that was taken away to the people; and the like he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias: by which means he got the good will of them all.

The troubled Estate of Jerusalem.

AFTER that these broils, which hitherto hapned only in Galilee, were ceased, they prepared themselves against the Romans. And the chief men of Jerusalem, and Ananus the high Priest, with all speed renewed and repaired the Walls, and made all sorts of Instruments for war, Arrows and other weapons; so that all the City was busied herein, and trained their men in warlike discipline. All places were filled with agitation and tumult; but the graver fort were very penfive, and many as it were foreseeing the calamity that after ensued, could not refrain from tears: they that desired peace, received no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck who were cause of all this War. And the Estate of the City, even then before the Romans came, was like a City to be destroyed. But Ananus neglected that which was necessary for War, and laboured to reconcile the seditious faction of those that were called Zelous: but how he was overcome, and what his end was, we will declare hereafter. In the mean time one Simon the Son of Gioras in the Topyarchy of Acrabaten, having gathered together a multitude of seditious people, robbed and spoiled every where; and he not only broke into rich mens houses, but also beat them grievously, openly exercising his Tyranny. But when Ananus and the restant army against him, he fled to his fellow-thieves of Masada, and there staid till Ananus and the rest of his Enemies were slain: and then he wasted Idumea with the rest; so that the Governours of that place were fain to put a Garrison in every Village: so great was the number of them that were slain by these Thieves. And thus stood the affairs of the Jews.

WHEN the Emperor Nero understood the ill success of his Armies against the Jews, he was seized with fear and astonishment; yet he dissembled it as much as necessity would permit him. In the mean-while he set a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, saying, That that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his General Cestius, than the valour of their Adversaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperor, not to shew himself moved with a little bad news; and that the greatness of his Empire ought to secure his mind from the apprehension of considerable misfortunes. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his spirit that he was much moved, and in great care to whom he should commit the charge of the East, which had rebelled; who might both reduce the Jews, and hinder the Inhabitants of other Countries from the like attempts. At last, he pitcht upon Vespasian, Nero's tenderest whom he thought only meet for that purpose; a man who from his Infancy had been trained up in War, even until he was gray-headed; who had appeased the people of the West, and helped them being troubled by the Germans, and recovered it for the Romans: as also he did Britain, which was unknown before; and for that cause made his Father Claudius triumph, without taking any pains for it. Nero considered all these things, and his prudence grounded on old Age and Experience; and that also he had Sons in the flower of their Age, to be pledges for his fidelity, who might assist their Father by their Courage. Wherefore God, as it should seem, even then disposing it so for the good of the whole Common-wealth, Nero sent him to govern the Armies in

Syria,

 Syria, greatly encouraging him with fair speeches and promises, as at that time need H required.

Accordingly Vespasian departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his Son to lead the fifth and sixth Legions from Alexandria; and he himself crossing over the Hellefpont, followed after by Land into Syria, where he assembled all the Roman forces, and all Auxiliaries of the Kings adjoining that were confederates. The Jews after Cestius unfortunate success, became proud of their Victory, and could not contain themselves; but like men incapable of moderation, they still gave more occasion of War: and gathering all their Forces together, they went to Ascalon, which is an old City seven hundred and twenty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, which the Jews had always hated, for which cause they also first assaulted it. The Commanders in this expedition, were three men excellent above the rest for Conduct and Valour, to wit, Niger of Parca, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Essen. Now the City of Ascalon had very strong Walls, but few men to defend it; for it had only one Company of Foot, and one Band of Horse, whom Antonius commanded. The Jews made such haste, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius persuading himself that they would assault him, caused his Horse to issue forth of the City: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his adversaries, he valiantly received the first assault of the Enemies, and beat them back that attempted to assault the Wall. So the Jews who were unskilful, having to do with them that were expert; and fighting on foot against Horsemen; without order, against those that were in good order; lightly armed, against their adversaries who were well provided; they were easily defeated. Indeed, they were more led by rage and fury than good Counsel; and they against whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their Leader. Wherefore their first ranks being broken, they were forced by the Horse to turn their backs; and retiring themselves to their own Company who turned toward the Wall, they became as it were Enemies to themselves. So that seeking to avoid the Horsemen, they were all dispersed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the Horse. This greatly helped the Romans to kill so many Jews: for they that fled were easily overtaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compassing divers of the Jews about, slew them with Darts, so that the Jews were in a great L desperation for all their great multitude, as if they had been alone. The Jews willing to overcome their misfortunes, were ashamed to flee, and so fled not hastily, in hope that Fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied with that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the most part of the day: so that there were slain of the Jews ten thousand, and two of their Leaders, John and Silas. The rest, whereof many were wounded, followed their General Niger, who fled into a little Town of Idumaea, named Salis: Of the Romans only some were wounded in that fight. Yet the Jews were not daunted with this misfortune; but the grief thereof much increased their Courage: neither were they dismayed with the former loss of so many men within so short time; but rather calling to mind the great Victory they had got before, they drew upon themselves another defeat. For before their mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their Forces, and went again to Ascalon in great number and fury, but with the same success and disadvantages in warlike affairs which they had before. For Antonius having notice which way they meant to come, placed an ambush in the way; and the Horse setting upon them at unawares, killed above eight thousand of them; before they could prepare themselves to fight: whereupon all the rest fled, and Niger with them, after he had given all the proofs that could be expected from a valiant man: and for that the Enemies pursued them, they fled into the Tower of a Town called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vain to stay about the Tower that was invincible, and yet loth to let the General of the Enemies escape, set fire on the Walls; and so departed triumphing with the thought that Niger had been burnt. But he leapt into a deep Vault in the Castle, and so escaped, and three days after he slewed himself unto his Souldiers, who fought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom against all expectation seeing alive, they were very glad, as though by Gods providence he had escaped to be still their Leader.

For he thought it would be a great help to him in the future War to have Sephoris on his side, the greatest City of Galilee, situate in a strong place, and which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole Country.

CHAP. II.

The Description of Galilee, Samaria, and Judaea.

The Description of Galilee, Samaria, and Judaea.
 There are two places named Galilee, one called high Galilee, and the other low Galilee: and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the West Ptolemais, with the limits of its Territory borders them, as also does Mount Carmel, which in time past belonged to Galilee, but now to the Tyrians. Unto which adjoyneth Gaza, which signifieth the Horsemen City: so called, because King Herod Horsemen were sent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joyneth to the Samaritanes and Seythopolitanes, as far as Jordan. On the East part it bordereth upon Hippene, Gadarias, and Gaulanitis, which are the Borders of King Agrippa's Country. On the North it bordereth upon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias to Zabulon; near which is Ptolemais by the Sea-Coast. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xalish, situate in a great Plain, to Bersabe, where also begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth to the Village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a Village near Jordan named Thella, to Meruth. And though of such bigness, and environed with so many Nations, yet they always resisted Foreign Forces. For the Galileans are from their Childhood Warlike, and never daunted by fear or penury; For their Country is most fruitful, and abounding with all manner of Trees, notwithstanding the Inhabitants take small pains in tilling the ground; and there is no waste ground.

The Description of the Country beyond the Flood.
 The Cities are many, and in every place there are Villages populous and rich; so that the least Village thereof, hath in it above 13000 inhabitants. And although Galilee be less in compass than the Region beyond the River, yet it is more populous, fertile and rich than that: For it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited; for there are many Deserts, and barren Places, unfit to bear fruits for the nourishment of Men. Peræa hath a good soil and large plain beset with divers trees, especially Olives, Vines, and Palm-trees: and it is abundantly water'd with Brooks running from the Mountains and Springs that continually stream forth during the greatest heats of Summer.

The Length of this place is from Mashoran to Pella; the Breadth from Philadelpia to Jordan. This Town Pella lieth on the North part, and Jordan on the West, and the Country of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the East Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelpia and Gerasa. Samaria is seated between Judea and Galilee, beginning at a Town called Ginea, and endeth in the Township of Acrahestena, nothing differing in nature from Judea. For both of them are full of Mountains and have rich plains and good for Tillage; full of Trees abounding with wild Apples and others; Though they are of their nature dry yet they have rain enough, and have many sweet waters, and abundance of good grats, and great store of milch-Beasts; and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. On the confines of these Countries stand Ananah, a Village otherwise called Boreus, which lieth on the North part of Judea. The South part of Judea, if you measure the length, extends to the Village of the Arabians, called Jordan: the breadth reacheth from Jordan to Toppe: in the midst thereof is situate Jerusalem; so that some call that City the navel of the Country. Judea also bordereth on the Sea-Coast, even unto Ptolemais. It is divided into eleven portions: the first is Jerusalem, Head and chief of all, and above all the rest, as the Head is above the Body: and the rest are Topharchies. Gophna is the second, after that Acrahestena, then Thamna, afterward Lydah; also Emmaus, Pella, Idumaea, Engadda, Herodism and Jericho; besides these, Gammia and Yappa command the places adjoining. Moreover, there is Gamala, Gaulanitis, Baranea, and Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to King Agrippa's Kingdom. This Country beginneth at Mount Libanus, and the Fountains of Jordan, and reacheth in breadth to the Lake near Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Julias to Arphas; and the Inhabitants are partly Jews, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How Aid was sent to the people of Sephoris; and of the military Discipline of the Romans.

The year of the World, 4331. after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

Vespasian sendeth help to the Sephorites, but fifteth Gallile with sword and fire

I Have spoken of Judea as briefly as might be, and with what Countries it is environed. Now Vespasian sent help to the Inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thousand Horse, and six thousand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Leader. The Horsemen divided themselves into two Companies, and lodged in a great Plain; and the Footmen were in Garrison in the City to defend it, as the Horsemen did without. These Horsemen made excursions one every side, and greatly molested Joseph although he committed no act of hostility; and also spoiled all that was without the City, and always repulsed the Inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themselves. Joseph seeing things in this posture assaulted the City Sephoris, in hope to take it; but before such time as it revolted unto the Romans, he had compassed it with so strong Walls, that the Romans themselves could not have taken it, and so his hope was frustrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yield to him. Hereat the Romans being angry, troubled the Country more than before: they now neither night nor day ceased from destroying it; but robbed and spoiled all they found; and all men able to bear Arms they slew, and made the rest their slaves. Thus all Gallilee was filled with fire and sword, and no man escaped that calamity; only those few of themselves, that fled into the Cities that Joseph had walled.

In the mean time Vitus came to Alexandria during Winter, sooner than he was expected; and so received there the Soldiers that he was sent for: and having a prosperous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his Father there, to two of the chiefest Legions, to wit, the fifth and tenth, he also adjoined that fifteenth Legion that he brought with him; and there followed them eighteen Companies; five out of Cæsarea; one Troop of Horse, and five Companies of Horse out of Syria: ten of these Companies of Foot had in every one of them a thousand Men, the rest only six hundred and thirteen, and in every Troop of Horse, were an hundred and twenty. The Princes that were Allies also brought great Aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, brought each of them two thousand Bowmen, and a thousand Horse; and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse; the most of his Foot were Archers, so that the whole Army, together with the Kings Aid, amounted to the number of three score thousand, Horse and Foot together; besides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and inferior to none but their Masters in warlike discipline: for one cannot too much admire the Romans, who so train up their servants in time of Peace, that they are very fit for War. So that whosoever well beholdeth their Military Discipline, he shall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by their valour: for they do not only then begin to use weapons when they come to fight, but they practise military discipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but always practise themselves therein without ceasing. Their exercises are like War it self, and every Soldier is every day inured to some sort of Weapon, even as though they were fighting against the enemy; so that hereby they easily endure the burthen and travel of War. For no disorder makes them forget what to do; neither doth fear dismay them, nor continuance of Fight and War weary and tire them. So that whosoever they fight against, who are not so well expert in these affairs as they, they always overcome them: and one may well call their exercises amongst themselves, conflicts without blood-shed; and their wars, conflicts with blood-shed. They are not easily overcome at unawares: for in what Enemy-countrysoever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their Camp about; which they do not rashly, nor pitch their Tents in marshy or high places after a disordered manner; for if the place be unequal, they make it plain. And they proportion their Camp four-square: for they have many Smiths, and all kind of Workmen needful, which still follow the Army, to perform such businesses. And in the innermost part of the Camp they make Quarters, whose outside resembleth a Wall, with Towers equally distant one from another, and between them Engines of War to cast Stones, and such-like, that all kind of shot may be in readines. They also build four Gates large and wide, both for their Horse easily to come in at, and also for themselves if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily. Within the camp, there are streets divided by certain spaces: in the middle lodge

A their Officers, and the Prætorium, or Generals Tent, is like a Temple; so that it seemeth a City, and a Market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seats built for the Chief Officers to judge of controversies, if any arise between the Soldiers and others. All this place, and all things belonging thereto, are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of such as work: and if need require, they compass it with a Trench four Cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the Soldiers enclosed with their Arms, live quietly in their Tents, without disorder; and all things are done with good advice and prudence, whether they need Water, or Corn, or Wood, they all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep at once; and a Trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded.

B. In the morning all the Soldiers come to their Captains to salute them, the Captains go to the Tribunes, and they all to the General, who gives them a Watch-word, and tells them what he thinks good, and how they shall behave themselves towards those that are under them; how in fight to demean themselves, and when to assault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the Camp, a Trumpet sounds and no man is idle, but at the first notice takes away his Tent, and makes all ready for departure. Then the Trumpet foundeth again, warning them to be ready; and having laden their Beasts with their baggage, they expect the sound again, as though they were to run a race; and at their departure they burn their Camp, because it is easy to build the like again; and also least afterwards it should advantage their Enemies. When the Trumpet hath sounded the third time, which is a sign to set forward, then they hasten those that are slow, lest they break their ranks. And a Herald standeth on the right hand of the General, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often answer that they are, holding up their right hands with courage: and so they march on orderly, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give Battel. The Footmen have a Head-piece, a Breast-plate, and a Sword on the left side, and on the right side a Dagger. The Footmen guarding the General, have a Javelin and a Shield. The rest are armed with Bucklers and Pikes. Moreover, they carry a Saw, a Basker, a Fardle, a Hatchet, a Cord, a Sythe, a Chain, and Victuals for three days: so that the Footmen are as much laden as the Cattel. The Horsemen carry at their right side a long Sword, in the left hand a Dart, and a long Shield hanging against the horse side, and a Quiver with three Darts, with broad edges, which are as big as the Spear; they have also Helmets and Breast-plates like the Footmen. The Generals Horsemen that guard his body, nothing differ from the rest. That company always leadeth, that the lot falleth unto. And these are the fashions of the Romans concerning their warlike discipline. They never do any thing unadvisedly in Battel, but manage all things according to counsel: so that they either do not err, or if they do, their fault is easily amended. For they think that bad success after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work by them some despite, by reason they did not deliberate: but that which is premeditated, although it have ill success, yet it maketh them wary against another time. And none of them account that good success, which comes by chance; and every one is comforted in their misfortune, if then they took good advice. By their military exercises they do not only make the Bodies of their Soldiers strong, but their minds also more courageous: and their diligence is the greater by their fear of punishment. For their Laws are capital, not only for them that forsake their order, but also for them that commit the least negligences; and their Generals are more severe then their Laws. Yet their Rewards of merit are so great, that they seem not cruel in punishing the faulty. Moreover, they are so obedient to their Rulers, that in Peace they honour them, and in War the whole Army seemeth one body united together: they keep such good order, and are so ready to turn here or there, and so attentive to any command, so diligent to note signs made unto them, and so quick to labour with their hands, that they are always apt to execute any thing, and patient to suffer labour. Inasmuch that no number of Enemies, no Rivers, Mountains, Forests, or difficult place, can hinder them from Victory; no not even the crossness of Fortune: for they think themselves unworthy the name of Romans, if they triumph not over her too. Therefore seeing their deeds are ruled by Advice and Counsel, and their Commandments so well executed by the Army, what marvel is it if their Empire in the East reach to Euphrates, in the West to the Ocean, in the South to Africk, in the North to Rhine and Danubius: seeing that one may justly affirm the possession less than the possessors. This I have spoken, not so much to praise the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrify those that desire alteration: and perhaps it may instruct them who want good Discipline,

How Placidus assaulted Jotapata, and was repell'd by the Jews.

Placidus draweth his forces against Jotapata, and being repulsed, flies.

IN the mean time Vespasian being at Ptolemais with his Son Titus, prepared all things necessary for his Army. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and run through it, where he slew almost all he had found, who were of the weaker sort of people incapable of resisting. And seeing that those of courage always fled into the Cities that Joseph had fortified, he turned his forces against Jotapata, which was the strongest I there, thinking it might easily be taken by a sudden assault, and that he thereby should get great glory and advantage; because the people seeing the strongest Cities surprized, would not fly to any again. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Jotapata understanding his coming, met him near the Town, and suddenly encountering the Romans, being a great multitude and well disposed to fight, as those that bore Arms for the general safety of the Country, and the lives of their Wives and Children, they put the Romans to flight, and wounded many, though only seven were slain; because the Romans in flying kept their ranks, and were well armed: but the Jews being unarmed, rather trusted to their Darts and Arrows, than come to handy K blows. There were three Jews slain, and a few wounded. And so Placidus when he saw himself repulsed from the Town, abandon'd the Enterprize.

CHAP. V.

How Vespasian invaded Galilee, and how at the very sight of him the Seditious fled.

Vespasian directeth the Romans march.

Vespasian desirous to master Galilee himself, departed from Ptolemais, making such journeys as the Romans are wont to. And he commanded his Auxiliary Troops, because they were lighter armed, to go before and repress the enemies incursions, and search the Woods and Forests fit for Ambushes, whereby they were to pass. After them followed part of the Romans Foot and Horse: and ten commanded out of every Company, with their Arms and all things necessary to make a Camp. After them followed the Pioneers, whose office it was to mend the Ways, where they were bad, and to cut down the Woods that were in the way, lest by bad way the Army should be retarded. After them he sent his baggage, and the baggage of the Officers under him, with Horsemen to guard it. And after them he himself followed, leading an Army of choice Foot and Horse: And accompanied with his own Guard of Horse. For he had out of every Legion six score men for his guard. Next followed those that carried the Engines to batter the Walls of Cities, and other Instruments, with the Prefects and Tribunes. Guarded with Choice Souldiers. After them the Imperial Eagle, which the Romans have chosen for their Standard, because it is the King of all Birds, and is most valiant and strong; wherefore they think it a sign of Dominion and Victory over all them against whom they bear it. After these sacred Ensigns followed the Trumpets sounding in warlike manner; and after them the Body of the Army, marching six in a rank, and as the custom is, with Centurions, by them to keep order. The Servants of each Legion accompanied the baggage. The last Company were Victuallers, Handicrafts-men, and other mercenary people, guarded by Foot and Horse in great number. Thus Vespasian with his whole Army came to the borders of Galilee, and there pitched his Camp. He might have passed on, but he thought fit by the sight of his Army to terrify his enemies, and give them time to repent, if any one would alter his mind before the War began. Yet in the mean time, he prepared all things necessary for a siege. The only Rumor of his coming made many Rebels faint-hearted. For Joseph's Souldiers, who had pitched his Tents a little from Sepphoris, when they knew that the enemy approach'd, and that they were presently to fight with the Romans, they fled not only before they fought, but also before they saw them. Joseph being left with a very few, and knowing that he was not able to abide his enemy, and that the Jews were dismayed, and that if he put any trust in them, they would for the most part revolt to the enemies; for that time abstained from battle, and thought to get himself out of Danger: and so accompanied with those that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

How Gadara was besieged and taken.

The year of the world, 4031.
after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

Vespasian went first to Gadara, and took it easily at the first assault: for all the able men and fit for War were fled out of the City. The Romans entering the place put all to death without mercy, partly for the hatred they had conceived against the Jews, and partly in revenge of that which had befallen Celsus. And they burnt the City, and all Towns and Villages adjoining: some of which were already desolate, and the inhabitants of the rest were made slaves. Joseph's presence in the City, which he had made choice of for his safeguard, filled it with fear. For the People of Tiberias thought he would never have fled if there had been any hope of withstanding the Romans: where- in they judged not amiss: for he foresaw what event the War would have, and that their safety consisted only in changing their rebellious minds. He himself, though he hoped to obtain pardon of the Romans, yet had much rather have died, then lived pleasantly with them against whom he was sent, and so become a Traytor to the Country committed to his charge. Wherefore he determined faithfully to write a true state of the Country to the Nobility at Jerusalem, and not to extol the enemies forces too much, lest they should say he was a Coward; nor yet put them in any comfort, lest perhaps now penitent for what they had done, they should by his Letters be incited to go forward in their rebellious course. He desired them presently to write an answer, whether they thought good to enter into League with the Romans; or, if they would make War, then they should send a sufficient Army against them: And having written to this effect, he presently sent men away to Jerusalem to carry the Letters.

Joseph is afraid of the Romans and writeth to Jerusalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Siege of Jotapata.

Vespasian was very desirous to take Jotapata, because he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and this was the strongest Refuge they had. So he sent before some Foot and Horse, with Pioneers to plain the ways, which were full of ragged stones, so that it was hard for Footmen to pass, and altogether unpossible for Horsemen. Within four dayes they effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the Army to pass. On the fifth day, which was the one and twentieth of March, Joseph before they came, entred into the City, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Jews who were dismayed. A certain run-away told Vespasian E that Joseph was come thither, and advised him to hasten thither; for if he could take Joseph, he might easily take all Judea. Hereat Vespasian was very glad, and took it as a good fortune that the most prudent and potent of his enemies, should (God so disposing) put himself as it were in hold. And so presently he sent Placidus before with a thousand Horsemen, and with him Eubulus, a man both valiant and prudent; and commanded them to invest the City on all sides, lest Joseph should privily escape from thence. The day after he himself followed with the whole Army, and about noon came to Jotapata, and leading his Army to the North side of the Town, he pitched his Tents upon a Hill seven stades distant from the City: purposely placing himself within the view of his Enemies, that the very sight of his Army might terrifie them: as it also did; for presently all were in such a fear, that none durst go out of the City. The Romans being wearied that day, would not assault the City: but they beset the Gates with two Squadrons of Horse; and a third, that consisted of Foot, was placed without to intercept all passages, that none of the Jews could pass any-whither. Hereupon the Jews now in desperation took heart; for in War nothing is more forcible then necessity. The next day began the Battery, and the Jews kept themselves in order, and resisted the Romans before their Walls. But when Vespasian sent all the Bowmen, and Slingers, and other Engineers to beat them off from the Walls, and he himself with Foot assaulted the Wall in another place where it might easily be entred: then Joseph, accompanied with all his Forces, issued out the Town, and assaulted the Romans fiercely, and drove them from the Walls with great courage: though they themselves suffered as much harm as they did to their Enemies. For as the Jews were were animated by desperation, so were the Romans with shame; their latter had Military knowledge and strength, and the Jews had despair and rage to encourage them. The fight continued all day even till night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteen slain: and of the Jews there were six hundred wounded, and seven-teen slain. The next day also they encountered the Romans, and resisted them more stoutly than before, taking courage that they the day before had resisted them contrary to their expectation. The Romans also fought more valiantly, ashamed as it were of themselves, in suffering the Jews to resist them; thinking withal that they themselves were overcome, if they did not quickly suppress their Enemies. Wherefore the Romans for five dayes together ceased not to assault the Town, and the Jews strongly repelled them; and neither the Jews feared their Enemies, nor the Romans were dismayed with the difficulty of taking the Town. Jotapata is almost all situate upon a Rock, and compassed about with deep Valleys, which descend straight down like a Wall, so that one can scarcely see the bottom without dazling. There is only one access to it on the North, where it is seated upon a declining Mountain; which Joseph enclosed with a Wall, to the end it might be no passage for the Enemies: all the rest of the City is environed with high Mountains, so that it cannot be discerned by any before they behard by it, such was the strength of Jotapata.

Vespasian determined both to combat the nature of the place, and the hardiness of the Jews; and therefore called all his Captains together, and consulted with them to begin a hot siege: at last they resolved to rear a Mount in that place where the City was easiest to be entered. He sent his whole Army to provide wood to do it, who cut much on the Mountains near the Town: and great store of wood and stone being brought, and having set hurdles before them to bear off the Darts and Arrows, he began to raise a Mount; so that they received little or no harm by Darts cast from off the Walls; whilst others brought earth from places thereabouts, and no man was idle. The Jews cast continually great stones, and all kind of Darts upon that which defended them; which though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noise and terrified the Workmen. Which Vespasian seeing, caused all Engines that cast stones and darts, which were in number an hundred and three score, to be placed against the Walls to beat the Jews from thence. And so they cast Stones, Darts, Fire and Arrows in great abundance: so that they not only beat the Jews from off the Walls, but also out of the reach of their shot; for both the Arabian Archers, and those that used Slings and Darts, and all the Engines continually played upon them. For all this the Jews resisted not, but running out in Companies, they pulled down the Sheds which defended the Workmen, and then assaulted them having no defence: and when they had beaten them away, destroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their own defence and safeguard. At last Vespasian perceived that these damages hapned, for that there was some space left between all these works, whereby the Enemies had access to do them such harms: Wherefore he united them together, and so hindred the excursions of the Jews. When the Mount was almost made, and the Towers upon it finished, E Joseph thund' to do nothing for the safeguard of the Town, called all workmen necessary together, and commanded them to build a Wall there higher than the Romans Work; but they said, it was impossible for them to work, for the number of Darts in that place. Then Joseph made this device to defend them: he fixed stakes in the ground, and fastened to them hides of Kine and Oxen new slain, by which they were defended from shot and fire; so that labouring night and day they raised the Wall twenty cubits high, erecting also upon it many Towers: and by this means they made it a strong defence. The Romans, who before thought themselves sure of the Town, were now greatly dismayed, both by this device of Joseph, and also by the hardiness of the Jews.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Siege of Jotapata by Vespasian, and the diligence that Joseph used; and how the Jews made Sallies against the Romans.

His Stratagem, and the Courage of the Jews, greatly moved Vespasian: for now they receiving courage from that defence, made assaults upon the Romans of their own accord, and every day skirmished, running out in Companies, and like Thieves taking away whatsoever they lighted upon; and what they could not carry away, they fired

A set on fire. At last, Vespasian would not permit his Soldiers to fight any longer, but determined to take it by Famine, and either to make them come and yield themselves for lack of Food, or if they held out, to famish them: conceiving that it would be more easie to take it by force, if ceasing a while from assaulting it, he afterwards set upon it when their Cafe was more desperate. Wherefore he commanded all passages to be kept, that none could go out of the City; but they had great store of Corn, and of all other things else, except Salt and Water, whereof they stood in great want: for there is never a Fountain in the City, and they have little rain in Summer, so that the Inhabitants were in great distress; for there was hardly any Water left in the City. Joseph perceiving there was abundance of all things else, and that the Citizens were valiant, as also the Siege like to continue long, he gave to every one water in measure, with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to have it in that manner; and now they began to faint, and refuse to labour. The Romans perceiving this, being upon a high hill, over against the place whither all the Jews came together to receive Water, they with their shot killed many that came thither, insomuch that Vespasian hoped that within short time their Water would be spent, and they constrained to yield. But Joseph to frustrate this hope, commanded a great many Josephs, Sta-Garments to be laid in water and hanged upon the Walls, so that the Water might run down on every side. When the Romans saw this they were much surpris'd, imagining that they would not waste so much Water in mockery, if they wanted Water to drink; wherefore Vespasian no longer hoping to win the City by Famine, purposed to assault it again by force. The Jews were very glad of this; and being in manifest danger, rather with't to be slain, than perish through hunger or thirst. Joseph devised also another way to get Water out of the Country. There was a little Valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romans; by this way Joseph sent men into the Country to his Friends, for such things as the City wanted, commanding them when they came near the Watchmen, to hide' and cover themselves with hairy Skins, that the Watchmen might think them to be Dogs; and thus he used a good while, till at last the Watchmen perceived it, and so set a guard there to stop the passage.
When Joseph perceived the City could not hold out long, and fearing his own Life if he still continued there, he consulted with the chief of his Officers, how he might flee.
But the People discovering his intent, flocked about him, and besought him to take pity upon them, and not forsake them, who had so hope but in him; as-firming, that for his sake they were all courageous and bold to fight, and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort to them, and that it did not become him to flee from his Enemies, nor forsake his Friends, nor, as it were, leap out of a Ship shaken with a Tempest, into which he came when the Seas were calm; for so by this means the City would soon be lost, and he once gone, no man afterward could or durst resist their Enemies, for in him was all their hope.

Joseph kept it to himself, that his purpose was to work his own safety: and told Joseph's Prudence. them, the thing which he intended was for their good; and that though he stayed still in the City, he could do them little good: and if the City should chance to be taken, then he and they were like to perish; but if he were abroad and not besieged, he could do them great service, for he would presently assemble all the People of Galilee, and come against the Romans, and so raise the Siege: whereas now staying with them, he saw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romans against them, making them more earnest to take the Town than they would be, only because he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that he were fled, they would not then be so earnest in the Siege. Joseph herewith could not persuade the people, but they flocked faster about him, and both young and old of all sorts came and prostrated themselves at his feet, weeping, and beseeching him to take such hap as should befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they envied his escape, but for that they hoped they should receive no harm if he remained with them.

Joseph considering with himself that if he stayed with them voluntarily, he granted their request, and if he denied, he feared they would force him; therefore being partly moved with compassion, he determined to stay: and being now, as all the City was desperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, seeing there was no hope of safety; and that it was a glorious thing to spend their lives honourably, and by some noble act to leave a remembrance unto their posterity of their Valour. And so issuing out of the City, with the most valiant among them, when he had killed the Watchmen, at the first encounter he came even to the Romans Tents, and tore the Skins that the Tents were made of, and fired others, and their Engines: and so he did the second and third day, and for certain days and nights afterward never ceased. When Vespasian perceived the Romans greatly endamaged by such Sallies, and very loth to fly for shame, and not able to follow them, being so loaden with their Armour, and that the Jews always did some exploit before they retired themselves into the City, he gave command to his Souldiers to leave the assault, and not to fight against men who desired to dy, because no men were more courageous than the desperate; and that if they found none to assail, their courage would soon be laid, like a flame of fire, when the matter that nourisheth it is consumed. That the Romans must seek victory more warily, for that they fought not for necessity, but only to increase their Dominions. After this, oftentimes they beat the Jews by the Arabian Archers, and with Slings and Darts, and others shot which never ceased. But so soon as they were without the danger of shot, they more furiously assailed the Romans, sparing neither Life nor Limb, but continually fought by turns, and every one of the City assited them that so laboured.

CHAP. IX.

How Vespasian battered the Walls of Jotapata with a Ram, and other Warlike Engines.

Vespasian thinking himself as it were besieged, both in regard of the long time which he had continued the Siege, and also of the divers sallies and excursions of the Jews; and having now almost raised the Rampiers as high as the Walls of the City, determined to batter them with a Ram. A Ram is a huge Beam like the Mast of a Ship, whose end is armed with strong massie Iron, and made in the form of a Rams-head; whence it takes its name, because it butteth Walls as a Ram butteth with his head. It hangeth on another Beam with Ropes, like the Beam of a pair of Ballances: the Beam it hangeth on lying across, is held up with two peeps, which being drawn back by force of many men, and then jointly with all their Forces shov'd forward, it striketh the Wall with the head of Iron: And there is no Wall nor Tower so strong, but though it abide the first stroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The General of the Romans thought good to use this means to take the City, by force, for that the Siege was dangerous, by reason that the Jews never rested, to which end the Romans with all kind of shot endeavoured to beat the Jews from off the Walls that made any resistance; and the Archers and they who used slings, were hard by: and when they saw that none of the Jews durst come upon the Walls, they applied the Ram to them; and covered it above with Hurdles and Skins, both for to defend themselves and the Engine. At the first stroke the Walls were shaken, so that the Citizens cried as though the Town had been already taken. Joseph seeing them still bear one place, and that presently the Wall would fall, devised a way to resist the force of the Ram, he filled sacks with chaff, and let them down off the Wall just against that place where the Ram struck ordinarily, and so brake the force of the blows, the looseness of the chaff made no resistance, but drowning or abating the violence of the stroke. By this invention the Romans were retarded: for whithersoever they brought the Ram, thither did they upon the walls also remove the Sacks of Chaff, and brake the force thereof; till at last the Romans also devised a way to cut the Sacks, by taking long Poles, and binding Sitches to the end of them, and so they cut these Sacks of Chaff. And the Ram shook the Wall, which being newly built was not strong enough to resist. Then Joseph and his Souldiers fought to help themselves by fire, and so they fired all that was made of dry wood in three several places; and withal the Engines, and Mounts of the Romans, who now had enough to defend themselves, because they were astonished at the valour of the Jews: every one having work enough to secure himself against the fire, which seizing upon dry matter with Brimstone and Pitch wonderfully increased, so that in one hours space, it consumed all the works that the Romans had made with so great labour. There was an action of a Jew one Samson of Eleazar, which deserves eternal memory: the man was born at Saab in Galilee. He took up a great stone, and cast it down with such force upon the Ram, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing leaped down amongst the midst of his Enemies, and brought the head away to the foot of the Wall, where being unarmed, and as it were a mark for his enemies to shoot at, he received in his body five Arrows; and as though he had not felt them, he got up the Wall again, where, that all might see him, he boldly stood still, till through grief of his wounds, having the head of the Ram in his arms, he fell down. Next to him two brethren of

A Ramath in Galilee shewed themselves valiant, named Netivas; and Philip, who assailed the tenth Legion of the Romans with such violence, that they broke their ranks, and put all to flight that endeavour'd to withstand them. At the same time Joseph and a good number with him, took fire and burnt the Engines, Works and Huts of the fifth and tenth Legions, and those that followed him destroyed all Engines, and other matter that was left. In the evening the Romans again erected the Ram against that part of the City which before they had beaten: and one of the Jews shot an Arrow from the Wall, and wounded Vespasian in the sole of the foot; yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the Arrow was spent before it came to him, having come a great way off.

B This fact greatly troubled the Romans, who seeing Vespasian bleed, presently spread the news through the whole Army, and almost all of them came running to see their General, and especially Titus, who feared his fathers danger. But Vespasian presently fired the Army from all perturbation, and his Son Titus from fear. For the dissembling grief of the wound, he shewed himself to all that were sorrowful for him, and incited them to fight against the Jews more earnestly than before. Whereupon every one as it were to revenge their General, despised all danger, and assaulted the Walls, exhorting one another. Joseph and his associates, notwithstanding many of them were killed with Shot, Darts and Arrows; yet forsook not the Walls, but with Fire and Sword, and Stones fiercely assaulted them, that being defended with Hurdles battered the Walls with the Ram: but to little purpose; for they were continually killed by their Enemies, because they could not see them: But their Fire made such a light, as though it had been day, so that the Romans easily perceived whither to direct their shot. And for that their Engines were not perceived afar off, the Jews could not defend themselves from the Arrows and Stones that were shot against them, by which means many of them were slain, and the tops and corners of the Towers beaten down. And many that were behind were slain by force of those stones; so that any man may know of what force that Engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that stood near Joseph upon the Wall, was struck with a Stone, and his head carried from his body by the violence of the blow three furlongs off, as though it had been cast out of a sling: and the next day a Woman great with Child was struck on the belly with one of those stones, and the Child carried forth of her from the place where she was struck three furlongs; so great was the force of this Engine. Thus the violence of the Engines was most terrible, and likewise the noise of Darts, Arrows and other shot. Many were slain on every side, and the bodies of those that were killed, being dashed against the Wall made a great noise: and within the City was heard a pitiful lamentation and weeping amongst the Women; and without a heavy mourning and cry of them that were wounded to death; and all that part of the Wall where the fight was, flowed with Blood: so that now the multitude of dead bodies had so filled the ditch before the Wall, that the Romans might easily pass over into the City; and the Mountains about Echo'd with the cries of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the Eye or Ear move terror. Thus many stoutly fighting for Jotapata died most valiantly; many also were fore wounded: and notwithstanding the Wall was continually battered, yet it was almost Morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ram. And then they of Jotapata repaired the breach with indefatigable labour, before the Romans could set up a Bridge to enter it.

The next day in the Morning Vespasian brought his Army to enter the breach, having given them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Jews that defended the breach, forsake their Station, before such time as he entered, he took the most valiant of his Horsemen, and unhorfed them, being armed from Head to Foot, and placed them in three ranks; that they being so armed, might besiege round that part of the Wall that was battered, having long Pikes in their hands, so that as soon as the Bridges were set, they might first enter the breach. upon the Mountain, to the end that none might escape. After the Footmen he commanded Archers to follow with their Arrows ready in their hands, and them that used slings also and other Engines for shot. And he caused others to scale the Walls, where they were not battered, to the intent that the Townsmen, busied in resisting them, might leave the breach unmanned; and the rest being wearied and oppressed with the thickness of the shot, might be forc'd to forsake their standing. But Joseph, perceiving his intent, placed the old Men and Children, and those that were already wearied, upon those parts of the Walls that were not battered: and himself with the stoutest of the City went to defend the breach, and he placed six men before them whom he chose out, himself being one of them to sustain the first brunt of the enemies assault: commanding them likewise to stop their Ears to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the Army, and to cover themselves with their shields against the Darts and Arrows; and give back a little, till such time as the Archers Quivers were emptied; and if so be that the Romans should offer to make bridges, then they employ all their courage to repel them: and now fight, not to defend but as it were to revenge their Country, being in a manner already lost; and make those feel the effects of their just fury, whose cruelty would doubtless after the taking of the place shed the blood of their Fathers, Children, and Wives: such were the orders which Joseph gave. In the mean time, the weaker multitude, Women and Children, seeing the City compassed about with three ranks of Horsemen, and the Romans with their Swords drawn pressing against the breach, and all the Mountains about shining with their enemies weapons, and the Arabians ready to let fly a Shower of Arrows: they cried out as though the City were already taken; so that a man would have judged them already under their Enemies Swords, and not only in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Joseph commanded the Women to their houses, lest their cries should dismay his Souldiers; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threaten them if they did not; and so he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot: He gave not much heed to them that fought to scale the Walls, but only minded what effect the terrible Storme of the Enemies Arrows would produce.

As soon as the Trumpets began to sound, the Air became obscured with the multitude of Arrows. Joseph's Companions remembering the charge given them, stopped their Ears, and cover'd their bodies against the shot of arrows. And as soon as the bridges were set against the Wall, presently they fell on; and before the Romans could enter upon them, they repell'd them back with great prowls and courage which the greatness of the danger did not abate but increase, so that they did not give one foot back, till either they kill'd or were killed. But the Jews had not any fresh men to second those that were tired; and the Romans, still as they were wearied sent fresh supplies and joyning together their long shields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall of defence invincible; and the whole Army like one body, beat back the Jews, and so set foot on the Walls. Joseph, in this desperate case devised a new way to repel this present danger: he commanded the Jews to fetch scalding Oyl, which M they had ready, and pour it upon the Romans, and also cast the Pans upon them. This device broke the body of the Romans so that through great pains they fell from the Wall: for the Scalding Oyl easily got between their Belts and Armour, and scorched them like fire, being easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the fumes. The Romans being laden with Helms and Breast-plates, could not retire so nimbly as was requisite: so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others died of the pain; others would fain have retired themselves, but could not, because their Enemies followed them so hard. But neither the Romans wanted virtue and valour in adverse fortune, nor the Jews prudence. For the Romans, notwithstanding they were in intolerable pain, being Scalded with hot Oyl, yet they freshly assaulted them that hurt them, desirous to shew their courage. Then the Jews used another device to make them retire: for they poured boyled Fenigreek upon the bridge, so that they slid down: and neither they that would have fled, nor they who strove to assault the Jews, could stand upon their feet, it was so slippery; and many falling down upon the bridge, were by their own Company trodden to death; others slid down upon the Rampier; and always as they fell, the Jews struck them: and when the Romans were retired from the place, so that now they were not forced to handy blowes, they had leisure to shoot Arrows and Darts against them. When Vespasian saw that his men in the fight endured much misery, towards evening he caused them to retire, many being slain, and more wounded, only six men of Jotapata were slain, but above 300 wounded: this fight was upon the 20. day of June. But after Vespasian had comforted his Souldiers for that

A that which had hapned, perceiving that they were enrag'd, and desired to fight to revenge themselves, so that they needed no exhortation; he raised the Rampier higher, and erected three Towers 30 foot high, covering them aloft with Iron, that so by reason of their weight they might stand steadfast, and not be consumed by fire; these he placed upon the Rampier, and in them Archers, and men that cast Darts and such like: who not being perceived of them that were upon the Walls by reason of the height of the Towers, and the covering thereof, easily wounded them who stood thereon. So the Jews when they could not avoid the Arrows, nor be revenged upon them whom they could not see, nor yet fire the Towers being covered with plates of Iron, forsok the Walls; yet they always encountered with them who sought to enter. Thus the people of Jotapata resisted, notwithstanding that many every day were slain, and that they did their Enemies no harm without great danger to themselves.

CHAP. XI.

How Japha was taken by Trajan and Titus.

A T this time Vespasian understood that Japha a City neer Jotapata, minded to rebel, encouraged thereunto for that they heard how they of Jotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he sent thither Trajan, Governour of the tenth Legion, and with him two thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse; who finding the Town able to resist, and the Inhabitants prepared for fight, and marched out to meet him, (for the Town being by situation strong enough, was also compassed with a double Wall) he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and in the pur-sute entred with them at the first Gate: which the Citizens perceiving, that the second Gate, not suffering their own Citizens to enter in, lest the Enemies also should rush in with them, as they had done into the first Gate. Truly, God gave this Victory unto the Romans; and his will it was, that most of the Valiant men of the City should D have their own Gates shut upon them, and so fall into their Enemies hands, who were most greedy to destroy them. Many of them came to the gates, and called those that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whilst they were kept out, were butchered like Sheep being inclosed between two Walls; their own Citizens having shut one Gate upon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus inclosed perished by their fellows Swords; and an infinite number by the rage of the Romans, having no courage to resist and revenge themselves. For the Inhumanity of their own Citizens, and terror of their Enemies together, utterly discourageed them; and so they died all, in number 12000; cursing not the Romans, but the Jews their own Country-men. Trajan, thinking that the City was now destitute of fighting men; or if any were within, that they durst not resist being thus terrified, reserved the taking of the City for the General, and sent Messengers to him, requesting him to send his son Titus to accomplish the Victory. Vespasian fearing that yet there would be some resistance, sent Titus with 500 Horse and 1000 Foot, who hastening thither, placed Trajan on the left side of the Town, and himself on the right: so the Romans on every side scaled the Walls; and the Galileans, having a while resisted, at length left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down, got into the City, and began a vehement fight with them that were assembled therein, some valiantly issuing out of the Narrow streets, and assaulting them, and the Women casting such things as they could get, upon the Romans, from the tops of their houses; and thus they held battel six hours. When their fighting men were all slain, then the Old Men and Children, and all the other Company both in the streets and in their houses were soon dispatch, that none of them were left alive, save only Infants, who with the Women were led Captives. The number of them that were slain, both in the City and in the first conflict, amounted to 15000, and the number of those that were led into Captivity, were 1130. This Massacre of the Galileans hapned the 25th

THE Samaritans also were partakers of the sad Effects of this bloody War. They assembled themselves together upon Mount Garizim, which they accounted a sacred place. But this Assembly gave cause to believe, that not warned by their neighbours harms, nor with any advice or judgement, considering their own infirmity, and the Romans power, they began to be tumultuous. Vespasian foreseeing this, thought good to prevent them: and although all the Region of Samarita had Roman Garifons in it, yet the great multitude assembled, made it reasonable to fear them. Wherefore he sent thither Cerealis, the Tribune of the fifth Legion, with six hundred Horse, and three thousand Foot. Cerealis thought it not the best way to go unto the Mountain, and attacke the whole multitude there, who were so numerous, but he commanded his Souldiers to beleaguer the Mountain about, at the Foot thereof, and to keep there all the day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritans wanted Water. It was then Summer, and the People had not provided themselves with Victuals, so that many, in one day only, for want of drink died of thirst: others preferring death before the misery they endured, fled to the Romans: of whom Cerealis learned that those that yet remained on the Mount, were even disheartened by the misery they endured. Wherefore he ascended the Mountain, and compassing about the Enemies with his Army, he first exhorted them to yield, and promised them all their lives if they would cast down their weapons: but nothing prevailing with them, he set upon them, and killed them all, in number 11600. This was done the 27th, day of June. These were the miseries that befel the Samaritans.

CHAP. XIII.

How Jotapata was Taken.

THE Citizens of Jotapata having endured this hard Siege, beyond all expectation, seven and forty dayes; the Romans Mounts were now raised higher than their Walls. On the same day one of the City fled to Vespasian, and told him in what case the City stood, and how few Citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were fast spent, so that they were not able to resist any more, and that they might be taken by policy if they were followed: for in the last part of the night, being weary, they ceased from their labour, and slept till the Morning: wherefore he persuaded Vespasian to assault them at that time. But Vespasian knowing how faithful the Jews were one unto another, and how they contemned all punishment, gave little credit to this Run-away: For a little before, one of Jotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confess or disclose the Estate of the City; the fire nothing moved him, and so at last he was crucified, laughing and scorning death. Yet a probable conjecture which he had, persuaded him to give some credit to this Traitors words: and for that he knew no great harm could befall him, if he so assaulted the City as the Traitor advised, he commanded the man to be kept, and put all his army in readines to assault the Town. At the hour appointed, he made towards the Wall with silence: Titus marched first, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus, a Tribune; and some choice men of the fifteenth Legion: who killing the Sentinels, entered into the City; and after them entered Sextus Cerealis and Placidus, with their Companies; so the Cattle was taken, and the Enemies were in the midst of the Town; and it was fair day-light, and yet the Townsmen knew nothing, being now fast asleep after their great labours and watchings: and they that watcht could see nothing, there was so thick a mist by chance that Morning, and the rest never wakened till Death was at their door, and that they perceived their Calamity and Destruction. The Romans mindful of all that had befallen them in the time of the siege, neither spared nor pitied any one: but driving the people out of the higher part of the City into the lower, they massacred them all. They that would have fought could not for the narrowness of the place; and so being cumberd for want of room, and sliding down the banks for haste, their

H their Enemies still pursuing them, they were easily slain. Many of Josephs Guard seeing that they could not fight, gathered themselves together in a corner of the City, and slew themselves that the Romans might not kill them. But some of the Watchmen, who first perceived the City to be taken, fled into a Tower, and resisted a while (this Tower was situate in the North-side of the City) and at last being invironed with their Enemies towards Evening yielded, and offered themselves to be slain. The Romans might have boasted that this Victory had been without blood-shed on their part, had not Antonius a Centurion been slain treacherously. For one of them who fled into the Caves (as many did) requested Antonius to give him his hand, in token that he might come out safe and without danger: which he doing unadvisedly, the Jew with a spear struck him in the flank, whereof he presently died. The Romans that day slew all the people that they found; and the days following they searcht all the secret places, and drew thofe out of the Caves and Dens that had fled thither, and slew all both Women and Infants: so that they took away a thousand and two hundred Captives; and the number of them who were slain during the siege, and at such time as the City was taken, amounted to fourty thousand. Vespasian commanded the City to be destroyed, and the Castles to be burnt. Thus Jotapata was taken the thirteenth year of Nero's Reign, on the first of July.

CHAP. XIV.

How Joseph was taken, and how he redeem'd his Life with Deeds and Words.

BUT especially, above all others, the Romans made diligent search for Joseph, both for the animosity they had against him, and also because Vespasian greatly desired to get him into his hands, conceiving he being taken, the greatest part of the War would then be ended; so they fought him among the dead, and amongst those that were hid; but he (fortune favouring him) when the City was taken, escaped from the midst of his Enemies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large Cave on the one side, which they above could not perceive) where he found fourty of the bravest of his liech hidden men, who had provision there for many days. There in the day-time he lay hid, and in the night he went forth to see if he could escape; but perceiving that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned again into the Cave, and lay there two days; the third day, a certain woman that had been with them in the Cave, discovered him. Then Vespasian sent two Tribunes to him, to promise him safety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanethus. But Joseph would not accept the offer, fearing that because he had been the Author of all the Evils that the Romans had endured, they fought him out to punish him; till Vespasian sent Joseph Nicamor, the third Tribune, one of Josephs acquaintance. Nicamor known to recounted to him how mild the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Generals rather admired him for his Virtue, than hated him. Moreover, that his General intended not to punish him, which if he pleased he might do, (whether he yielded himself or no) but to save him, being so valiant a man: adding also, that if Vespasian meant ill, he would never have employed his Friend in such a message, to use friendship (so noble a Virtue) to so evil a purpose as to work Treason; and that he, though Vespasian had been so minded, would never have consented to have betrayed his friend Joseph. For all Nicamor's words, he still hesitated, as unresolved what to do. Whereat the Roman Souldiers being angry, began to cast fire into the Cave: but Vespasian hindered them, being desirous to take Joseph alive. Nicamor ceased not to intreat him; and he perceiving how his Enemies began to be enraged, and calling to mind the dreams he had had, wherein God had fore-shew'd him all the Jews calamities, and what happy success should befall the Romans (for he could interpret dreams, and whatsoever God obscurely shewed, being instructed in the Holy Books of the Prophets, and himself a Priest, as his Parents were) being as it were now filled with the Spirit of God, and the Dreams and Visions coming into his mind, he prayed secretly to God after this manner: O great Creator of the Universe, Seeing if Joseph filled please thee to ruin the Nation of the Jews, and to send all good Fortune to the Romans, and if thou hast chosen me to foretell future events, I submit to thy will, and render my self to the Romans to save my life, protesting, that I mean not to go to them to play the Traitor to my Country.

 Country, but as thy Minister. And having thus spoken, he yielded himself to Nicanor. H
 But they who were in the Cave with Joseph, perceiving that he yielded himself to the Romans, flocked about him, and cried out, What is become of all our love for our Laws? Where are those generous Souls and true Jews, to whom God when he created them, inspired so great a contempt of Death? Art thou, O Joseph, so desirous to live, as to become a vile Bond slave? How soon hast thou forgotten thyself? How many hast thou persuaded to embrace death for the sake of their liberty? Truly, thou hast but a shadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou dost hope that they will save thy life, against whom thou hast so behaved thyself; or if they would save thee, to desire life at their hands. But seeing the Romans offer hath made thee forget thyself; yet we, to preserve the honour and credit of our Country, will lend thee our Arms and Swords; and so if thou be willing to die, die like the General of the Jews: which if thou refuse to do, thou shalt whether thou wilt or no, die like a Traitor to thy Country. When they had thus said, they all threatened to kill him with their Swords, if he yielded to the Romans.

Joseph fearing their violence, and being persuaded that if he died before he had revealed to his Nation the things which God had declared to him, he should fail in his duty to God, he had recourse to the reasons which he thought most likely to prevail, and spoke to this effect.

 Wherefore, O my Friends (said he) are you become murderers of your selves? Wherefore are ye so eager to divide things so united as the Soul and the Body are? If any man imagine that his mind is changed, the Romans know whether that be true or no. I confess it is a thing most honourable to die in War; not any way, but according to the Law of Arms, to wit, by the Conquerors hand. If I entreat the Romans to spare my life, then I am worthy to perish with mine own sword and hand: But if they think good to spare their Enemies, should we not think it good likewise to spare our selves? Truly, it is meer folly to do that to our selves, to avoid which we fight against them. I confess it is a commendable thing to die for liberty, but that is to die in fight, and by their hands only who took away that liberty: But now, neither do they war against us nor kill us. He is not only to be judged a Coward, who refuseth to die when need requireth, but he also who will die when no need is yet. Moreover, what with-holdeth us from offering our selves to the Romans? Truly, fear of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our selves, which we fear as the Romans hands? But some will say, if I they spare us, we are made Captives. I pray consider, what liberty we have now.

It is a poorly matter to die for liberty, but yet to die fighting.
 If it be said, that it is a part of courage to kill ones self; I maintain on the contrary, it is the part of a very Coward. For I think him to be a very timorous Sea-man, who perceiving a Tempest coming, seeketh the Ship wherein he is before it comes. Moreover, it is against the Law of Nature, and the Sentiments of all Creatures to kill our selves, and thereby we also commit a heinous crime against God. There is no living creature that of his own seeking would willingly die: For every one seeketh in himself the strong and forceable Law of Nature, whereby they desire to live: and for this cause we judge them our Enemies, that seek to take life from us, and punish them that take it: indeed: And do you not think it a great contempt for a man to despise life which is Gods gift? For we of him receive our first being, and from him let us expect our ending. The Body is mortal, framed of corruptible matter; but our Souls are immortal, and in some sort partake of the Nature of God: If any one abuse that which another putteth him in trust with, we think him a perfidious and wicked man: and God placed in shall we think that if we remove out of our Bodies that which God hath placed in the same, that he shall not know of it whom we have so abused? We hold those slaves worthy to be punished that run away from bad Masters: and shall not we then be held for impious, who flee from so good a Master as God is? Do ye not know that they, who according to the Law of Nature depart out of this Life, and render that to God which they received of him when he gave it requires it, shall leave behind them a perpetual Name to their Posterity and Family? And that unto those souls who are obedient to their Creator when he calls them, he gives a holy and sacred mansion in Heaven, from whence, after a revolution of the Heavens, they are again remanded to animate Bodies pure as themselves. And that on the contrary, they who cause their own death, go into dark hell: and that God punisheth this their offence upon all their posterity. Hence it is that our wise Law-maker forbiddeth it, who knew how God abhorreth this crime. For if any amongst us kill themselves it is decreed that till the Sun go down they shall be unburi'd, though we hold it lawful to bury before those that have been killed in War.

Other Nations cause their right-hand to be cut off, who have killed themselves: judging, that as the soul thereby was separated from the body, so the hand deserves to be separated from it. Wherefore, O Companions, think on that which is reasonable, and add not to your misery, O impiety against God who created us. If we desire to be saved, let us save our selves: for it it is no disgrace to receive our lives at their hands, who are witnesses of so many valiant deeds of ours. If we desire to die, let us die by their hands who have overcome us. I will not go into my world, as company to fly to their Enemies: for they fly to them to save their lives, but I go to them to cause mine own death. And I would to God that the Romans would break promise with me: for if they kill me after they have promised to save my life, I shall willingly die, and with great courage, seeing their breach of promise and perjury as a blessing to their late victory.

Joseph spoke more to this effect, to disuade his Companions from killing themselves: But they stopping their ears with desperation, wherewith they had armed themselves to die, came furiously towards him with their swords drawn, upbraiding him that he was a Coward, and every one was ready to strike him. Then Joseph calling one by his Name, and looking upon another with a countenance like a Governour, holding anothers hand, and intreating the rest distracted in such danger, by this means diverted the blows they intended him, for still as one came near to strike him, he turned his face upon him, like some wild beast encompassed with the hunters. Some of them who remembered he had been their Captain in their extremity, with reverence of his personage trembled, so that their swords fell out of their hands: and many lifting up their arm: to strike him, of their own accord let their weapons fall. Joseph, notwithstanding his desperate estate, yet was not void of judgement, but trusting in Gods assistance, he hazarded his life, and spake unto them as followeth: Seeing ye are all determined to die, let us cast lots who shall kill one another, and be to whom the lot falleth, shall be killed by him who shall next follow, and so the lot shall be cast upon every one of us, and none of us shall be forced to kill our selves. For it were unjust, that when some of us are slain, the rest should repent themselves, and so escape. They all liked well of this, and always he upon whom the lot fell, was slain by him that followed, for death was more acceptable, because they thought Joseph should die with them. Now it hapned, by the providence of God, that Joseph remained alive only with one other; and he persuaded him who was left alive, to live, and not to seek death, lest either the lot should fall upon himself, and so he be slain, or upon the other, and so he should be polluted with the murder and slaughter of one of his Friends. Joseph being thus delivered from extreme danger both from the Romans, and from those of his own Nation, went with Nicanor to Vespasian.

All the Romans came about him to see him; and pressing about their General, they made a great noise, some rejoicing that he was taken, others crying out to punish him, others striving to come near to behold him better: and they who were afar off cried out to kill that Enemy of the Romans Fame. But those who were near and beheld him, remembering his great Actions, were astonished at his change of Fortune: No Captain or Ruler, but although before they were all moved against him, yet now beholding him, they began to pity him: especially Titus, who being of a gentle disposition, admired Josephs valour, his constancy in adversity, and considered his Age, and thereby was moved to take compassion upon him, remembering what a manner of man he had been during the Wars, and what he now was, being fallen into his Enemies hands: calling also to mind the power and force of Fortune, and how uncertain the chance of War is, and that humane affairs have no steadfastness. His Example drew many minds to pity him, so that Titus was the chief author of Josephs life: Yet Vespasian caused him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to send him to Caesar. Which Joseph hearing, requested that he might speak a word or two with him alone. Whereupon, all but his Son Titus departing, and two of his Friends, Joseph spoke to him in these terms.

You think only, that you have Joseph for your Captive, but I am a Messenger to you of greater matters from God. Otherwise, I knew my Country Laws, and how it behoved the Generals of our Nation to die, and not to be taken alive by their Enemies. You will send me to Nero; Wherefore since Nero and those that are to succeed him before you, have so little time to live, you, O Vespasian, shall be Caesar, and Emperor of Rome, and Titus your Son after you: keep me therefore in bonds with you, for you are not only my Lord, but Lord of all the World, Sea and Land, and all Man-kind. And if I now find these things in this state of mine own mind against God, let me be reserved for greater punishment. After he had thus spoken, Vespasian gave small credit to his words, thinking that Joseph feined these things of himself to save his Life: yet by little and little he began to give credit to him, because God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire, and fore-told him of his Reign by many signs and tokens, and he also found Joseph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Vespasians friends saying, that it was strange that he knowing this, could not prophesie of the event of the War against Jotapata, and what was like to befall himself, that so he might avoid those evils. Joseph answered, that he had foretold the Citizens of Jotapata, that after seven and forty dayes they should be destroyed, and that that the Romans should keep him alive in hold. Vespasian secretly enquired of these matters, and finding by the relation of the Captives that it was true, he began to give more credit to that which Joseph had told him concerning himself. So he commanded Joseph to be kept Prisoner, yet he gave him apparel and divers other things in most courteous manner: and Titus greatly honoured him. The fourth day of July, Vespasian returned to Ptolemais, and from thence he came to the Sea-coast to Cæsarea, which is the greatest City of Judea; whose Inhabitants are for the most part Greeks. The Inhabitants received the Army and the General with all friendship possible, both for that they loved the Romans, and especially also for that they hated the Jews; so that many intreated Vespasian to put Joseph to death. But Vespasian, judging this a rash Petition, would make no answer to it: and he left two Legions to Winter at Cæsarea; because he saw it was a fit place; and he sent the tenth and fifth to Scythopolis, because he would not over-charge Cæsarea with the whole Army. This place is warm in Winter, and exceeding hot in Summer; by reason it is situate on a Plain by the Sea-coast.

CHAP. XV.

How Joppa was taken by the Romans.

IN the mean time a great multitude being gathered together, who either were seditious persons, or thieves, or such as had escaped out of the taken-Cities, re-edified Joppa for their refuge, which Cænes formerly had destroyed: and seeing they could not find provision in the Country, which was already wasted and left desolate by the War, they purposed to become Pirates; and so building Ships for that purpose, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Ægyptians, not suffering any to pass those Seas without danger. Vespasian understanding their practices, sent Horse and Foot against Joppa, who finding the City not guarded, got into it in the night: which the Inhabitants perceiving, were so terrified that they durst not make any resistance to expel the Romans; but they all fled to their Ships; and there stayed all night, a flight-boat from the shore. Joppa is naturally no road for Ships (for it is situated upon a turbulent Shore) and on every side hath very high and eminent Rocks, which trouble the Seas, and make huge Waves. In this place (if we may believe the fable) one may see the signs of Andromeda's Chains. When the North Wind blows, it striketh the Waves against the Rocks, and so causeth a dangerous Sea, that it were far more safe to be in the midst of the Seas than at that Shore when the said Wind bloweth. The Inhabitants of Joppa rode there all night, and by break of day the North Wind began to blow fiercely; and drove some of the Ships one against another, and others against the Rocks: and many striving against Wind and Weather, and seeking to get into the midst of the Sea for fear of the Rocky Shore, and their Enemies there, were drowned. They that escaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of safety; for the tempest drove them from the Sea, and the Romans from the City, so that the air was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noise and found of the Ships beating one against another. By this means some of the Inhabitants of Joppa were swallowed up by the Waves, others suffered shipwrack; some killed themselves rather than to be drowned: many with the Waves were stricken against the Rocks, so that the Sea was bloody, and all the shore covered with dead Bodies: and whosoever escaped the Sea, and got to shore, the Roman Souldiers there standing ready, killed them. Four thousand and two hundred dead Bodies were cast upon the shore. So the Romans having without any fight taken the City, destroyed it: and thus was Joppa taken, and twice destroyed by the Romans in a short time. Vespasian built there a Castle, and placed in it some few Horsemen and Footmen, to the end that none of the Jews might come thither again to play the Pirates; and that the Footmen might keep the Castle, and in the mean time the Horsemen might go forth, and spoil all the Towns and Villages, and Territories belonging to Joppa: which also they did. When the news of the destruction of Jopapat was brought to Jerusalem, many gave small credit to it, partly for the greatness of the Calamity, partly for that no man could say, he had seen the destruction of the City: for none escaped the Massacre to carry the news, but only report thereof was spread abroad. But at the last it was confirmed to be true by those that dwelt near the place, and then they believed it; Many things also which were false, were reported as true: For it was bruited that Joseph was slain

A in the destruction of the City. All Jerusalem was so afflicted his for death, that where as others were lamented only by their Kindred, all the City bewailed his supposed Death. They mourned for him thirty days, and hired Musicians to sing Funeral Songs for him. At last, truth discovered it self, and the true news of the destruction of Jopapat with the accidents there: also how Joseph was not slain, but was living in the hands of the Romans, and that the Romans honoured him more than a Captive could be expected. Then the Jews began as much to hate him now living, as before they had esteemed for him when they supposed him dead. Some said he was a Coward, others that he was a Traitor to his Country, and the whole City vented reproachful speeches against him. These heavy tydings increased their rage and their adverbity (which to wife men had been a warning to provide lest the like should befall themselves) made them more outrageous; so that always the end of one mischief was the beginning of another. To be short, now they were more incensed against the Romans than before, in the thought that by revenging themselves of them, they might also be revenged of Joseph. And this was the Estate of the Citizens of Jerusalem.

CHAP. XVI.

How Tiberias was yielded.

Vespasian was desirous to see the Kingdom of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to go thither, partly to the intent to feast him and his whole Army, partly that he might repress some troubles arising in his Kingdom in the time of his absence) And so he departed from Cæsarea upon the Sea-coast, and went to Cæsarea Philippi, where he stayed and refreshed his Souldiers twenty days; and himself also feasted, giving God thanks for his prosperous success in the War. This done, he had Intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which Cities belonged to Agrippa's Kingdom) whereupon determining utterly to destroy the Jews which inhabited thereabouts, he thought good to lead his Army against these two places, especially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by surrendering these Cities to him. In order whereunto he sent his Son Titus to Cæsarea to bring the Souldiers there to Scythopolis, which was the greatest City of all Decapolis, and was near Tiberias; whither himself being come, he expected his Son's coming; and departing from thence with three Legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the seditious people of Tiberias might behold his Army; this place was thirty Furlongs from Tiberias. From thence he sent Valerianus a Captain to exhort them to peace, and he sent fifty Horsemen to accompany him: for he understood that the people desired peace, and against their will were forced to War, by some of the Seditious amongst them. Valerianus coming near the City Walls, lighted from his Horse, and commanded all his Company to do the like, that they of Tiberias might not think that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: before he spoke a word, the boldest of the seditious persons issued out against him, having one Jesus the Son of Tobias, who had been a Captain of Thieves, for their Leader. Valerianus not presuming to fight without Authority from his General, although he had been certain of the Victory; and considering that it was great danger for so few to fight against a whole multitude, and withal terrified with the boldness of the Jews, contrary to his expectation, he fled away on Foot, accompanied only with five other, leaving his Horse and the rest behind him, whom Jesus and his followers took, and brought into the City, rejoicing as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treachery. But the Senators and chief of the City, fearing what might ensue upon this fact, went to King Agrippa, who presented them to Vespasian; they prostrated themselves at his feet, beseeching him to have compassion on them, and not to think the whole City partakers with those few wicked persons, that so had merited his displeasure; but to spare the people who always had honoured the Romans, and only punish the Authors of that revolt and misdemeanour, who also had with-held the whole City till now from yielding it self to the Romans. Vespasian moved by their entreaties, pardoned the City, though he was exasperated against them all for taking of Valerianus Horse; and because he perceived Agrippa was solicitous for fear that the City should be destroyed; and so Vespasian promoted the Citizens pardon. Then Jesus and his associates thinking it not safe for them to abide there, fled to Tarichea. The next day Vespasian sent be-

THE Lake of Genezareth taketh its name from the Country adjoining to it; the breadth thereof is fourty furlongs, the length a hundred. The Water of this Lake is sweet and good to drink, and more subtil than ordinarily the Waters of other places are; and it is very clear near the shoar, and more cool to drink, than either that of the River or Fountain; yea it is always more cold than one would judge such a Lake to be of that largeness: for the Water being set in the Sun, doth not lose its coldness, when the Inhabitants expose it to the Sun in Summer to allay the natural coldness thereof. There are in it many sorts of Fishes, nothing like the Fishes of other places, either in shape or taste. The River Jordan passeth through the midst of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and Fountain of it, but in truth it hath its Original from Phiala, from whence it passeth under ground a hundred and thirty Furlongs from Casarea, towards that way which leads unto Trachonitis on the right-hand. This Source is called Phiala, by reason of its roundness, for it is as round as a Wheel, and the Water still keepeth within the brink of Phiala, never encreasing nor diminishing. No man knew that this was the head of Jordan, till Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis found it to be so; for he casting straws into Phiala, found them afterward carried to Panium, which before that time was thought to be the Fountain of Jordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa's cost and charges it was much more adorned. Jordan beginneth with a deep River out of this Den, and passeth along the Marsh places, and dirty Lake of Semchonitis, and from thence 120 Furlongs to the City Julias, and in the way divideth the Lake Genezareth, and passing a great way further into the Wilderness, at last it falleth into the Lake called Alphalrites. Upon the Lake Genezareth there bordereth a Country of the same Name, naturally beautiful and admirable; for there is no kind of Plant which will not grow there, and the Inhabitants have replenished it with Plants and Trees of all sorts, and the temperature of the Air well agreeth with all sort of Fruit-Trees: for there are an infinite Company of Nut-trees, which of all Trees especially require a cold soil: there are also abundance of Palms, which desire great heat: likewise great store of Figs and Olives, which require a temperate Air: so that one may justly say, that through the bounty of Nature, so different and opposite qualities are here together united; and at one time, as it were, all difference of seasons of the year conjoyn for good purpose. And it doth not only nourish these Fruits, but also conserveth for ten whole Moneths Figs, Grapes, and all other Fruits all the year long. Besides the temperature of the Air, it is also watered by a plentiful Fountain called Capernaum: Many think it to be an Arm of Nilus, because it hath Fishes like the Corbe bred only in a Lake near Alexandria. The length of this Country along the Lake bearing the same Name, is thirty Furlongs, and the breadth twenty.

A Sea-Fight; in which Vespasian defeats in the Lake of Genezareth all those that had saved themselves at Tarichea.

Vespasian having built his Ships, and furnished them with as many men as he thought sufficient against those whom he was to pursue, he embarked upon the Lake, and himself also went against them. The Taricheans could not possibly make any escape by Land, although they would; and they were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their small Pyrate Boats could not withstand their Enemies great Vessels: and besides they were not sufficiently manned, so that they feared to encounter the Romans, who pressed altogether upon them: yet notwithstanding sometime they came about the Roman Ships, and cast Stones at the Romans afar off, and sometimes also they came near, and skirmished with them: yet they themselves always had more harm than the Romans; for their Stones which they cast did only rattle against the Romans Armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans Arrows:

H Arrows: and if at any time they were so bold as to come near the Romans, they were slain before they could do them any harm, or else sunk with their Boats. And as many as attempted to assault the Romans, were slain with their Javelins and Swords, the Romans leaping into their Boats; and many were taken with their Boats, the Ships meeting one another. They that were in the water and lift up their heads to swim, were kill'd with Arrows, or overtaken with Roman Boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their Enemies, their Hands or Heads were presently cut off. Thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled; and arrived upon the shoar, where their Ships were compassed round about. So the Romans kill'd many upon the Lake, and many upon the Land, and one might then have seen all the Lake stained with blood, and full of dead Bodies, for not one escaped alive. A few days after, these dead Bodies corrupted the Air by their stench, in such sort, that the whole Country was annoyed with it: and this spectacle was so hideous that it caused horror not only in the Jews, but even in the Romans themselves, who had been the cause of it. And the Shores were all full of Boats that had suffered Ship-wreck, and dead Bodies swollen in the water: And this was the end of that War by water. The number of them that perished here and in the City, was 6500. The Fight being ended, Vespasian fate in a Tribunal Seat, and separated the Strangers from the Inhabitants, for that the former seem'd to be the Authors of that War: Yet he deliberated with the Captains and Governours, whether he should likewise pardon them: but they told him that their lives might endamage him; for, said they, if you send those men away and let them live, they cannot live peaceably, because they want abiding places, and they are able to disturb and disquiet those to whom they shall fly. Vespasian for this cause judged them unworthy to live, presuming that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their Lives; it remained to consider what death to put them to. But he thought with himself, the Inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled to them for succour; wherefore he sought to use no violence to them, because he had promised them security. But at last he was overcome by the persuasion of his Friends, who told him that all things against the Jews were lawful, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so Licence being granted to them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take only that way that leadeth to Tiberias. They willingly obeyed as they were commanded, not misdoubting the safety of their goods or money: But the Romans had placed themselves on every side the way even to Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the City. Presently after came Vespasian and enclosed them all in an Amphitheater, and so killed 1200 persons, who were all old men, or young and unable for service. Of the rest, that were all strong young men, he sent 6000 to Nero to work at Istmos, near Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number 30400, besides others that he gave to Agrippa, whom also he permitted to do what he would with those that were of his Kingdom: But Agrippa sold all those that were given him. The rest of them were fugitives and seditious persons of Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of Peace procured the War. They were taken the sixth of the Ides of September.

How Gamala was Besieged.

After that Tarichea was taken, all those Cities that from the time that Jotapata was surprized till this instant had revolted from the Romans, did now again unite themselves unto them : so that the Romans had now gotten into their hands all Castles and Towns of Galilee, Gischala only excepted, and Itaburium, a Mountain so called. With these two rebell'd Gamala, a Town over against Tarichea, and situate upon the Lake, belonging to the Kingdom of Agrippa, and Selucia : which two last belong'd to Gaulanitis, Sagane to the higher part, called Gaulana, and Gamala to the lower ; Selucia unto the Lake Semehonitis, which is thirty furlongs in breadth, and threescore large, whose Marishes reach even to Daphne, which Country is very pleasant of it self, and famous for that it entertaineth the stream called little Jordan, and at the foot of the Golden Mountain, drives it into the great Jordan. Agrippa in the beginning of the Revolt had made a Treaty with Sagane and Selucia : but Gamala, trusting to its situation, would not enter into the Treaty. It is far stronger than Jotapata. It stands on a hill which riseth up in the midst of an exceeding high Mountain, so that it representeth the figure of a Camel, which the Hebrews call Damel, and thereof it took the name, which the Inhabitants have corrupted into Damal. Before it, and on either side are deep Vallies, into which a man can hardly descend ; only it may be assaulted on that side where it joyneth to the Mountain, which also the Inhabitants have made inaccessible, by cutting there a deep Ditch. In that place the City was very well inhabited on the descent of the Hill, and towards the South part it stood on so steep a Hill, that it seemed as if it would have fallen every hour, and there another Hill served the Inhabitants instead of a Castle, being unwall'd : for it was exceeding high, and reached down to the bottom of the Valley. In the Town within the Walls thereof there was also a Fountain. Although this City were of its own nature invincible, yet Joseph compassing it with a Wall, and with Ditches and Mines made it stronger. Wherefore the Inhabitants of this place put far more confidence in their Walls, than they of Jotapata did ; yet they were fewer in number, and not so Warlike people ; but on account of the situation of the City, they esteemed themselves above their Enemies : for the City was full of men that fled thither by reason of the strength of the place : so that for seven Months they resisted the forces that were sent by Agrippa to besiege them, Vespasian having decamped from Ammaus, pitched his Tents before Liberias, and so went to Gamala, (Ammaus signifies Hot-Water for there is a Fountain of Hot-Water there, which cureth many Diseases.) The City was so situate

A scituate, that he could not besiege it round about : wherefore he placed men to keep watch in such places as were passable, and possessed the highest Mountain ; where his Souldiers pitching their Tents, entrenched themselves. On the East part of the City in the most eminent place there was a Castle, where the fifteenth and fifth Legions lay against the Town, and the tenth Legion filled up the Ditches and Vallies. King Agrippa went to the Walls, and spake to those that defended them, willing them to yield to the Romans ; but one of them with a Sling struck him on the right Arm, and hurt him ; which much troubled his familiar Friends. And the Romans for anger that the King was hurt, and for fear of such mischances to themselves, now became earnest to assault the Town, perswading themselves that they would use strangers and their Enemies hardly if it lay in their power, seeing they had so ill entreated a Prince of their own Nation, for perswading them to what was profitable for them.

The Romans having quickly entrenched themselves by reason of the multitude that laboured in business, who were accustomed to such work, began to place their Engines against the Town-Walls. Chares and Joseph who were two of the most potent men in the Town, animated and armed their Citizens, and led them to the Walls to defend them ; but they had not much courage to the business. And although they well perceived that the City could not long hold out, seeing they wanted Water, and many other things necessary to stand a Siege ; yet notwithstanding they exhorted the Townsmen to be valiant, where a while they resisted, notwithstanding the horror : but at last

C they were therewith so terrified, that leaving the Walls, they fled into the City. Then the Romans battered the Walls with Rams in three several places, and where the Wall fell, there they issued in with Trumpets and a great shout, and fought with the Townsmen, who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them, that they permitted them not to enter further into the Town. But at last being overcome both in strength and number, they all fled into the highest part of the City, and from thence they turned again upon the Romans, who pursued them, and drove them down into the Vallies, and killed many ; and divers in that strait passage were trodden to death by their fellows. Whereupon, seeing that they neither could flee, nor resist their Enemies above their heads, they fled into the houses, which adjoynd unto the Plain, and so filled them, that being

D over-charged, they fell down upon other houses beneath them, and beat them down also, and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way perished, for being amazed, and not knowing what to do, they got into their houses, notwithstanding they saw them shake and totter : and many seeking to escape, were maimed by some part of the Ruines that fell upon their Bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The Citizens of Gamala rejoiced thereat, thinking that this aid was sent from God : and not regarding their private losses, they ceased not to force the Romans into their houses ; and if any were in the narrow streets, then they flew with Darts from the high places. The ruines afforded them Stones enough, and their slain Enemies Swords and Armour, which they took from them, being half dead, and used against themselves : many died, who cast themselves headlong from off the houses being ready to fall, and those that sought to flee could not easily escape ; for being ignorant of the wayes, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, they kill'd one another : till with much ado, finding passage, they got out of the City.

Vespasian, who was always in the midst of these encounters, was greatly moved to see the Buildings fall so upon his Souldiers, and forgetting his own safety, he retired himself with only a few to the higher part of the City, where he was left in great danger, having very few about him (for Titus his Son was not there, being before this time sent to Antiochus in Syria) and now he could not flee safely, nor yet had it been for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembering all his great Actions from his Child-hood, and his own Virtue, he encouraged his men, and with them joyned Arms, and covered themselves with their Shields, and so as it were assisted with some diving Aid, defended themselves from all Darts, Arrows, and Stones, which were cast from above upon them ; and so they remained there, not terrified either with the number or might of their Enemies, till at last, wondring at his Valour and Courage, they abated their fury. And now perceiving his Enemies to assault him but faintly, he retired back, till such time as he got without the City Walls.

Many Romans perished in this Fight, and among the rest Ebutius a Centurion, who not only in this fight shew'd himself valiant, but also in many battles before, and had done the Jews much harm. Also in that fight a certain Captain named Gallus, accompanied with ten Syrian Souldiers, hid himself in a house, and at supper-time he heard the people of that house talk, what the Citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romans, and in the night time he flew them all, and escaped safe unto the Romans. Vespasian perceiving his Army dejected at this disadvantage, and so much the more, for that they never yet had so bad success, and especially, for that they had forsaken their General, and left him in danger, thought good to comfort them, speaking nothing concerning himself, lest he should seem to find fault with some. In the beginning of his speech, he told them, That it behoved them patiently to bear that which was common to all men, because there was no Victory without blood-shed, and that Fortune was mutable, that he had already slain many thousand Jews, and now had paid a small Tribute for his happy success to adverse Fortune. That as it did not become any but vain glorious people to boast in their Prosperity, so none but Cowards feared and trembled in Adversity. For, said he, Fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad; and he is a valiant Man that is not moved by Adversity: for he, having all his wits about him, can even in the midst of his troubles, see where any fault is and amend it. Yet (said he) this hath not befallen us through want of Courage, or by the Valour and Prowess of the Jews; but the difficulty of the place has been the only obstacle of our Victory. If you are to be blamed, 'tis only for venturing too far; for when you saw your Enemies flee to the higher places, you should then have held your hands, and not have pursued them with so manifest danger to your selves, as every one might fore-see in this pursuit: so having gained the lower part of the City, you might in a little time have drawn them to a more equal conflict: but you, being eager of the Victory, did not respect your own safety. It is not the manner of the Romans rashly and unadvisedly to fight; they are wont to do all things orderly and advisedly. Timidity is fit only for barbarous People; and, as you see, proper to the Jews. Wherefore, let us call our own virtue to mind, and rather be angry for this that happened, and so incite our selves to revenge than sorrowful. And let every valiant Soldier with his own sword comfort himself: so shall we both revenge the death of our Friends, and be revenged of them by whom they were slain: and I myself (as also now I did) will expose my self to all dangers with you, and go first to fight, and come last from it. With these and such like speeches he comforted his Soldiers.

The People of Gamala were at first very joyful for their prosperous success; which notwithstanding did not happen through their Valour: but soon after considering, that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to escape, they became very sorrowful, and their hearts relented (for now Victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to provide for their own safety as well as they could; for the most Valiant among them kept the Breach, and the rest the strong Places about the Walls which were yet unbattered. The Romans again built Mounds, and attempted to assault the City, and many of the Citizens fled by the Vallies where no guard was, and by secret Vaults underneath the ground; and they who for fear of being taken, remained in the City, perished for hunger: for all the Victuals were reserved for them that fought, who, by the extremity whereto they were reduced, had not lost their Courage.

CHAP. II.

How Placidus took the Mountain Itaburium.

During this Siege, Vespasian made another attempt against those that kept the Mountain Itaburium, situate between the great field and Sychoopolis, being thirty Furlongs high, and inaccessible on the North side. In the very top of this Mountain there is a Plain twenty Furlongs over, enclosed with a Wall: which Wall though of so huge a compass, Joseph had built in forty days. They received all necessary provision from beneath, but they had only rain-water. Unto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with six hundred Horse, who could no ways get up the Mountain: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon. Many Jews came down towards him, but with intention to entrap him; and surpris'd him unawares. Placidus purposely gave them fair speeches, hoping to get them down into the Plain: and they, as though they would have obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddenly to assault him: yet Placidus his device took place. For when the Jews assaulted him, he feigned flight, and the Jews having pursued him a great way from the Mountain, he turned again upon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, killed some, and hindered the rest from ascending the Mountain: so the remainder left Itaburium, and fled

A fled to Jerusalem; and the Inhabitants (now Water failing them) yielded to Placidus, and delivered the Mountain unto him.

How Gamala was Destroyed.

IN the mean time many of the Gamaliens, that had appeared the most hardy, fled and hid themselves; and the weaker fort perished through Famine: yet a few of the most courageous that were left among them, defended the Wall till the twenty seventh day of October. Upon which day, three Souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards the break of day, undermined the highest Tower in their quarter, and entered into it; those that kept it, neither perceiving them when they came in, nor when they went out (for it was in the night-time.) These Souldiers being wary left any noise should be made, removed five of the greatest stones of the Foundation, and presently leapt away; and incontinently the Tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall killed those that kept it; whereupon many that kept watch in those quarters fled through fear; and they who sought to escape the Romans, were killed; amongst whom Joseph was struck with a Dart from a part of the Wall that was fallen down, and there dyed. They who were within the City were terrified with the noise hereof, and ran up and down as though all the Enemies were already entered into it. And Charles Josephs Companion, being sick, yielded up the Ghost, fear encreasing his Disease, and helping to shorten his life. The Romans remembering the bad success at the last assault, did not enter the City till the twenty-third of the Month aforesaid.

Then Titus animated by resentment of the misfortune of the Romans in his absence, accompanied with 200 Horsemen, and some chosen Foot-men, entered the City, no man resisting him: the Watch-men then first perceiving it, cried, No Arms. Those within the City fearing that Titus was entered, some took their Children, some their Wives, and fled into the Castle with pitiful Cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the Sword; and they that could not get into the Castle, not knowing what to do, fell among the Roman Guards. Then the skies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the City flowed with blood. Vespasian led his whole Army against those that fled into the Castle, which was of a great height, and scarcely accessible, standing in a stony place full of Ditches and deep Dens, and compassed with steep Rocks. The Jews drove down the Romans that offered to come up to them, partly with Darts, partly with Stones, which they rowled down upon them; and they were so high, that the Romans Arrows could not reach them. But at last, as it were by Gods providence, who would have it so, a Whirlwind arose which carried the Roman Arrows amongst them in the Castle, and the Jews Arrows from the Romans; and the Wind was so violent, that it was not possible for them to stand upon those high places: and so not being able to stand, nor to see those that came against them, the Romans ascended and took the Castle, some resisting for their defence, others yielding themselves. The Romans now call to mind their fellows that had perished in the first assault, and so became more cruel. Many despairing of their lives, cast their Wives, their Children, and themselves headlong down those Precipices into the deep Vallies underneath. So that the Cruelty the Romans shewed against the people of Gamala, was not so great as that which they used against themselves; for there were only four thousand that perished by the Romans Sword, and the number of them who so cast themselves down, was found to be five thousand; and not one escaped, but two Women that were Sisters, and Daughters to Philip Son of Joachim, a worthy Man, and General of Agrippas Army; and these two were saved only, because at such time as the City was taken, they hid themselves: for they feared not Infants, but many took them and cast them down from the Castle. And thus was Gamala destroyed the 23 day of October, having begun to Revolt the 21 day of September.

NOW all the Cities and strong Places of Galilee were taken, Giscala only excepted. Part of the Inhabitants whereof desired Peace, for that they were Husbandmen, and their riches consisted in the Fruits of the Earth; but there were many factious Freebooters in the City, and amongst them many of the natural Inhabitants. These people were incited to Revolt by one John, a very wicked and deceitful person, Son to one Levi; he was of ill manners, bold to attempt any thing, and making no conscience of any thing he took in hand; and he was known to all men for one that desired War, to make himself mighty. This man was a Ring-leader of the Seditious persons in Giscala; and for fear of him, the People, who perhaps otherwise would have sent Legats to the Romans to request peace, were hindred and forced to stay till the Romans came to fight against them. Against these People Vespasian sent Titus, and with him a thousand Horsemen; and the tenth Legion towards Scythopolis: Himself with the rest went to Cesarea, to refresh them after their great labour, at the charge of the Towns adjoining; judging it necessary to fit them to sustain manfully the toils that were to ensue: for he foresaw that he should have much ado to win Jerusalem, both for that it was very strong, and was the Chief City of all the Nation. And his care in this point was so much the more, for that he perceived many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was compassed with almost invincible Walls: and besides this, the boldness and desperate courage of the Inhabitants, who although that they had had no Walls at all, yet had been scarcely to be Conquered: and therefore he thought it necessary to refresh his Soldiers before this Enterprize, as Champions are prepared for the Combat.

Titus having taken a view of Giscala, judg'd that it might easily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the People would be destroyed by the Romans, he being weary of blood-shed, and commiserating the innocent People, which were otherwise like to perish together with the culpable, attempted to take it by surrender. Wherefore the Walls being full of People, among whom were many of the Seditious, he told them that he marvelled what help they expected, or by whose advice, all other Cities being now taken, they alone would resist the Roman Forces, especially when as they had already seen many Towns, far stronger than theirs, overthrown at the first assault: and that contrariwise those who had yielded themselves to the Romans, lived in peace, and enjoyed all that was theirs. Which offer (said he) I now also make to you, and am not yet incensed against you, because that which you do is in hope of your liberty: but if you still persevere in your rebellious course, and refuse this kind offer, you shall presently perceive the Roman Sword drawn out for your destruction, and incontinently find your Walls but a mockery, and no wayes able to resist the Roman Engines: whereas contrariwise if you yield your selves, and trust to the fidelity of the Romans, you shall be the most happy people of all Galilee. None of the Townsmen were admitted to make answer, nor to come to the Walls; for the Seditious were Masters of them: and a Guard was placed at every Gate, lest any should go out to submit themselves, or any Horsemen should be received into the City. John made answer for all, That he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either persuade or compel the Inhabitants to accept them: but he requested that they should be granted to the Jews, being the Seventh day, wherein it was not lawful for them to treat of Peace, or make War. For (as the Romans knew) the Jews every seventh day cease from all work: and if they profaned it, they who caused them to do so, were guilty of impiety. Moreover, so short time could not prejudice the Romans, being but one nights space: for nothing he could effect in that time to endamage them, except only by fleeing out of the City (which Titus might prevent by placing a strong Guard and Watch in every place about it.) That Titus might make advantage of it, since it being his design to offer them Peace and Safety, it was an action no less worthy of him, to have regard to the observation of their Law, than a duty indispensable in them not to violate it.

With these and such like speeches John sought to delude Titus, being not so religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as careful for his own safety: for he feared that the City would presently be taken, and himself left alone; and so he determined in the night to flee, as the only way to save his Life. And truly God would have it so, that

John

A John should then escape to be the overthrow of Jerusalem, and that Titus should not only grant him the time he requested to deliberate, but also that night remove his Camp near Cydesa, a great Village, and the strongest of all that Country, belonging to the Tyrians, which the Galileans always hated.

In the night time John perceiving no Romans to keep watch about the Town, and having now opportunity, fled not only with the armed men about him, but also with many of the Chief of the City, and whole Families, whom he promised to conduct to Jerusalem. But John fearing either Death or Slavery, and careful for his own safety, carried them twenty Furlongs out of the City, where being so desolate, they began grievously to lament. For every one thought every place as near his Enemies, as he was far from the City and his friends: and still every step they thought their Enemies at hand, ready to take them; and frequently they lookt back, as though their Enemies heard the noise they made as they went, and were coming against them; inasmuch that many crowded forwards in heaps, and were killed in the way with the presfs of them that followed: so that the Women and Infants perished miserably: and if they spake any thing, it was only to entreat their Parents or their Kindred to stay for them.

But John's exhortation took effect, who cried to them to save themselves, and hasten to such a place where they might be safe, and revenge themselves of the Romans, for the outrages which they that remained behind were like to endure: and so the multitude fled, every one as he was able, dispersed themselves.

Titus early in the morning came to the Walls to know whether they accepted of his Offer. Then the people set open the Gates, and with their Wives and Children came to meet him, all crying that he was their Benefactor and Deliverer: Also they told him that John was fled, and besought him to pardon them, and execute Justice upon those Malefactors that remained in the City. Titus, at their request, sent certain Horsemen to pursue John, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten to Jerusalem; yet they slew almost two thousand of them that fled with him, and brought back again 3000 Women and Children. Titus was angry that John by deceit had escaped unpunished: yet his anger was something appeased, when he perceived John's purpose prevented, in that so many of his Company were slain, and so many brought back Captives. Thus he peaceably entered the City, commanding the Soldiers to break down a little piece of the Wall, as it were to take possession of it, and so punish the Seditious rather with Threats than Torments. For he thought that many were accused only for private hatred, and so were in danger to suffer being innocent: and he thought it better to let the wicked live in fear, than with them to destroy the guiltless: and that perhaps hereafter they would be more quiet, either for fear of punishment, or for shame of falling again into their former offence, for which they were pardoned: whereas if any man suffered undeservedly, he could not afterwards help it. He placed there a Garrison both to repress the Seditious, and also to confirm them that desired Peace. And thus was Galilee Conquered after it had cost the Romans much toil.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the Destruction of Jerusalem.

AS soon as John was entered into Jerusalem, all the People flocked about him, and those that came with him, enquiring what new Calamities had befallen their Nation. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to speak, thereby discovered their distress. Yet amidst these their miseries some boasted that it was not the Roman power that forced them to flee, but that of their own accord they fled thither to fight against the Romans in a safer place, than that from whence they fled was; for none but unadvised and rash-headed men would fight for such a City as Giscala, and other places that were not able to resist; and that it behoved them all to reserve their Vigour and strength to defend their Metropolitan City. They also told them how Giscala was taken by the Romans, and that they departed in good sort away, though some reported that they fled. The People of Jerusalem hearing what these men reported, and how many were Prisoners to the Romans, fell into a great fear, as though that which had hapned portended their own ruine. But John, nothing affrighted he made War against the Romans, himself forsaken them of Giscala who fled with him, went first to one, and then to another, another, inciting them all to War, with vain hopes, alledging the weakness of the Romans, and extolling their own Puissance, deceiving the simple; and perwading them, that though the Romans fought revenge, yet could they never enter the Walls of Jerusalem, having had so much ado, and endured such difficulties in entering the little Bourns and Villages of Galilee, against whose Walls they had broken all their Engines. These discourses of his incited many young men to Sedition; but all the wiser sort forefaw what was like to ensue, and already mourned for the loss of the City. In this case were they of Jerusalem: yet before this Sedition in the City, the Country People began to be at discord among themselves. For Titus departed from Gisfala to Cesarea, and Vespasian went from Cesarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and took them both; and leaving these Garrisons, he returned to Cesarea, bringing with him a great multitude of those that had yielded to him. All the Cities had Civil discords among themselves, so that when the Romans did not set upon them, one part of the Jews in every City fought against another, and there was a great diffention between those that desired peace, and the Seditious People. At first, this Discord began only in private houles; but in the end, those of one mind united, and began in Companies to Rebel openly. Thus every place was troubled with civil discord: and every where rash young men, who desired War, prevailed against grave and wise old men, who foreseeing the calamity like to ensue, desired Peace. At first, the Inhabitants one by one robb'd and spoil'd what they could; but at last in whole Troops they joynt together and robb'd openly, and wasted all the Country about: and in their Robberies they K shewed such cruelty, that the harm and injury they did to their own Country-men, was equal to the miseries which befel them by the Romans; and they who by these miscreants were spoiled, wist'd rather to have fallen into the Romans hands. But the Garisons in these Cities, either because they were loth to trouble themselves, or else for that they cared not for their Country-men, did nothing, or very little, succour them that fell into these Thieves hands. At last the Thieves assembled themselves together from all places, and joyning Companies brake into Jerusalem. This City had no Governour, and according to the ancient Custom of their Ancestors, was open to all that came thither that were their Country-men; and so much more willingly at that time, because they thought they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which L was afterward the only cause that the City was destroyed, and of the more civil diffention. For a great multitude of people unfit to fight being there, consumed the Victuals that would have sufficed for the fighting men: and besides the War, they brought upon it Famine and Civil diffention. Then other Thieves came out of the fields thereabout, and joyning themselves with those that were within the City, omitted no kind of Villany: for not content to rob and spoil, they also attempted to commit Murders, not only privily, or in the night upon mean men, but even in the day time they publicly set upon those of the chiefest quality. For first of all they took Antipas, who was of the blood Royal, a man so eminent amongst them, that the publick Treasure was committed to his charge, and put him in Prison: and after him they took Sepha M worthy man Son to Raguel, and Levias, both of them of the Kings Household; and after them all that seemed to bear any sway or Authority amongst the People. Great fear fell upon the Inhabitants, and every one provided to save himself, as though the City were already surprized by the Enemies. But these people were not content thus to have imprisoned these great men, they thought it not safe for themselves any longer to keep them alive: for many went daily to visit them, who were able to revenge their injuries; and moreover they feared that the People would make head against them, being moved with their Infolencies. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpose they sent one John a cruel Murderer, who was the Son of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more, having swords went to the Prison, and slew as many as they found there. To excuse this cruel fact of theirs, they alledged, That all they who were slain in Prison had conference with the Romans concerning the betraying of the City into their hands; and that for this Cause they had slain them as Traytors to their Country: They also boasted that this Fact of theirs had preserved the City, and that therefore they had deserved well by it. The People were brought to such slavery and terror, that the choosing the High Priest was in their hands, to elect whom they pleased; so much was their Infolence increased. Thus they not respecting the Families, out of which it was only lawful to choose the high Priest, they elected Strangers and base persons to that sacred Dignity, and such as would be partakers of their Villanies and Impieties; for they, who not deserving it, attained to such dignity, were bound in all things to the Will of those by whom they were so exalted. They also

A also devised many lies to set those that were in Authority at variance one with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to resist their Enterprises, till from shedding the blood of the Citizens, they proceeded to commit impiety against God himself, and with profane and impure feet to enter into the Sanctuary. Then the People were incited against them by the perswasion of Ananus, who was one of the Priests, and the most ancient and wisest of them all, who perhaps had saved the City, had he escaped the hands of these Miscreants. But they used the Temple as a Castle and defence for themselves against the People, and made the Sanctuary a place for them to exercise Tyranny in. And that which increased the sorrow of the Citizens, was, that amidst these Calamities, their Religion was also contumeliously abused: for these B Thieves, to try of what strength and courage the People were, and their own Forces, elected by Lot a high Priest contrary to their Law: which, as we have already said, requireth that the Office of high Priest be by Succession. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient Custom, alledging that in time past the high Priest was chosen by Lot; but indeed this their fact was a violation of the most firm Custom that was amongst the People; and was only a device to get all Government into their hands, by establishing Magistrates at their pleasure.

Then calling one of the holy Tribes, named Eniachin, they cast Lots, and the Lot fell upon one, whereby their iniquity was discovered. This man whose Lot it was to be high Priest was named Phanias, who was the Son of Samuel, a man not only unworthy of that Dignity, but who had been so ill brought up, that he never knew what the high Priest meant. This Phanias was born in a Village called Aphisstis. Him, against his will, they fercht out of the field, and as it had been in a Stage-Play, they graced him with the Sacerdotal habit, and gave him instructions how he should behave himself, as though so great impiety had been but a sport. The rest of the Priests, beholding a far off the holy Laws thus scorned, scarcely contained themselves from tears, and groaned for sorrow, that their sacred Dignities were so abused. The People could no longer endure this their Tyranny, but every one bethought himself how to suppress these Tyrants. And those that were most earnest herein, were Gorion, Joseph Son, and Simon the Son of Gamaliel: who first went about the City in private, and afterwards in a publick Assembly exhorted the People to be revenged upon those Tyrants, who took from them their Liberty; and to address themselves to purge the holy Temple from such vile and unclean Persons. Likewise the best disposed among the Priests, to wit, Jefus the Son of Gamala, and Ananus, the Son of Ananus, often in publick Sermons reprehended and upbraided the People with their sloth, that they made no more haste to destroy those Zealots, for so those wretches termed themselves, as though they had been devout promoters of God's Glory, and not impious malefactors.

The people being all assembled together, grieved to see the holy place so made a Den of Thieves, and such Robberies and Murtherers committed openly; yet did they not go about revenge, thinking themselves too weak to deal with these Zealots, as indeed they were. Whereupon the high Priest Ananus stood up among them: and having often turned his Eyes to the Temple, and beheld it with tears in his Eyes; Oh, said he,

How far better were it for me to die, than live to see the House of God thus filled with impiety, and the Sanctuary wherein none should come but the high Priest, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious persons, clothed in Priests apparel, and bearing the greatest Authority? Why do I yet live, and to be gray-headed, abstain from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will go against these Murderers, and as though I were in a Wilderness where there were no man besides my self, I alone will go and offer my soul in the presence of God. For what dost it avail me to live amongst a People that have no feeling of their own calamity, and which E seeketh not to redress their own present miseries? For you being robbed and spoiled bare all patiently, and being beaten you hold your peace, and there is none amongst you that dare openly mourn for them that are most cruelly murthered. O tyrannous Government! But why should I exclaim against the Tyrants? Do not you your selves make them great, and nourish their power and authority by your patience? Do not you, by despising those who were before in authority, being but a few, make all these, who are many in number, Tyrants over your selves? Have not you by keeping your selves quiet whilst they are armed, drawn their swords upon your own heads? and whereas it behoved you to resist their enterprises, when first they injured your Kindred; you by suffering, have made them Thieves, because at first you made no account, when they destroyed Houses and whole Families. And this was the cause, that at last the Rulers and chief Men themselves were set upon, and none would succour them when they were drawn thorough the midst of the City, and these Murderers butchered them in Prison whom you thus betrayed. I will not recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I say,

say, they being neither accused nor condemned, nor having any man to hear them, they were most cruelly murdered, as we have seen: for they were before our faces led to be slain, and yet no man opened his mouth, nor lift up his hand. And will you also endure? will you suffer the holy Sanctuary to be prophaned before your Eyes? will you, having so emboldened these miscreants as ye see now, your selves stand in fear of them? assure your selves, they would, if they could devise how, commit greater impiety than this is. They kept against you the strongest place in the whole City, called indeed a Temple, but now a Fortref or Castle of demerits being even upon you; what do you deliberate to do? Do you expect the Romans to come and help you to save the Temple and sacred places, as if our City were at that pass that our very Enemies could not but pity us? Will you not rise, and as the very brute Beasts do, revenge your selves upon them that have thus wounded you? Why doth not every one of you call to mind the Massacre of his friends, and what Calamity he himself hath suffered, and so encourage your selves to be revenged? For ought I can see, you have all lost that sacred and sweet, and natural desire of Liberty; and now we embrace Bondage, as though we had learned to be Bondmen even from our Ancestors. But they endured many and hard Wars to live in Liberty, and yielded not to the Power of the Egyptians, or Medes, because they would not be at their command. What need is there to recount to you the Wars of your Predecessors? to what end do we enterpris this War against the Romans (be it commodious for us, to our disadvantage) if not to obtain our Liberty? And we, who cannot indure to be subject to the Lords of the whole World, suffer those of our own Nation to tyrannize over us. It may be adverse Fortune to be once overcome by strangers; but to be slaves to the basest of our own Nation, argueth that we have no spark of Generosity in us, and that we bear base and servile minds. And seeing I have made mention of the Romans, I will not stick to declare to you that which now cometh to my mind, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet shall we suffer no greater misery at their hands, than now we do under these base Tyrants. And how can you abstain from tears, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gifts of the Romans, robbed and spoiled by them of our own Nation, this being our Mother-City? and to see those men murdered whom the Romans (although they had conquered us) would not have touched? The Romans never durst pass beyond the limits of prophane places, nor ever violated our sacred Laws and Customs, but always revered the Sanctuary, beholding is only as off: yet now some born and brought up amongst us who are called Jews, tremble not to walk in the Sanctuary, having their hands bathed in the blood of their Country-men and brethren. Who will now fear foreign Wars, seeing these civil broils are such? Much better were it for us to fall into our Enemies hands; yea, if you will call every thing by such a name as it deserveth, we shall find that the Romans have not violated our Laws, but have been the Protectors thereof; and they within our Walls are the Violators of them. What punishment is there that those that have thus tyrannized over us deserve not? yea, what punishment can be devised great enough for their offence? I know that all of you were so perswaded before I spoke, and you were incited against them by that which you have endured at their hands: but yet some fear their multitude and their courage, and moreover that they are in a higher place than you: yet as all this came by your negligence and suffering, so by your delaying they will grow stronger. For their number daily increaseth, and every wicked person flyeth to his like; and they are so much the more emboldened, for that as yet no man hath once offered to resist their enterprizes: and be sure that if they have time, they will make use of the higher place, and that to your damage. But (believe me) if you would but once offer to go against them, their very consciences would abate their haughty minds, and the remembrance of their misdeeds would put them so far out of heart that they will not make any benefit of that higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turn their own darts against them for their impiety, and consume them therewith. Let us but only shew our selves, and we shall dismay them. Yet it is an honour for us, if need be to sacrifice our lives for the defence of the holy Temple. My self will assist you with the best advice I can; and you shall see that I shall not only assist you with words, but expose my self to the greatest dangers, and endeavour to animate you by my own example. Ananus thus exhorted the people against the Zealots; yet he knew well that it was great difficulty to overcome them, being lusty young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more desperate by the remore of Conscience for the horrible crimes and execrable deeds which they had committed; for they depaired of all hope of pardon for their misdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable that the Common-wealth should be so over-ruled. After this exhortation the people cried out, that they were ready to go against the Thieves, and to do as they were exhorted. Whilst that Ananus selected out the most able men for War, and set them in order,

A the Zealots issued out upon him, (having intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certain Spies which they had appointed on purpose) and they fellied out sometimes in companies, sometimes all at once, other times in Ambushes; sparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number than the Thieves, and not so armed as they; but what they wanted in arms, their courage supply'd. For the Citizens were armed with fury, stronger then Arms; and they which were gone out of the Temple, with a more desperate boldness than all the multitude how great soever. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the City, except they could drive away the Zealots: and the Zealots thought they could not escape torments and death it self, except they were Victors. So at last they joyned battel, each party under their Captains and Leaders; and first of all both parties cast stones one against another: and if any fled, the Conquerours pursued them with swords, and many were wounded and slain on both sides. Those Townsmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houses; but the Zealots that were hurt, went into the Temple, and polluted the sacred pavements with their blood: so that their Religion was prophaned by bloudshed. Always the Thieves in making excursions got the upper hand. Whereat the Citizens being angry, seeing their number every day decreased, reproved the cowards: so that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zealots, they made him stand and resist whether he would or no, not permitting him to pass away: and thus they bent all their forces against their Enemies. At last, the Thieves not able to make any longer resistance, by little and little retired themselves into the Temple, and Ananus with his Company entred the Temple by force with them, and brake the body of his Enemies. Then they in the outer Temple were in great fear, and fled into the inner Temple, and shut the Gates with all speed. Ananus would not offer violence to the sacred Gates; and besides the Enemies cast Darts from above: for he thought it a great offence against God, although he might have got the victory, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected six thousand of the chief of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keep the Porches, and others to succeed in their places while they took rest. And many of the better sort of the Citizens being placed to keep watch there, hired other poor people to watch in their steads. But John, who as before we declared, fled from Giffada, wrought the ruine of them all. This man being full of deceit, and above all measure desirous of rule, long ago intended to overthrow the Common-wealth. To which end, from that time he counterfeited himself to be against the Thieves, and so day and night accompanied Ananus and the rest, both in their Consultations, and when they went to visit the Watch; and he disclosed all their Counsels to the Zealots: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gave the Thieves intelligence thereof before it was put in practice; yet he seemed to be very respectful to Ananus, and the rest of the Nobility, hereby hoping to conceal his Treachery. But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reverence caused him to be suspected, because they noted him to play the Parasite; and for that uncalled, he daily intruded himself into their Consultations, he was misdoubted to betray their secrets. For Ananus perceived that the Enemies knew all their designs; and though Johns deeds carried suspicion of Treason, yet could they not easily remove him, his craft was such: besides this, he was upheld by many noble-men who were employed in these affairs. Wherefore they thought good to request of him an oath of friendship; which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true to the people, and neither disclose any deed or secret Council of theirs to the Enemies, but with heart and hand would truly endeavour to suppress the Rebels. So Ananus did no more mistrust him because of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their Counsels, nothing suspecting him. Nay, they now trusted him so far, that they sent him as Agent to the Zealots, to perswade them to peace: for they were very careful lest the Temple through their deeds should be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Jews should there be slain. But he, as though he had sworn to the Zealots and not to the Citizens, entred boldly amongst them: and standing in the midst of them he recounted to them that he had often for their sakes undergone great danger, by suffering none of the Townsmens secrets to be concealed from them, but declared unto them all that ever Ananus and his Confederates determined against them; and that even now he was like together with them to fall into extremest Danger, except it pleased God as they were miraculously to assist them. For, said he, now Ananus without delay will send to Vespasian, who will come with his Army in all haste and take the City: and that he had appointed the day following for Purification, to purifie the people, that so under pretence of piety he might let them into the City, or else they might enter in by force: and that he could not see how either they were able to endure a long siege, or encounter with so huge an Army: adding moreover, that it was Gods providence that he should be sent to them to make a peace, when Ananus purposed so soon as they were unarmed to set upon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themselves, they should either entreat the Watchmen that besieged them to be favourable to them, or else get some succour from some place without the Temple. For (said he) he that amongst you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath past, and what he hath done; but let them persuade themselves as they please, they that have been injured, will not forget and forgive so soon, as he that injured them is sorry for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated than before, and the wrath of men that are injured, is increased by Authority, and licence to do what they please. And they might be sure that the friends and kindred of them that were slain, would always lay wait to requite the injuries; and that all the people were incensed against them for breaking the Laws: so that although some few would take pity upon them, yet the greater number would prevail. With these and such like speeches John terrified the Zealots; yet durst he not openly tell them what he meant by foreign help, notwithstanding he meant the Idumeans. And that he might more ensnare the Thieves, he went to the chieftest of them, and secretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent against them, and breathed out many threatnings against some in particular.

CHAP. VI

How the Idumeans came to Jerusalem, and what they did there.

Eleazar one of the Zealots causeth the Idumeans to be sent for

Amongst the Zealots there were two principal, Eleazar the Son of Simon, who above all the rest was thought most fit both to give counsel, and to execute that which was consulted upon: and Zacharias the Son of Amphichus; who both were descended from the Line of the Priests. These two, understanding that beside the general threatnings, their death was especially resolved, and that the faction of Ananus, to get him into Authority, had sent to call the Romans (for this John had fained) deliberated with themselves what to do, having so short time to provide. For they supposed that presently the people would assaile them; and they bethought themselves that now it was too late to seek foreign help: for they might endure all calamity, before they could give notice hereof unto any that would help them. Yet at last they determined to call the Idumeans to aid them, and so they wrote a short Epistle to them, letting them understand how Ananus, having seduced the people, meant to betray the Mother-City of their Nation to the Romans; and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him besieged in the Temple; that the time wherein they expected safety was very short; and that if they were not presently succoured, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the City to be brought in subjection to the Romans: they also order'd many things to be spoken by word of mouth to the Rulers of Idumea. For which purpose were chosen two principal men, eloquent, and apt to persuade; and that, which was in this case required, swift of foot. It was certain that the Idumeans would presently aid them, being a brutish rude Nation, and prone to sedition and alteration, much rejoicing therein, and by flattery easily entreated to War, and would make as much haste to them, as if they went to some festival solemnity: so that there only was requisite two speedy messengers. Which two were ready and quick men for such an exploit, and were both called by the name of Ananias. These presently went to the Governours of Idumea, who reading the Epistle, and hearing that which the messengers were to say to them, like Mad-Men assembled all the people together in great haste, and proclaim'd War: so the people in an instant gathered themselves together, and were all armed to fight for the liberty of their Mother-City; and twenty thousand being assembled together under the Government of four Captains, came with all speed to Jerusalem: the names of them were John and James, the Sons of Sofa, and Simon the Son of Cathas, and Phineas the Son of Cleopith. Ananus and his Watch knew not of the going of those two Messengers, nor of the Watchers in the City, but they understood of the Idumeans coming, and so shut the Gates, and placed watchmen upon the Walls: yet they thought not good to go out

A and fight with them, but first with peaceable words to persuade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Jesus, the eldest of the Priests next after Ananus, stood in a Tower opposite against them, and spake in this manner.

Though many and divers tumults and troubles have molested this City, yet I never so much wondered at any of them, as that you are come with such fury and readiness to help these wicked people, against all expectation: for (said he) you are come against us to help vile persons: and so rashly, as it becometh not you to have done, if your Metropolitan City requested your help against barbarous people. If I judged your manners like theirs that have requested your help, I should then think you had some reason to come: for nothing causeth firmer friendship than agreement or sympathy in manners. But they, if their actions be considered, have every one deserved a thousand deaths. For they are the outcast and basest of all the Country people; who having spent their patrimonies riotously, and played the thieves in all places and Cities about them, now at last have got into this holy City, most religious of all Cities, and have profaned the holy-Place by their impiety: they tremble not to be drunk even in the holy Temple, and there they consume in banqueting the spoils they had gotten from them whom they massacred. And you come to help these men with as great an Army and Provision, as though that this your Mother-City had by publick consent requested your help against foreign Enemies. Is not this a great injustice of Fortune, that your noble Nation hath conspired and bent all their forces against us, to help these miscreants? Till now I knew not what moved you so quickly and so suddenly to arm your selves to assist Thieves against your native Countrymen. What? Have you been informed of the Romans coming, and of the betraying of the City? For even now I heard some of you mutter, that you came to deliver your Mother-City. Is it not a wonder to see this device and invention of these malefactors? But they could devise no other way to incite others against us (who even naturally desire liberty, and are ready for the same to spend our dearest blood in conflict with the enemy) but to join us to be enemies of Liberty. But it becometh you to consider who are the Calumniators, and against whom these Calumnies are devised; and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleasures, but from the thing itself. What should move us now to yield to the Romans, having endured as yet nothing to constrain us therunto? when if we had liked to live under their obedience, we needed not at first to have rebelled; and beside that, if we had repented our selves, we might have again submitted our selves, and obtained their favour, before this time that all the Country round about us is destroyed. Nay, if we now would yield, it is not easie for us: for the spoils of Galilee, which they have already conquered, hath made them proud; and by humbling our selves to them being now near us, should we not incur an infamy worse than death is self. True it is, I think peace better than War; yet being once provoked to War, and the War once begun, I had rather die a glorious death, than live in Captivity. Do they inform you that we have secretly sent the chief of our City to the Romans, or that by common consent of all the people we have done it? If they say we did it secretly, let them then tell what Friends of ours were sent, or what Servants of ours were Ministers to effect this Treason. Did they take any Messenger of ours and find Letters about him? How can that be hid from all our Citizens, with whom we do every hour converse? And is it possible that a few, shut up in the Temple, who could not come into the City, should know our secrets, and all the whole City know nothing? or do they now first know it when they are like to be punished for their impiety? never suspecting any of us to be Traytors, so long as they were in no fear. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, then all men were there when the speech was made to the people, to exhort them therunto, and request their consent, and so the news thereof would quickly have come to your ears. But what need had we to send Ambassadors if we had been now already certain to come to composition with the Romans? Let them tell you whomas appointed for that Embassy. These are but devices and contrivances of them, who fear to have a death according to their desert, and seek shifts to escape punishment.

If Fate had decreed that our City should be betrayed to the Enemy, assure your selves they who thus accuse us, would have betrayed it themselves; having committed already all sort of impieties, Treason only excepted. It is your part, seeing you are come hither in Arms, first (as Reason and Justice requireth) to assist your Mother-City against them who tyrannize over us, and violate our Laws, make all that Justice, which they can effect with their Sword. First of all they took Noble-men and cast them into prison, having drawn them from amidst the publick assembly; and never being accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their entreaties, they put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceably and not in hostile manner into our City, your selves shall plainly behold evident tokens of this that I say to you, to wit, Houses ruined and made desolate by their Robberies, the Wives and Families of them that are slain in mourning apparel, and weeping in every part of the City: for for there is none amongst us, that hath tasted the perfection of these wretched men, who are H gone so far, that not content to make this City their refuge (which is the chief, and a Speciecle to all others for Sanctity) and to have robbed and spoiled all the Country and Villages, and Cities hereabout; now lastly they have made the sacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their spils unto, which they have impiously gotten it this City. This Temple they make their Fortrefs, to issue out and to retire unto: from thence they make incursions upon the Citizens: and this is the place where they practise their villanies against us.

This sacred Place, which all the World, even the most barbarous and savage people reverence, is now defiled by the horrible Robberies which these born amongst us have committed. And now being in desperation, they rejoyce to see Nation against Nation, and City against City, and People against People, and our own Countrymen to turn themselves against their own bowels: when contrariwise, (as I have already said) it had been your parts and duties to join with us, and help us to exterminate these malefactors; and be revenged of them for the lie by which they presumed to call you to help them, whom they had just reason to fear as revengers of their impieties. Wherefore if you make any account of these mens prayers, vouchsafe (laying your Weapons aside) to come into our City like Friends, and be your selves Judges between us and them whom you come to help. And consider what favour we show them, who permit them to plead their own causes before you, they being guilty of so heinous crimes, and having put to death persons of such account, never accused nor permitted to speak for themselves: yet this favour we will grant them for your sake. But if you continue your indignation against us, and refuse this offer to be our Judges, then let us entreat you, that leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aid to those miscreants against your Mother-City. And if you suspect any of us to be Confederates with the Romans, you may keep all the passages; and then seek to defend your Metropolis, when you have proof of any such matter as is alleged against us; and punish the Authors of that Treason, when you have convicted them. The enemies cannot prevent you, because you are already planted so near the City. If you like none of these, marvel not that we shut our gates against you, coming in an armed and hostile manner. But the Idumeans being angry, were not moved hereby, and so much the more for that entrance into the City was denied them, and their Generals were exceedingly displeased, thinking it shameful to lay down their Arms at the command of others who had no Authority over them.

Then one of the Captains named Simon, the Son of Gabthas, having with much ado gotten his Souldiers to be silent, stood up in a place where the High Priests might hear him, and said, That he now did not wonder that those who maintained Liberty, were besieged in the Temple, since they of the City now shut their Gates against them, the City being common and free for all the Nation; and that perhaps they were ready to open the City Gates to receive the Romans. That they spake to the Idumeans from a Tower, and commanded them to cast down their Arms, which they had taken only for the Liberty of the City, when they durst not trust their own Nation to keep the same, and yet would have them Judges of the discord: and that accusing others for killing some not convicted, they themselves would condemn all our whole Nation by the ignominy they did to their Country-men, against whom they had now shut the City gates, which were open to all strangers to enter into for Religion-sake. Did we make haste (saith he) towards you, to fight against our own Nations, when we came only to preserve your Liberty? But this is as true, as that they whom you thus besiege have wronged you, and as the accusation you forge against them. But your keeping in hold those that are the defenders of the Common-wealth, shutting the City gates against Men of your own Blood, you impose upon us contumacious commands. Who can any longer endure this your mockery, that perceiveth how contradictory your allegations are? For who can justly accuse those that ye keep shut up in the Temple, because they presumed to punish Traitors whom you grace with the title of Noble and Innocent, because they were your Confederates? Only in N this they are blame-worthy, that they did not begin with you first, but left alive such members of that Conspiracy. Except also you will say, that the Idumeans shut you out of your City, your selves not permitting us to come and offer Sacrifice. But though they were so merciful, yet we the Idumeans will preserve the House of God, and will fight for the common good of our Country, and will be revenged both of the Enemies that are without the City, and the Traitors within. And here will we remain before the City till either the Romans come and deliver you, or till you change your minds, and bestink your selves what advantage it is to have Liberty.

ALL the Idumeans assented with a loud cry to these speeches of Simon. And Jesus departed sorrowful, seeing that the Idumeans would agree to no reason, and that thereby their City should suffer a double War. For the Idumeans were no less disquieted, who took the matter in great disdain that they were not permitted to enter into the City, and also because they thought the Zealots so strong as they had believed, and they themselves were ashamed that they could not help them; so that many repent that they were come thither. Yet would they not for shame return, nothing being done by them: and so rashly placing their Tabernacles near the City Walls, they determined to stay there. But that night there arose a most furious Tempest; for there was a great stormy Wind, and an exceeding great Rain, mixt with fearful Thunder and horrible Lightning, and an Earthquake, with strange Noises; so that all men thought this motion of the Earth would overturn the whole order of Nature, or at least portend some great Calamity. The Idumeans and Townsmen were both of one mind: For they thought that God was angry with them for bearing Arms against their Metropolis, and persuaded themselves that they could not escape death if they continued in their purpose. Ananus and his followers persuaded themselves that they had now overcome them without War, and that God had fought for them against the Idumeans. But they were false Prophets, and what they judged would befall their Enemies, fell upon themselves. In the mean while the Idumeans lay as close together as they could, and covered their heads with their Shields, by which means the Rain did them not so much harm. The Zealots were concern'd for the Idumeans more than for themselves, and devised which way they might succour them. The boldest amongst them advised the rest, by force to set upon the Guard, and so to get into the City, and open the Gates to the Idumeans that were come to help them: for it was easie to surprize the Watch, by reason that many of them were unarmed, and unfit for War; and the Citizens could not easily be assembled together, seeing every man, because of the Tempest kept his house. And though there were danger in the attempt, yet were it better to endure all mischief that might ensue, than to permit such an Army shamefully to perish, who came at their request to help them. But the wiser sort dissuaded the rest from this, seeing both a stronger Watch placed to keep them in, and the City Walls diligently guarded because of the Idumeans: and moreover they could not think that Ananus was careless, but went up and down, first from one Watch, and then to another; yet this night he did not so; nor for slothfulness, but because that the Destinies had so decreed that thereby both he and the Watchmen should perish. For about midnight the storm increasing, the Watchmen fell into a deep sleep.

Then the Zealots determined to file the Bars and Bolts of the Gates asunder, to effect which, they took the Instruments which were consecrated to the Temple; and this attempt was much furthered by the great Wind and Thunder, which made such a noise that they could not be heard: So issuing out of the Temple, they went privily to the Walls, and opened that Gate near which the Idumeans lay: and suspecting that Ananus would make some resistance, they first of all drew their Swords, and then together with the Idumeans came in: and if at that time they had assaulted the City, they had without any let or hindrance destroyed all the People therein; so great was their rage at that time. But first of all they hastened to assist their fellows, whom they left besieged, and requested the Idumeans not to leave them in danger, for whose succour they were come, nor permit them to incur greater damage: for having first surpris'd the Watchmen, it would be more easie for them to assault the City; which if they did not, but first set upon the Citizens, they would presently assemble together, and oppose themselves against them, and not permit them to ascend up into the Temple. The Idumeans consented to this; and so they passed thorow the City into the Temple: and the Zealots remaining in the Temple impatiently expected their coming; at whose arrival they took Courage, and joyning with the Idumeans, came out of the inner Temple, and set upon the Watch: and some being slain who were fast asleep, the rest were awak'd by the cries of others, and so betook themselves to their Arms to defend themselves, being yet amazed. And at first, thinking that they were only the Zealots that gave the Alarm, they hoped only by their multitude to suppress them; but seeing others without the Temple also affailing them, they judg'd that the Idumeans were broken in : so the greater part of them being dismay'd laid down their Weapons, and cried out : and only a few of them, young men, well armed, and of good courage, encountered with the Idumeans, and for a good space defended their idle fellows ; others went and advertised the Inhabitants what was done, yet none durst come to help them, because they now knew that the Idumeans were got in, but every one lamented their hard fortune, and the Women made great lamentation when the Watchmen were slain. The Zealots also answered their cries with the like, and the Tempest and Thunder made all more dreadful. The Idumeans spared none, because they were naturally cruel and fierce to shed blood, and angry that they were so beaten with the Tempest, they used them most cruelly, by whose means they were shut out of the City, sparing neither those who requested favour, nor those who made resistance, for they slew many as they were intreating them to remember that they were of their own blood, and requesting them to spare them for reverence of the Temple. There was no way to flee, nor any hope of escape : and being driven up in a narrow room, they hurt themselves more than the Enemies did, by crowding and treading one upon another ; for there was no place to flee, and their Enemies ceased not to kill them. Being in this desperate estate, not knowing what to do, they cast themselves headlong into the City, and so died a more miserable death than those that died by the Enemies sword. The next day there was found slain eight thousand and five hundred ; and all the outer Temple flowed with blood. Yet this Massacre sufficed not the Idumeans rage ; but turning themselves against the City, they robbed and spoiled all Houses, and kill'd all they met, making no account of the lives of the multitude. They made diligent search for the Priests, and many laid violent hands upon them, and killed them : and standing upon their dead bodies, sometime they upbraided Ananus with the Peoples favour towards him, sometime Jesus with the words he spake upon the Wall to them ; and they were so impious, that they cast away their dead Bodies unburied ; notwithstanding the Jews in this point are so religious, that after Sun-set they take down the dead bodies of Malefactors, who by sentence have been adjudged to the Cross, and bury them.

I think I shall not greatly mis the mark if I affirm Ananus his death to have been the beginning of the destruction of the City, that the Walls of Jerusalem were overthrown ; and the Common-wealth of the Jews perished in that day, when this their High Priest and Governour was so cruelly massacred in the midst of the City. He was of a laudable and just life : and though Great in Dignity, Birth and Reputation, yet would he not exalt himself above any one, were he never so base. He was a man who thirsted to preserve Liberty to his Country, and Authority to the Common-wealth. He continually preferred the Publick Interest before his own Private Gain, and was always desirous of Peace, because he foresaw that the Romans could not be withstood, and that if the Jews did not quickly accord with them, their Ruine was inevitable : and I doubt not but if Ananus had lived, he had succeeded in his design. For he was an eloquent Orator, and could persuade admirably ; and he had already reduced to extremity those false Zealots who caused the War ; and if the Jews had had him for their Captain against the Romans, it had not been so easy for the Romans to have Conquered them. He was seconded by Jesus, who next him excelled all the rest. But I think Almighty God having decreed the total ruine of the City, which was now polluted and filled with Iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were, to purify the holy Temple, which was prophesied, he first took up the Defenders thereof, and those that loved it most dearly. So they who a little before were clothed with the sacred apparel, and revered of all that from the furthest parts of the World came to Jerusalem, now lay murdered and naked in the open streets, left as it were a prey to be torn in pieces by Dogs and wild Beasts. Was Virtue ever more insolently outraged ! And could the without shedding Tears, behold Vice thus triumph over her ?

CHAP. I.

Of another Massacre ; and of the Return of the Idumeans, and the Cruelty of the Zealots.

SUCH was the end of Ananus and Jesus : After whose death the Idumeans and the Zealots massacred the People, as though they had been a flock of pernicious Beasts, and very few escaped the Butchery. The Nobility and chief sort of men were put in Prison, in hope that by deferring their death, some of them would become partakers with them ; Yet none was hereby moved, but every one desired to die, rather than impiously to joyn with these Wretches against their own Country : Whereupon they were most cruelly whipped before they were put to Death, their Bodies being made as it were one fore place by Whipping and Stripes : and when they could not endure these Torments any longer, they were killed. Who so was taken in the day time, was in the night carried to Prison ; and those that died in Prison and Torments, they cast their dead Bodies out, that they might have place to imprison others in their room. The People were terrified, that none durst weep openly for his Friend, nor bury the dead Body of his Kinsman ; yea those that were in Prison durst not openly weep, but secretly, looking about them, lest any of their Enemies should see them. For whosoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himself used in the same manner, as he had been for whom he lamented. Yet sometimes some in the night scraped up a little earth with their hands, and therewithal covered the dead body of their Friend ; and some bolder than the rest did the like in the day-time. And in this general slaughter were twelve thousand young Noblemen slain in this manner. After which, being hated for these Massacres, they mocked and flouted the Magistrates, and made no account of their Judgments. So that when they were determined to put to death Zachary the Son of Baruch, one of the chief of the City, because he was an Enemy to their wickedness, and loved the virtuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not only to have the spoil of his goods, but also to be rid of one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seventy of the best amongst the common People together, as it were in Judgment, with a pretended Authority; and before them they accused Zacharie, that he had betrayed the Common-wealth to the Romans, and for that intent had sent to Vespasian: but they neither shewed any evidence or proof thereof, but only affirmed it to be so; and therefore would have credit given to their words.

When Zacharie perceived that under pretence of being called to Judgment, he was unjustly cast into Prison; though he had no hope of Life, yet he spared not to speak freely his mind, and began to scorn the rage and pretence of his Enemies, and purged himself of the crimes whereof he was accused; and converting his speech against his Accusers, he laid open all their Iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the City.

In the mean-while the Zealots gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely contain themselves from drawing their Swords, and were desirous that their pretended Accusation and Judgment might be ended. He also requested them, who by these Miscreants were appointed his Judges, to remember Justice, notwithstanding the danger they might incur by it. The seventy Judges all pronounced that he was to be absolved and freed as guiltless, and rather chose to die, than to cause his death who was Innocent.

This Sentence being pronounced, the Zealots began to shout and cry with a loud voice; and they all were angry at the Judges, who did not understand to what end that counter-feit Authority was given them. Then two of the boldest amongst them set upon Zacharie and killed him in the midst of the Temple, and insulted over him saying, Thou hast now our Sentence and Absolution, far more certain than the other was: And presently they cast him down from the Temple into the Valley below: and then contumeliously with the Hilts of their Swords they beat the Judges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed throw the whole City, they might tell the People, as Messengers from them, of their miserable condition.

The Idumeans were now sorrowful for their coming, for they misliked these proceedings: and being assembled together, one of the Zealots secretly told them all that their Faction had done from the beginning; that it was true the Idumeans had taken Arms, because they were informed that the Metropolitan City was by the Priests betrayed to the Romans: but they might perceive, there was no proof nor sign of any such matter; and that indeed the Zealots who pretended themselves Defenders of the Liberty of the City, were indeed Enemies, and had exercised Tyranny over the Citizens even from the beginning. And though they had associated themselves with such wicked persons, and made themselves partakers of so many Murders, yet they ought now to cease from such wickedness, and not assist men so impious to destroy their Country and Religion. For though they took it in bad part, that the City Gates were shut upon them, yet now they were sufficiently revenged of those that were the cause thereof. That Ananus himself was slain, and almost all the People in one night (whereof many of them ere long would repent) and that they might now themselves perceive the cruelty of those who requested their aid, to be more than barbarous, had not blushed to commit such Villanies openly, in the sight of them who had saved their lives: and that their misdeeds and impieties would be imputed to the Idumeans, because they neither hindered their mischievous Practices, nor forsook their Society. That therefore it was their part (seeing it was now evident that the report of Treason was only Calumny, and that no assault by the Romans was to be feared; and that the City was impregnable, provided there were no domestic divisions) to depart home, and by forsaking the Society of the Impious, to acquit themselves of their Impiety, as being by them deceived, and so against their Wills made partakers thereof.

The Idumeans were hereby persuaded, and first of all they freed those that were in Prison, in number two thousand of the Vulgar; and presently leaving the City, they went to Simon, (of whom we will speak hereafter) and so they departed home.

Their sudden departure was against the expectation of both parts: for the People not knowing that the Idumeans were sorry for what they had done, rejoiced as now delivered from their Enemies: and the Zealots grew more insolent and proud, as though they never had needed help, and now were delivered from those, in consideration of whom they obtained from some Villanies. Whereupon they used no delay to effect all their Villany: for they spent not much time in taking advice; but whatsoever seemed best to them, presently without any delay they put it in practice. But especially they murdered those men that were wise and valiant; for they envied the Nobility

A Nobility for their Virtue: they thought it a principal point first to be effected, not to leave any one man of account alive. Wherefore they slew amongst the rest Gorion, a Noble-man of great Birth and Dignity, who loved his Country, was very bountiful, and a lover of Liberty; so that there was none amongst the Jews like him; but for his desire of Liberty, and his other Virtues he was put to death. Neither could Niger Perata escape their hands, a man who in War against the Romans had shewed himself valiant: and although he often cried out and shewed the fears of his Wounds received in defence of his Country; yet they ceased not for all this most shamefully to drag him thorough the City: and being led out of the City, despairing of life, he entreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous People denied his request and slew him. At his death he besought God that the Romans might come and revenge it upon them, and that Plague, Famine and Civil Discord might light upon their City.

God heard his Prayers, and sent upon them all which he impetreated; and first of all, they were plagued with Civil Wars amongst themselves. Niger being thus slain, they were freed from the fear they had of him, that he would resist their wickedness. Many of the Common People were by some forged tale or other put to death. Some were slain, because they had formerly born Arms against them; and they who were innocent in all points, were put to death for some occasion devised in the time of peace: and they who did not converse with them, were murdered as those that contemned them; and they that freely and friendly conversed with them, were slain as those that sought to betray them. In short, the greatest offenders and the least were all punished alike, to wit, with death: for no man escaped, except he were either poor, or of very base condition.

The Civil Disorders amongst the Jews.

D IN the mean while the Roman Officers had their Eyes open upon what passed in the City of Jerusalem; and seeing the Citizens at great variance among themselves, they thought this to be for their great advantage. Wherefore they pressed Vespasian their General not to lose this opportunity, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Jews should be at Civil Discord among themselves; and that therefore he should not overlook so good an occasion, lest the Jews should quickly be friends again one with another, either by the weariness of Civil War, or else repenting themselves of that which they had done. To whom Vespasian answered, That they were ignorant what was to be done, and desirous rather as it were in a Theater to show their forces and strength, than with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. For (said he) if we presently assault them, our coming will make concern amongst our Enemies, and so we shall bring upon our selves their forces yet firm and strong; but by expecting a little while, we shall have less ado to conquer them, their chiefest forces being destroyed by their own Civil War. God is more our friend than you are aware of; who without our labour and pain will deliver the Jews into our hands, and will give us the Victory without endangering our Army. Wherefore it is rather our part to be beholders of the Tragedy, than to fight against men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest evil possible, to wit, domestic Sedition, and Civil War. And if any think that the Victory is not glorious, because gotten without fight, let him know and consider the uncertain events of War: and that it is better, if it be possible, to get a Victory without bloodshed, than therewith to hazard a Defeat. For they who by Counsel and Advice do any worthy Act, deserve no less praise than they who by force of Arms achieve a Victory. Moreover, in the mean time that the Enemies destroy one another, our Soldiers may take rest, and so be stronger and better able to fight when need shall require. Besides, it seems not that there is much haste required to get the Victory: for the Jews neither prepare Arms nor Engines of War, nor levie any Forces, nor seek for Aid; and so by delay no damage can ensue; but they will Plague one another more by Civil War, than our Army can by attacking their City. And therefore whether we consider Prudence or Glory, we have nothing to do but let them ruin themselves; for in case we should even at this present make our selves Masters of that great City; so it would be justly said, that the Victory was not to be imputed to us, but to their discord.

G The Captains all consented, and thought this advice of Vespasian best: and presently it appeared how profitable this Counsel was. For every day many Jews fled to him to escape the hands of the Zealots; though it was dangerous to flee, because all the ways to were guarded with Watch-men. And if any man upon any occasion whatsoever were taken upon the way, he was presently killed, as one who intended to have fled to the Romans: Yet if any one fed'd the Watch-men with money, he escaped away safely; and he that did not, was counted as a Traitor: so that only rich men could escape, and the poor were left to the slaughter. The multitude of the dead bodies that lay on heaps together was innumerable, and through the horror of which sight, many of those who had fled to the Romans, returned again into the City, choosing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native soil, made death there seem more tolerable. But the Zealots became so cruel, that they neither permitted them who were slain within, nor them without the City to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their County-Laws to abolish the Law of Nature, yea and by their impiecy to defy God himself, let the dead Bodies rot above ground; and who-soever attempted to bury any of them that were slain, whether Friend or Kinsman, he was presently put to death, and left unburied; and to give Sepulchre to another, was crime enough to deserve it.

To be brief, nothing so much increased their indignation as Mercy: for the wicked People were herewith provoked to wrath; their displeasure and cruelty was extended from the living to the dead, and from the dead to the living. And such fear fell upon the whole City, that those that were left alive, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in Prison, in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselves more unhappy than they who lay unburied. All humane Justice was perverted, and they scorned and mocked at all divine and holy things, and proudly derided the Oracles of the Prophets, esteeming them as Fables and Jests. But having now contemned all Laws, established by their fore-fathers for the punishment of Vice and increasing of Virtue, at last they found that true which was fore-told, concerning the Destruction of themselves and their Country: For there was an old Prophecy, that when Sedition reigned amongst them, and their own hands had violated the Temple of God and holy things; then their City should be destroyed by War, and their holy Places burned with fire, according to the manner and custom of War.

CHAP. III.

How Gadara was yielded: and of the Massacre there.

But John who long ago aspired to be Tyrant over all the rest, could not endure that others should partake in Authority with him; wherefore by little and little he divided himself from their union and fellowship; after he had drawn to himself such as by their impious life were capable of the greatest crimes, so that now every one perceived (in that he always neglected what others commanded, and imperiously commanded what himself thought good) that he affected Principality. Many joyed to him for fear, some for favour (for he had a smooth tongue, able to persuade to what he would); many also followed him, thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, than upon them all. Moreover, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to give polittick counsel, he wanted not followers, not withstanding that many of the contrary faction left him, envying that he, who before was their equal, should now be their Master and Commander. Fear also terrified them from living under the Government of one man; for they thought that if he once prevailed, he could not easily be overcome: and again, if he were deposed, that he would pick quarrels against them in the end, because that they resented him in the beginning. So every man determined rather to suffer all misery in War, then to submit himself, and become a Slave. Thus the parties were divided, and John was chief of one Faction: so between them they appointed Guards in every place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or no hurt to one another: but the chief contention was, who should bear most sway amongst the People, and who should have the greatest part of the Spoil. Thus the City at one time was vexed with three intolerable mischiefs and evils, to wit, War, Tyranny, and Sedition: and yet the War seemed a less evil than the rest to the Commonalty. Wherefore many leaving their native soil, fled to strangers for succour, and found among the Romans safety, who with their own Nation lived in continual danger. There was also

A also added a fourth evil, which wrought the ruine of the whole Nation. Not far from the City there was a Castle called Massada, built by the ancient Kings of Jerusalem, very strong, to lay up their treasure and munition for War, and to retire themselves there-into in time of need, for the safety of their persons. This Castle was taken and kept by that sort of Thieves that were called Scarii, by reason of their final number durst Rob no more openly. These Thieves seeing the Roman Army now idle, and the people in Jerusalem at civil War and Sedition among themselves, took courage, and again fell to their Villanies. And so on that day, which is the Feast of unleavened Bread (which the Jews keep holy, in memory of their deliverance from the Egyptian Captivity) deceiving the Watchmen, they seized upon a Fort, called Engadda: and before the Townsmen could arm and unite themselves together, they were by these persons driven out of the Town; who also killed them that could not flee, to wit, Women and Children, to the number of more than seven hundred; and so facking the Houses, and taking the Fruits that were now ripe, they carried all to Massada: and so they wasted all the Villages and whole Country round about them, many wicked persons daily flocking unto them, and joining with them: and by their example, other Thieves that a while had been quiet, now robbed again, and spoiled in every part of Judea. And as in a body, if the principal member thereof be sick, all other parts of it are afflicted; so Jerusalem being filled with tumults and discord, those that were without the City found licence to rob and spoil: and all those that had their Towns destroyed where they were wont to inhabit, went into the Wilderneys; where assembling and uniting themselves together, not so many as an Army, yet more than a Company of Thieves, they broke into the Towns and Temples; and, as in War it cometh to pass, the Country people purposed to assault them, by whom they had suffered such injury: but they were prevented; for the Thieves understanding their coming, fled with the spoil they had gotten. And there was no part of Judea, that did not suffer together with Jerusalem their Mother-City. Those that fled to the Romans, certified Vespasian hereof: for although the seditious persons kept and observ'd all passages, and kill'd them that offered to fly, yet many secretly stole away from them, and besought Vespasian, both to help the oppressed City, and to take compassion upon the reliques of their Nation: affirming, that many had been butchered for wishing well to the Romans; and many being yet alive, were yet in great danger. Vespasian moved to compassionate their calamities, came with his Army nearer Jerusalem, as though he would have besieged it (but indeed his intent was to deliver it from the oppression of these wicked persons, who in a manner kept it continually besieged,) hoping in the mean time to conquer that part of the Country that was yet untouched, and so to leave nothing to hinder him when he should begin the siege. Wherefore coming to Gadara, the strongest of all the Cities beyond the River, he entered into it the fourth day of March: for the Chiefest of the City, unknown to the seditious people, had sent Embassadors to him to desire Peace; and to save their goods and lives, they promised him to yield the Town into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: but their Enemies knew not of their Embassy, till they saw Vespasian at the City Gates. And so despairing that they were able to keep the City, by reason they had in the Town many Enemies more in number and stronger than themselves; and moreover, seeing Vespasian even now almost at the City: and thinking shame to flee, and not to be revenged of their Enemies, they took Dolus (a Noble man and chief of the City, and also the Author of that Embassy) and killed him; and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the City. Now the Romans Army approaching near the City, the people of Gadara went forth and received Vespasian joyfully, who also confirmed a League betwixt them and him, and left them a Company of Horse and Foot to defend them against the incursions of the Fugitives their Enemies: for they themselves, before the Romans requested it, destroyed the City Walls, that so they might shew their desire of Peace; because having destroyed their Walls, if after they desired to rebel, they could not.

Vespasian then sent Placidus with five hundred Horsemen, and three thousand Footmen to pursue those that were fled out of Gadara; and he with the rest of his Army returned to Cesarea. But the Fugitives perceiving themselves to be pursued by Placidus, before he could overtake them, got into a Town called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arm themselves, and so rashly they came against Placidus. Placidus and his Army seemed a little to give back, to the intent to draw them further from the Wall; and then having compassed them about in a fit place, they wound-wounded them afar off with Darts and Arrows. The Jews seeking to flee, were prevented by the Horsemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Romans Footmen all put to the Sword, never shewing any sign of valour. For the Jews assaulted the Romans, who were all covered with their Shields as with a Wall; and not being able to break into their battle, they were slain by the Romans Darts: but their Darts could do the Romans no harm: and so like fierce and Savage Beasts they wilfully ran upon their Enemies Swords, and all were either slain, or dispersed by the Horsemen. For Placidus was careful to intercept their passage to the Town; and to hinder their recourse unto it, and forced those back again that fled towards it, using his Darts, and killing those that were next him; till at last the strongest amongst them broke away, and got to the Town Walls. Those that were within the City knew not what to do, for they would not shut the Fugitives of Gadara out of the City, because they desired to let their own Citizens in; and again they perceived that if they let these in, the other thereby would work the overthrow of the City, as it fell out indeed they did. For the Gates being set open for them to come in, the Roman Horsemen almost broke into the Town with them; yet the Gates were shut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his Souldiers assaulted the Town, and after a fore fight which continued till the Evening, at last he got the Walls, and the Town, and slew the weaker sort, for the stronger fled: so the Souldiers first sacked the Houses, and then fired the Town. They who escaped thence, incited the whole Country to fly with them, reporting their Calamities with the most, and affirming that all the Roman Army was at hand: and so they put all the Inhabitants there in great fear, and having assembled a great multitude, they fled to Jericho, in which place they put their confidence, for that it was strong and populous, Placidus having Horsemen, and encouraged with his former Victory, pursued them to Jordan, and whomsoever he overtook he slew, and at the River he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; because that the River being grown deeper by abundance of Rain that had lately fallen, they could not pass over it.

Placidus Victory over the Fugitives.

Placidus made use of his good Fortune against the Jews.

Wherefore necessity forced them to fight, because they could not flee: and placing themselves along the Banks of the River, they there received the Horsemen, and warded their Darts. Many for fear fell into the River; and the Romans slew there 13000; and the rest not able to resist, cast themselves into the River; which were an infinite number: also the Romans took 2200 men alive, and a great booty of Sheep, Asses, Camels, and Oxen. This Slaughter though it was no greater than the former, yet it seemed to the Jews far greater, because that many all over the Country flying were killed, and Jordan was so filled with dead Carcasses, that none could pass over it: and also the Lake Asphaltites, was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of divers Rivers. Placidus having so good success, went to the Towns and Villages adjoynd, and took Abila, Julias, Besemeth, and all the Towns even to the Lake Asphaltites, and placed in them Garisons of the Jews that had fled to him: and afterward preparing Ships and furnishing them with Souldiers, he pursued them that were fled by Water, and overcome them. So all the Country beyond Jordan as far as Macheron, was reduc'd under the Power of the Romans.

CHAP. IV

How certain Towns were taken; the Description of Jericho.

At this time came news of the troubles in Gallia; and how that Vindex, together with the Nobility of that Country had revolted from Nero; whereof we have made mention in another place. This news caused Vespasian to be more earnest to end the Wars of the Jews: for even then he foresaw the Civil War that ensued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of those troubles end the Wars in the East part of the World, that then Italy was not in so much danger. But Winter hindring him, he in the mean time placed Garisons in all Towns and Villages about the whole Country, and appointed Officers in every City, and repaired many places, which he had before destroyed. And first of all, he with his whole Army that was at Cesarea marched to Antipatris; and having seized the Estate of that City, after his abode there two days, the third day he departed, spoiling and burning all the Country: as also all the Country about

A of Thamnia the Toparchy, and so went to Lydda and Jamnia. But seeing that those two places submitted themselves unto him, he left there such Inhabitants as he thought good, and went thence to Ammaus; and placing himself in the way to Jerusalem, he there entrenched his Camp, and leaving the fifth Legion there, with the rest he went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout, as also the Borders of Lamca: but he reserved certain Castles in fit places and fortified them. And having taken two Towns in the midst of Lamca, to wit, Begabris, and Caphartopha, he slew there above ten thousand men, and took almost a thousand; and driving out the rest of the Inhabitants, he left a great part of his Army there, who made Incursions, and waited all the High Places thereabout: with the rest he returned to Jamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the Inhabitants Naborsba. The second day of June, he came to Gorea; and pitching his Tent there, the next day he came to Jericho, where one of his Captains, named Trajan, met him with the Souldiers he brought from beyond Jordan, which place he had conquered. But before the Romans came, many fled from Jericho into the high Country over against Jerusalem; and many that stayed behind were there slain. So he found the City desolate, being situate in a Plain, under a great barren Mountain, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the North side, to the Borders of Sybbopolis, and on the South to the Borders of Sodom and the Lake of Asphaltites. It is Rocky, and not inhabited, because it beareth no fruit. Over against this, near Jordan, is situate another Mountain, beginning on the North-side at Julias, and reaching to Bacra on the South, which is the Limits of Petra, a City of Arabia. In this place is that Mountain which is called the Mountain of Iron, reaching to the Country of the Moabites.

The Country between these two Mountains is called the Great Field, reaching from the Village Gennabara to the Lake of Asphaltites, being in length two hundred and thirty Furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twenty; in the midst it is divided by the River Jordan. There are also two Lakes of contrary natures, Asphaltites, and Tiberias; for one of them is Salt and hath no Fish, but that of Tiberias sweet and abounds with Fish. This Plain in Summer time is burnt with the heat of the Sun, and the Air is infected in all places thereabouts, save only about Jordan: and this is the cause that the Palm-trees that grow about the River side do flourish most, and are more fertile than the rest. Near Jericho there is a large great Fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and riseth with a great stream out of the ground near the old City: which Jesbus the Son of Nam, General of the Hebrews, took by War, the first of all that he took in the Land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the Waters of this Fountain destroy'd all Fruits of the Earth, and also made Women be delivered before their time, and infected all places with diseases, and the plague; but afterward by Elisba, the successor of Elis, was made sweet and good for conception, which happened in this manner: That admirable person being once courteously entertained by the Inhabitants of Jericho, did thus reward them, and

E all the Country for that their kindness, and going unto the Fountain, he cast a Pitcher full of Salt into the Water; and lifting up his hands to Heaven, and tempering with this Fountain-Water certain sweet Waters, he prayed God to amend the ill qualities thereof, and to make it flow with more sweet Streams: which both might cause plenty of Fruits, and also of Children, to the Inhabitants: and that the Water might have the virtue to make Women Fruitful, so long as they persisted in piety. These prayers had the Power to alter the Fountain: and from that time, this Fountain which before was the cause of Famine and Sterility, became the cause of Plenty and Fertility. And so it watereth the ground, that where a little of it cometh, it doth more good than all other waters which lie long upon it: and so they that water their grounds but a little with it, receive much Fruit; and they that water their Grounds with it much, do not receive them in that measure; yet it watereth a greater compass of ground than other Fountains: and in length it runneth through a Plain seventy Furlongs long, and twenty broad. Here are most pleasant and goodly Orchards, and many sorts of Palm-trees growing by brooks sides, which are divers in the taste of their Fruits: the fattest whereof being pressed, yield a juice like Honey, nothing inferior to other Honey: yet there is great store of Honey in the Country, and the juice of Balm, which is more precious than all other Fruits whatsoever. Here grow also Cyprus-Trees and Myrabolans: so that one may justly say that this part of the Earth hath something Divine, where what Fruit soever is most dear and precious, is in most abundance. Also in all other Fruits it surpasseth all Countries in the World: for all things multiply and increase crease sooner there. The cause hereof I judge to be these pleasant Waters, and the warm nourishing Air, which gently inviteth all things to spring up, and then encrease them : as the moisture causeth all things to take firm root, and also defendeth them from drought in Summer time, when the Country is vexed with such intolerable heats, that all things are scorched, so that nothing then will grow ; yet if they be watered with Water drawn before Sun-rise, by the blowing of a mild and temperate wind, it is refreshed, and it receives a contrary nature : In Winter-time it is almost luke-warm and temperate to them that go into it. The Air here is so temperate, that when it snoweth in other parts of Judea, and is extreme cold, the Inhabitants in this place only wear a linen Garment. This Country is distant from Jerusalem a hundred and fifty Furlongs, and threecore from Jordan ; and all the ground betwixt it and Jerusalem is desert and stony, and so likewise between it and Jordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground than the other. Thus we have sufficiently declared the fertility of Jericho.

CHAP. V.

IT is worth the labour to describe the Lake Asphaltites, which is Salt and incapable of feeding Fish, yet what ever is cast into it, how weighty soever it be, it swimmeth above the Water : so that one, though he would on purpose, cannot sink to the bottom. Vespasian coming thither to see it, took men who could not swim, and caus'd their hands to be bound behind them, and cast them into the midst thereof, and all of them came up to the Top of the Water, as if some Wind had forc'd them from the bottom. Moreover, it is admirable, how this Lake thrice in every day changeth colour, and shineth diversly, according as the beams of the Sun sundry ways fall upon it. And in many places it catcheth up pieces of black Bitumen, in greenish and shape like a Bull without a head ; and these float above the Water. They that live upon this Water by gathering this Bitumen, draw it to their Boats, and it is so tough and clammy, that having filled their Boats herewith, it is not easie for them to get them away, but their Boat is as it were fastened, and hangeth upon the rest of that mass of bituminous matter, till it be separated from it by the terms or urine of a Woman. This bituminous matter is good to close the rifts of Ships, and also to cure many diseases. This Lake is five hundred and eighty Furlongs long, extending to Zoar which is in Arabia ; and it is a hundred and fifty Furlongs broad. Near this Lake is the Land of Sodom and Gomorrab, sometime both fertile and rich : now all burnt, having been for the impiety of the Inhabitants consumed with lightning and thunder. To be short, one may here behold as it were the reliques of that *M*iracle that by Gods appointment destroyed the place : for one may yet see some remainders of those five Cities, and Trees and Fruits springing up in the ashes : which fruit to the Eye seemeth like other fruits ; but if you handle them, they fall into ashes and smook. And so the History of the destruction of Sodom is verifi'd to the Eye of them that behold it.

CHAP. VI.

How Gerasa was destroyed : of Nero's Death, and of Galba and Otho.

Vespasian desirous to besiege Jerusalem on every side, built Castles at Jericho and Adidas, and left there Garisons of the Souldiers that came to assist him, and also Romans with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa with a Body of Foot and Horse ; who at the first assault took the City, and slew a thousand young men, who had not time to flee, and made whole Families Slaves, giving the Souldiers the spoil of their goods : and so firing their Houses, he went to other places adjoining. They who were able, fled, and the weaker sort who could not flee, were slain : and whatsoever came in their way they consumed with fire. Thus all places both Mountains and Plains *O*f being wasted and ruined with War, the Inhabitants of Jerusalem had no whither to go, when

A when they desired to flee from the Zelots by whom they were kept in. And they themselves who were against the Romans, were also kept in ; the City being on every side enclosed and encompassed with the Roman Army.

After Vespasian was returned to Cesarea, and with all his Army purposed to go to Jerusalem, news was brought him that Nero was slain, having reigned thirteen years and eight days. Touching whom I will not recount how he dishonour'd the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the Common-wealth to two most wicked men, to wit, Nimphidius and Tigellinus, who were of least worth amongst all his Freed-men : and how being betrayed by these two men, he was forsaken of all his Guards ; and so fled only with four trusty Freed-men into the Suburbs, and there kill'd himself : And how that sometime after, they that deposed him were punished for that offence : And how the *B*ey was ended in Gallia ; and that Galba being created Emperor, returned to Rome out of Spain : and how he was accused of Cowardize by the Souldiers, and by them killed in the Market-place, as one of base condition : and how Otho was declared Emperor, and led his Souldiers against Vitellius : also Vitellius his troubles and his fight before the Capitol : and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus slew Vitellius, and so appeased the German Troops and the Civil War. Of all these I have toborn to speak, because I presume both the Greeks and Romans have written these things at large ; yet I have briefly recapitulated this to continue my History.

After Vespasian heard this news, he deferred the Siege of Jerusalem, expecting who should be created Emperor after Nero. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to do nothing, but lie quiet till such time as he should write to him his mind, whether he would have him proceed in the War against the Jews. And he sent to him his Son Titus, both to salute him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Jews. Likewise, King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause to Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with long Ships in Winter time, as the Custom is, news was brought that Galba was slain, having reigned seven Months and seven days : After whom succeeded Otho, who governed the Empire three Months. Agrippa not dismayed with this alteration, still kept on his Journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would have it) returned from Achaia to Syria, and so to Cesarea to his Father. They both were in suspense what would ensue, and who should be Emperor, the Empire being so full of trouble : and so they neglected the War against the Jews, fearing for their own Country, and therefore thinking it an unfit time to invade Strangers.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon of Gerasa, Author of a new Conspiracy.

IN the meantime a new War broke out at Jerusalem among the Jews ; For there was one Simon the Son of Giora born in Gerasa, young in years, and inferior to John in subtilty, who now already had gotten the dominion over the City ; yet in *V*igor and Boldness exceeded John. This Simon having been for this cause also driven out of the Country of Acrabates ; where he was Governor, by the means of Ananus the high Priest, came to the Thieves that seized upon Massada. At his first coming he was so suspected by the Thieves, that they only permitted him, and the Women that came with him, to dwell in the lower part of the Castle, and they themselves kept the higher part : yet afterwards, his manners and behaviour was such that they put confidence in him, and he became their Captain always when they went to spoil and rob any part of the Country about Massada. After which he did all that he could to persuade them to attempt greater matters : for being desirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high Places of the Country, and with the voice of a Crier proclaimed, that all Bond-slaves that would follow him should have their Liberty, and all others should be richly rewarded ; by which means he gathered together all the wicked and desperate People in the Country. And having now a considerable Army, he robbed and spoiled all the Towns and Villages thereabouts ; and his number daily encreasing, he also presumed to come into the plain Countries : so that now Cities stood in awe of him, and many considerable persons fearing him for his strength and prosperous success, joyed with him. So that his Army did not only consist of Thieves and G Slaves, but many People of the Country came to him, reverencing him as their Prince and King ; and they made Excursions into the Toparchy of Acrabates, and into the greater greater Idumea. For he had fortified a Town called Nain, wall'd about, which he us'd for his Retreat. And in the Valley called Pharan, he made many Caves, and found many already made, and in these Caves he kept his Treasure, and the Booties he got: also all Fruits of the Earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid up in store; as also Ammunition for many Companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with Men and Ammunition he would go to Jerusalem. The Zealots fearing this, and desirous to prevent him who they saw every day encreased his number, and grew more potent against them; they armed many of their Company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly encountered them, and gave them so sharp a Battle, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselves into the Town; yet not having men sufficient, he would not besiege the Town; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumea; and so accompanied with 20000 armed men, he hastened towards the borders thereof.

The Princes of Idumea understanding this, presently assembled five and twenty thousand armed men: and leaving at home sufficient Garrisons to defend their Country against the Scarii, who held the Fortrefs of Massada, they accompanied with these Forces, went out and expected Simons coming into the borders of their Country, where having met him they joyned battle, and fought a whole day; yet it appeared not which part got the Victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumeans home. Not long after Simon with a greater Army than before, assailed the borders of their Country, and pitching his Tents in a Village called Thecue, he sent one of his Companions, named Eleazar, to them that kept the Castle Herodium, not far from that place, to solicit them to yield it to him. The Garrison there presently received him into the Castle, not knowing the cause of his coming. But so soon as he began to persuade them to Treason, they drew their Swords to kill him: and he not having any place to flee to, cast himself from off the Castle Wall into the Valley underneath, and so died.

The Idumeans something fearing Simons Forces, before they would offer him Battle, thought best to espie what number of men he had: to effect which business, one Jacob a Captain among them offered himself, meaning indeed to betray his Country to Simon. So departing from Olarii, where the Idumean Forces were assembled, he went to Simon, and promised him to betray his Country to him, receiving of him an Oath, that for reward of this deed he should be always next in dignity to Simon himself, and so he presently promised to help subdue all Idumea. For this cause he was welcome to Simon, and seated liberally, and had great Promises if he performed that which he offered; and then returned to the Idumeans; and fained that Simons Army was far greater than indeed it was. And so terrifying the Governours of his Country, and the People, he by little and little persuaded them to receive Simon, and without any more fight to yield to him the Sovereign Authority over them.

Jacob studying to bring this his purpose to pass, privily sent Messengers to Simon, willing him to come with his Forces, and promising him to dissipate the Idumeans for him, which he also did. For when Simons Army drew near, he first of all got upon his Horse, and together with his Associates that were partakers of his Treason, fled to the Enemy. Then fear fell on the Idumeans; and every one without any more ado fled home.

Thus Simon against his own expectation entered Idumea without blood-shed: and first of all assailing a little Village called Chebron, he took it, and in it an exceeding great Booty, a great quantity of Corn, and many Fruits; all which he carried away. The Inhabitants report that this Chebron is not only more ancient than all Cities of that Land, but also than Memphis in Aegypt; for they affirm it to have been built two thousand three hundred years since. They also say, that this was the place where Abraham N the Father of the Jews dwelt, after he forsook Mesopotamia; and that his Posterity departed from thence to Aegypt. Indeed there are yet seen Monuments in the City, richly wrought in fine Marble.

Six Furlongs from the Town there is an exceeding great Turpentine Tree, which they affirm to have endured ever since the Creation of the World, until this day.

Simon having obtained this place, from hence invaded all Idumea, and not only robbed and spoiled all the Towns and Cities thereof, but also wasted and destroyed much of the Country: for besides his Army, there followed him forty thousand men, so that he could not find Victuals for such a Multitude. Moreover, besides this Calamity that he brought upon Idumea, he exercised great Cruelty and Outrage upon the Country, and caused great spoil therein. And as after great swarms of Locusts, the Trees and Woods are dispoiled, so wheresoever Simon had been, all the Country was left desolate.

And

A And either by fire, or by ruiningating places where he came, or else by treading upon the Corn-Fields with the feet of his Army, or by destroying such as they found, they left nothing standing or growing either in Field or Town: and only by passing thorough fertile places, he made the fields harder than barren ground; and left no sign, in places which he had destroyed, that ever they had been tilled.

Hereat the Zealots were again animated against him; yet durst they not fight with him in open field: but placing Ambushes in the way he was to pass, they took Simons Wife, and many of her Servants, and so came again into the City, rejoicing as though they had taken Simon himself. For they persuaded themselves, that Simon would presently lay down Arms, and come in humble manner to entreat them to restore him his Wife. But Simon was not moved with compassion for the loss of his Wife, but with fury: and coming to the Walls of Jerusalem, like a cruel Beast that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed all he met. And taking them that went out of the City to gather Herbs and Wood, he caused them to be whipt to death, whether they were young or old: This cruelty seemed only wanting in him, that he did not eat the flesh of the dead Bodies. Also he took many and cut off their hands, and so sent them into the City, thereby to terrifie his Enemies, and to cause the People to abandon the Zealots: and he had them tell the Citizens, that except they presently restored his Wife to him, he swore by God who governed all, that he would break down their Walls, and use all he found in the City after that fashion, and that he would spare no age, nor respect the innocent more than the guilty. These his threats did not only terrifie the People, but also the Zealots, inasmuch that they sent him his Wife again; and so his anger being somewhat allwaged, he ceased a while from his Murders.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Vespasian.

D NOT only in Judea, but also in Italy at this time was Civil War: for Galba was slain in the midst of Rome; after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought against Vitellius, who affected the Empire, being chosen Emperour by the German Legions. The Battel was fought near Bebrias, a Town in Gallia Cisalpine; the first day, Otho got the Victory against Valens and Cecinna, the Generals of Vitellius his Army. But the day following they overcame Otho: and so many being slain on both parts, and news being brought that Vitellius his Army had gotten the Victory, Otho being at Brixels slew himself, when he had held the Empire three Months and two days. Otho's Souldiers turned to Vitellius his Captains, and joyned with them, and so Vitellius came to Rome with his Army. In the mean time Vespasian the fifth day of June departed from Cesarea, and went to those parts of Judea, which were yet unconquered: and first of all he went into the high Countreys, and subdued the two Toparchies of Acrabateia and Gophnitis, and after them two Towns called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed Garrisons in them, and so went to Jerusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and taking many Captives.

One of his Captains, called Cerealis, with a party of Horse and Foot, wasted all the higher Idumea: and in the way as he went, he took Caphetra a Castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Gapharis, enclosed with a strong Wall: by reason of which he deemed he should have made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the Inhabitants opened the Gates to him, and yielded themselves, beseeching him to be good to them. When he had overcome them he went to Hebron, an ancient City, and set it on fire; this Hebron, as I have already said, was situated upon the Mountains, and near Jerusalem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the City. And having subdued all places, save only three Castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves, now only Jerusalem remained to be Conquered.

the Temple,
whence the Zealots flee.

After Simon had recovered his Wife from the Zealots, he went into Idumea, to rob and spoil that which was left: and chasing the Inhabitants up and down, at last he forced them to flee to Jerusalem, and he himself pursued them thither; and at the foot of the Walls, he killed all the People he took, that returned out of the fields from their labour. Thus Simon without the City, was more terrible to the People than the Zealots, and the Zealots within the City crueller than them both, being encouraged and incited thereto by the counsel of the Galileans. For they had put John in Authority: and John in reward thereof permitted all things to be done as they requested. There was no end of robbing and spoiling rich mens Houses, and of slaughtering both of Men and Women, and to kill Men and Women was but a Pastime. And having with blood bedewed their prey, and without all fear gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after Women: yea they became effeminate and lascivious, they curl their Hair, and clothed themselves in Womens Apparel, and anointed themselves with sweet Ointments, that their beauty might be pleasing and alluring; they now not only imitate the Attire of Prostitutes, but also their impudency, and became so shameless, that they thirsted after unnatural pleasures, as though Jerusalem were become a Stew, and so profaned the whole City with their execrable impurities. Yet though they effeminated their Faces, their Hands were prone to blood-shed; and though they lived in ignominious manner, as People given over to pleasure, yet could they quickly become Warriors, and in the habits of Women, drawing their Swords they killed whomsoever they met. Whosoever escaped Johns hands, Simon the more cruel murdered; and whosoever escaped the Tyrant within the City, was slain by the Tyrant without; and there was no way to flee to the Romans.

Furthermore, the Army of John began to be divided, for all the Idumeans separated themselves from the other People, and there rose a mutiny against the Tyrant, partly through envy of his Power, partly through hatred of his Cruelty. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zealots, and compelled the rest to fly into the Kings house, built by Graptus, Father of Izat, King of Adiabena. The Idumeans also broke in thither with them, and drave them from thence into the Temple, and seized upon Johns Treasure: for John lived in the Palace, and had carried thither all his Spoils. Then those Zealots that were dispersed in the City, came to those that were in the Temple, and John purposed to send them against the Townsmen and the Idumeans. But they feared not so much their Forces (although they knew them to be the better Warriors,) as they did, lest now being desperate, they should flee out of the Temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the City. Wherefore assembling themselves, they deliberated with the Priests how to avoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turn their own Counsel to their destruction, and that they should provide a Remedy of safety, far worse than Death itself. For to depose John, they devised to introduce Simon, and as it were to intreat another to Tyrannize over them. This counsel was thought best; and Matthias the Priest was sent to Simon (of whom before they stood in great fear) to request him to come into the City. With him also came such as had fled from Jerusalem for fear of the Zealots, intreating him in like manner, because they desired to return to their Wives and Families. So he entered into the City proudly, promising them to be their Deliverer; and all the People made Acclamations as he entered into the City, that he was their Preserver. Simon being now within the City, presently deliberated with those about him, to establish his Dominion, thinking as well those that called him into the City, as those against whom he was called, his Enemies. John and the Zealots with him finding no way to come out of the Temple, and having lost all that he had in the City (for Simon and his Followers, at their entrance, took all that belonged to him) began now to despair of his safety. And Simon, being assisted by the Citizens, assaulted the Temple, and the Zealots placing themselves upon the Porches, and in Towers of Defence, made resistance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zealots were upon the higher ground on the right hand, and so had the advantage against Simon. And although by reason of the place wherein they were, they prevailed against Simon, yet they raised four high Towers, that from hence they might shoot Darts and Arrows against Simons Men. One of these Towers they built upon the East side

A side of the Temple, another on the North, the third upon a place opposite to the lower part of the Town; and a fourth Tower they built on the top of the place called Paslephorum, where one of the Priests used to stand before Sun-set, to signify to the People other holy dayes, and in what dayes they might go about their business. In these Towers they placed all kind of Engines to cast Stones, and Men with Slings. Then Simon perceiving many of his Souldiers languish, was more remiss in his business; yet when his number increased, he came nearer; for a far off many of his men were slain with the Shot of those Engines.

CHAP. X.

How Vespasian was Elected Emperor.

At this time Rome also suffered the Evils of Civil War; for Vitellius was now arrived out of Germany with his Army, bringing besides them an infinite multitude with him; so that his Army was so great, that the places appointed for quartering his Souldiers could not contain it: insomuch that his Army occupied all the whole City, and every House was filled with Souldiers. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater than ever they saw any, and admiring their abundance of Gold and Silver, not able to contain themselves, began to rob and kill every one that sought to hinder them. And this was the estate of the affairs in Italy. Vespasian having waited all about Jerusalem, returned to Caesarea, where he understood the troubles at Rome, and how Vitellius was Emperour. Hereat, though he knew as well to obey, as to be obeyed; yet he was moved with indignation, and disinclined to call him Lord, who had invaded the Empire being destitute of a Ruler. And much grieved hereat, he could not conceal his grief, nor follow the Wars against Strangers whilst his own Country was so endangered. But the distance between him and Rome did as much repress him, as anger incited him to seek revenge: for he considered that Fortune might cause many alterations before he could get to Rome, especially, it being Winter: and so he sought to bridle his wrath, which yet daily increased. But his Officers and Souldiers began openly to consult of a Change, and with indignation exclaimed against the Souldiers at Rome, who lived in pleasure, and never heard so much as the report of War; and notwithstanding took upon them to create whom they pleased Emperour, and in hope of gain disposed of the Common wealth at their own pleasure: whereas they on the contrary after so many labours and dangers, still continued in Arms till they became old and gray-headed, and suffered the Authority due to themselves, to be enjoyed by others; when notwithstanding they had amongst them one who deserved the Empire more than any other; and hereafter to shew themselves grateful to him for the benefits from him received, if they now omitted this occasion? And they thought that Vespasian was so much more worthy of the Empire than Vitellius, by how much they who created Vitellius Emperour, were in many respects much inferior to themselves. For (said they) we have endured no less, yet than those that came out of Germany: neither are we less Valiant than they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would resist Vespasian: For the Senate, and the People of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his unsatiable Lust, than Vespasian's Chastity and Temperance; nor a cruel Tyrant rather than a good and courteous Emperour, whose Son also was of extraordinary Merit, and deserved the Empire. For true Valour in an Emperour is a great defence of Peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged Experience, they had Vespasian; if to Valiant Youth, they had amongst them Titus: that they might reap commodity by both their Ages: and that they would not only assist him with the Forces of the Empire, having there three Legions, besides the Auxiliary Troops of the King; but also all the East part of Europe was out of fear of Vitellius. Moreover, they had in Italy some that would assist Vespasian, to wit, his Brother and his Son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was Prefect of the City, an Office very considerable, especially in the beginning of such an Enterprize. Lastly, it might so fall out that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the Souldiers, being as it were their Preserver, had Elected.

cept this Dignity for preservation of the Empire, being in great danger to be lost, Albeit Vespasian had always been careful of the Publick-Good, yet he refused to be Emperour: deeming himself indeed to have deserved it, but he rather chose to live a Private Life, wherein was security, than in the height of Fortune and Honour with perpetual danger. The Captains were the more earnest because he refused it; and the Souldiers hocked about him with drawn Swords, threatening his death, except he would consent to live as he deserved: but after long time striving to avert this their determination to make him Emperour, at last, seeing he could not avoid it, he accepted their offer.

CHAP. XI.

The Description of Egypt.

Mutianus and the rest of the Captains that had elected him to the Empire, together with the whole Army, with great Acclamations desired Vespasian to lead them against their common Enemy. But Vespasian thought it best, first to make sure of Alexandria, knowing that Egypt for the supply of Corn was the greatest and best part of the Empire: which if he once were sure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were stronger than he, yet he could bring him under, because the People would not endure that for his sake the City should be famish'd: which would have come to pass, except they had supply of Corn out of Egypt.

Moreover, he desired to joyn to himself those two Legions that were at Alexandria; and he considered that that Country might be a defence and refuge for him, if any adverse Fortune should betide him: for it is not eafie to be entred by an Army, and the Sea-coasts have no Havens, nor Harbours to receive Ships. On the West it bordereth upon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South upon the Frontiers which separate Syene from Ethiopia, and the Cataracts of Nilus hinder the entering of it by Ships. On the East it bordereth upon the Red-Sea, which defends it as far as the City Coptos; on the North it reaches to Syria, and is defended by the Egyptian Sea, wherein there is no Haven. Thus Egypt is strong on every side, and reacheth in length 2000 Furlongs from Pelufium to Syene: and from Plinthia to Pelufium, they say 3600 Furlongs. And Nilus is navigable even unto the City Elephantine. Moreover the Haven of Alexandria is dangerous to enter into even in a Calm, for the entrance into it is very strait; and beside that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great stony Rocks, and the left side is compassed artificially with a strong Dike, but on the right side is the Isle Pharus, having a Tower upon it exceeding great: so that a Light in it is seen by Mariners 300 Furlongs off, to the end that before they come near it, they may provide to bring their Ships in with safety.

This Isle is inclosed with high Walls made by Art, against which the Sea beates, and so returning back again, maketh the entrance into the Haven more dangerous. Yet this Haven within is very safe, and 30 Furlongs long: so that whatsoever this Country wants, it is brought thence into that Haven; and whatsoever aboundeth amongst them, and which other Nations need, is carried from thence all over the whole World. So that Vespasian did not unadvisedly seek to make himself Master of Alexandria, and to dispose thereof for his own profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore he sent Letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Governour of Alexandria and Egypt, and told him of the Souldiers Resolution: and how that seeing he could not avoid it, but was forced to take upon him the Empire, he now requested him to help him what he could. Alexander receiving Vespasian's Letters, agreed willingly thereto, and presently caused his Army and the People also to swear to Vespasian: which they all did willingly, having understood Vespasian's Virtue, by reason that he Governed so near them. And so Alexander having now engaged himself, prepared all things necessary for the reception of this Prince.

How Vespasian delivered Joseph out of Captivity.

IT is incredible how quickly the news was carried into all parts of the World, that Vespasian was declared Emperor in the East; and how all the Cities rejoiced and made Triumphs, and offered Sacrifices for his fortunate success. Moreover, the Legions in Mesias and Pannonia, who not long before revolted from Vitellius, by reason of his cruelty, now willingly swore obedience to Vespasian. Vespasian returned by Berytum to Cesarea; where many Embassadors came to him, offering him Crowns, and applauding and rejoicing at his good fortune; they came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. Thither came also Mutianus, Governour of Syria, who brought tidings how joyfully all the People received him for their Emperour, and had sworn obedience to him. So all things falling out prosperously on Vespasian's side, and Fortune seconding what he desired, he began to think with himself it was God's providence that he was made Emperour, and brought to that estate. And so he called to mind all tokens and signs (as there had hapned many, which foretold that he should be Emperor) and among the rest, he remembered that which Joseph had told him; and though Aler was yet alive, presumed to call him Emperor; and he admired the man, who was yet in hold. But calling Mutianus and the rest of his friends together, first of all he told them how Valiant Joseph had been, and what difficulty he had to win Jotapata, only because of his Valour; and then his Prophecies, which at that time he esteemed only Fables, fained for fear; but now time and event had proved them true. Wherefore it seemed an unreasonable thing, that he, who had been the foreteller of his Exaltation, and a Messenger to him from God, should still continue in bonds like a Captive, and be left in adversity. So calling for Joseph, he commanded him to be set at liberty. This fact of his made the Captains under him hope for great reward at his hands, seeing he had been so kind to a stranger. Titus being there present, said; It is meet, O Father, that as you acquit Joseph from Captivity, so you also take away the shame of that which he hath already endured. For if we D not only untie his Chains, but also break them in sunder, he shall be as though he had never been in bondage: for this is the manner used for redress, when any one being guiltless is committed to bonds. Vespasian hereto agreed: and so one came with an Axe, and hewed his Chains in pieces. Thus was Joseph rewarded for his Prophecy; and thenceforward he was esteemed worthy to be believed.

Of Vitellius his Death and Manners.

WHEN Vespasian had answered the Embassadors, and disposed of all the Commands of his Army according to every ones merit, he went to Antioch, and there deliberated whither to go first; and it seemed best to him to go to Rome, rather than to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet & firm, but Rome was held by Vitellius. Wherefore he sent Mutianus into Italy, with many Troops of Foot and Horse, who fearing to go by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia; for it was Winter-time. Antonius Primus, who was Governour of Mesias, brought from thence the third Legion remaining there, and march'd against Vitellius. Vitellius sent Cecinna to meet him with a great Army: who departing from Rome, met with Antonius at Cremona, a Town of Lombardy, situate upon the confines of Italy; but beholding the discipline & order of his Forces, he durst not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to fight, design'd to revolt; and so calling to him the Centurions and Tribunes of his Army, he perswaded them to go and joyn with Antonius, after he had extenuated Vitellius his Power, and extolled that of Vespasian: affirming the first to have only the bare name of the Emperour; and Cecinna the last to have also all Vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwise they should be compelled to; and seeing themselves already surpassed in number, it was Prudence to prevent all danger. For Vespasian was able without their assistance to subdue all the rest: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had. And speaking to this effect, he perswaded them all that he would have done. And so with his whole Army joyn'd with Antonius. so left fearing Vitellius should get the upper hand, who sent them against Antonius, drew H their swords, and would have slain Cecinna; And they had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrary: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to send him to Vitellius as a Traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, went with his Army and assaulted them who revolted from him, and they a while resisted; yet at last forced to retire, they fled to Cremona; and Primus accompanied with Horsfemen, prevented their escape, and so slew most of them before they got into the City; and afterward setting upon it, he gave his Souldiers the spoil of it. Many Merchants of other Countries, & many Townsmen were slain, & all Vitellius Army, consisting of 30200 men.
Antonius lost in this battel 4500 of those whom he brought out of Messa: And delivering Cecinna from Prison, he sent him to carry the news hereof to Vespasian: who praised him for his fact, and honoured him above his expectation, in reward of his Treason. I

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly rejoiced, and took courage: and gathering together the Companies of the City-watch, in the nighttime he seiz'd on the Capitol; and in the morning, many of the Nobles joyned with him, amongst others Domitian, his Brothers Son, who was a great cause and help to obtain the Victory. Vitellius little esteeming Primus, turned his anger against Sabinus, and those that had revolted with him: as it were naturally thirsting after the blood of the Nobility, he sent all the Army he brought out of Germany with him, to assault the Capitul, where many valiant deeds were shewed on both parts: and at last the Germans, being most in number, got the Capitol Hill. Domitian with many brave Noblemen, as it were by Gods providence, escaped safe; the rest of the multitude were there slain, Sa-binus was carried to Vitellius, and by his commandment instantly put to death: and the Souldiers taking away all the gifts and treasure in the Temple, set it on fire. The day after Antonius arrived, and Vitellius his Souldiers met him; there was fighting in three several places of the City, the forces of Vitellius were all defeated: whereupon Vitellius came out of his Palace drunk and full gorged with delicate meat; he was immediately seiz'd upon, and drawn thorow the midst of the streets, and after many contumelies, slain, having reigned Eight months; and five days: if he had lived longer, the whole Empire had scarce been sufficient to have maintained his Gluttony. There were slain above 50000 of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after Mucianus with his Army entered Rome, and repressed the Souldiers of Antonius, who still fought about in every place for Vitellius's Souldiers, and many of his favourites, and slew whom they thought good, not examining any matter, by reason of their fury: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to govern the City till his Father came. The people being delivered from fear, proclaimed Vespasian Emperor, and made Feasts and Triumphs both under one, for his establishing in the Empire, and for joy that Vitellius was depofed. L

WHEN Vespasian came to Alexandria, news was brought to him of what was done at Rome. And Embassadors came to him from all parts of the World to congratulate him. And although next after Rome, this City was the greatest in the World, yet was it scarcely able to receive the people that came thither to him, Vespasian being now established Emperor of all the World, and the Common-wealth of the Romans being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think upon the reliquies of Judea. And he himself, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he hastened to dispose of all things at Alexandria. Moreover he sent his Son Titus with his best Troops to destroy Jerusalem. Titus departed by land from Alexandria to Nicopolis, which is distant from it 20 furlongs, and there he ship'd his men, and failed along the River Nilus by Medenia to Thumir; here landing his men, he came to the City called Tanis. The second place he rested in was the City Heraclea, and the third Pelusium, where having retires'd his Souldiers two days space, the third day he past the borders of Pelusium, and having gone one days journey through the wilderness, he pitcht his Camp at the Temple of Jupiter Castian, and the next day at Ostracine, where there is no water, but all that the Inhabitants use, they have from other places. After this, he rested at Rhinocloria, and from thence in four dayes he went to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria; and the fifth day he lodged at Gaza; and from thence going to Affalon and to Famnia and Joppa, he arrived at Casarea, purposing to gather some other forces there. THE

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of Sedition in Jerusalem.

THus being thus come out of Egypt by the Desert into Syria, he departed for Casarea, purposing there to set his Army in order. And whilst he was with his Father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empires that God had given him, it happened that the Sedition at Jerusalem divided into three parts, and fought one against another:
and well it was they were so equally divided.

We have already sufficiently declared who were the Authors of the Faction of the A threefold Zealots, whose tyranny over the City was the ruine thereof: and this may be said to Sedition in F be a Sedition out of a Sedition; which, like a hungry wild Beast, wanting his prey, turned his cruelty against his own bowels. So Eleazar the Son of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple divided the Zealots from the People, joining himself to be displeased with that which John every day did; yet in Truth, for that he envied that a greater Tyrant than himself should be Ruler, desirous to be Chief, and make himself Mighty, he revolted from the rest: and with him Judas the Son of Chelcias, and Simon the Son of Ezron, two of the most potent amongst them. Besides them, was also Ezechias the Son of Chobarus, a Nobleman, all of which had many of the Zealots following them: and possessing themselves of the inner part of the Temple, they set a Guard in the entrance, and in the sacred Gates, presuming upon the fulness of their Stores: for there was great quantity of sacred Provision, which they thought it no impiety to make G use of; yet fearing their small number, they permitted many of the Company that were killed, to remain in the places where they were slain. John was superiour in number,
but

but inferior in the quality of the place : for having his Enemies above his head, he could not without danger make incursions ; yet his Rage would not suffer him to forbear infelting his Enemies, though thereby his party had more harm than those of Eleazar, and he still assaulted them to his own cost : Thus many Assaults were continually made, and many Darts cast, and the Temple was prophaned with murders. Simon the Son of Giora (incited by the People to be their Leader, in hope he would have assisted them, having in his hands both the higher part of the City, and greater part of the lower) did now more boldly than before assault John and his followers, because they were assailed by those above : yet he being as it were beneath John and his party, sustained as much loss at their hands, as John himself did from them who were above him. Thus John was doubly engaged with Eleazar, who infelting him from above, and Simon from below : But Simons assaults from below were easily repulsed, and it was not a little mischief he did those who gaul'd him with their Darts from above, by certain Engines that he invented, by which he cast Stones and Darts among them, and slew several both of their Souldiers and Priests, as they were offering Sacrifice to their God. For though they were generally too prone to all manner of wickedness, yet those that would were permitted to offer Sacrifice, watching and diligently guarding those of their Nation. For Strangers which came thither for devotion, were not mistrusted : But after these wicked People had permitted them to Sacrifice, when they had finished their devotions, they were made a prey, and consumed by this Sedition. For Darts and other shot with force of the Engines came into the Temple and Altar, and slew the Priests at the Altar. And many who came from the uttermost parts of the World unto that holy place, were slain as they offered sacrifice, and imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greeks and barbarous People did reverence : The strangers and Priests were forced to remain promiscuously among the dead Bodies, and the place about the Altar was full of Blood. O miserable City ! What dost thou suffer at the Romans hands, to be compared to this, although they set thee on fire to purge thee from Iniquity ? Now thou wert separate from the service of God, and couldst not subsist long, being made a Sepulchre of thine own Inhabitants, and thy Temple by thy Civil Wars become a Grave of dead Bodies. Nevertheless, It is not impossible but thou mayst be restored to thy former Estate, if first thou appease Gods wrath that hath made thee desolate. But I must not give place unto sorrow, and write a Lamentation of my miserable Country, seeing I have undertaken to write a History of all things that pass there. Wherefore I will recount the rest of the Impieties of these Seditions.

The feditious People being divided into three Companies ; Eleazar and his followers who had the keeping of the holy first-fruits, and all the sacred Oblations, came against John when they were drunk. And they who followed John spoiling the People, assaulted Simon, who was succoured by the City. Wherefore when John was assaulted on both sides, he turned some of his Souldiers against Simon, and the rest against Eleazar : against Simon he used Darts to cast from the Porches of the Temple ; and against Eleazar he used Engines for shot. And always, so often as they above his head ceased (as often they did, being either weary or drunken) he fiercely assaulted Simon and his men. Also as far as he drave them into the City, so far did he fire all, and burnt Houses full of Corn and other Necessaries ; and that which he left unburned, Simon at his return (when John was gone into the Temple) set on fire : as if on purpose to give the Romans an advantage, they had consumed all their Provisions for the Siege.

To be short, all was consumed with fire about the Temple, and the City was levelled and made plain ground to fight in, and the Corn burnt that might have sufficed for many years ; by which means they were reduced by a Famine of their own making, which could not have been brought upon them had they not caused it themselves. The Citizens were in every place a prey to those that were Seditious on one side, and to them that besieged them on the other ; and like a great Body torn in pieces between these two. The old Men and Women astonished with these Calamities, prayed for the good success of the Romans, and desired their foreign Enemy might deliver them from their Civil Diffentions.

This was the occasion of great fear and terrour among them all ; and the more, because it was no time now to consult, and no hope left of accommodation, or flight to them that desired it. For all places were kept, and the Rebels within kill'd whoever they perceived well-wishers to the Romans, or did endeavour to fly to them, as common Enemies. However these wicked persons agreed in this, to put the just Men to death, who best deserved to live. Day and night nothing could be heard but the noise of them that fought one against another ; yet the condition of them that lived in perpetual

A fear was far more miserable, who every day had new causes and occasions of sorrow given them ; yet durst they not publicly lament, for fear ; and so not daring to shew their grief, they secretly forrowed : no man observed any reverence to them that were alive amongst them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cause of both which was, that every man despair'd of himself. For whosoever were not joyn'd with the Seditious, grew to be careless of all things, as making account presently to die a thousand deaths. But the Seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heaps, continued their fighting, and trod upon them ; and as it were encouraging themselves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruel, still devising new stratagems one against another, and immediately executing whatsoever they devised without any commiseration ; omitting no kind of Murder, and leaving no cruelty unpractised so that John prophand the holy things of the Temple, and made them Engines of War. For formerly the Priests and People had determined to underprop the Temple, and build it twenty Cubits higher, and King Agrippa, with great labour and expence, had sent them in Timber for that purpose from Mount Lihannu. Which being put off by the Wars, John took the Timber and made use of it : for that design he erected a Tower to fight against those that assaulted him from off the Temple ; and this Tower he built along the Wall over against the Chapter-house that standeth on the West side of the Temple ; for he could build it in no other place so conveniently. And having thus impiously furnished himself with Engines, he hoped hereby to have destroyed his Enemies. But God made his labour in vain, and before he could prevail against them, brought the Romans against the City.

For after that Titus had gathered together part of his Army, and ordered the rest to meet him at Jerusalem, he departed from Cæsarea, having three Legions that lately under the conduct of his Father Vespasian had waited all Judea, and the twelfth Legion that sometime under Cestius were overcome, and put to flight by the Jews : who being valiant enough of themselves, were impatient to be employ'd again against the Jews, to revenge themselves of their former disgrace. Titus commanded the fifth Legion to meet him at Jerusalem, and to march by Emmaus, and the tenth Legion by Jericho : the rest he took with himself, accompanied with the Kings forces that came to help him, having been reinforced with considerable Supplies out of Syria. Titus also brought forces with him to supply the number that was wanting, which forces were sent by Vespasian under Mucianus into Italy : for he brought two thousand select men from the Legions at Alexandria, and three thousand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefest friend, and one next him in Authority, who before was Governour of Egypt, and thought a fit man to be Governour of the Army ; for that he was the first that entertain'd the Emperour being new elected, and joyn'd faithfully with him before he knew what success he should have : he was present with him in all his affairs as his chiefest Counsellor, and was renowned both for his Wisdom and Experience.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Jerusalem to see their strength, and how he was in great danger.

Titus being now to go into the Enemies Country, caused all his Auxiliaries to march in the Van : after whom followed the Pioneers and those appointed to pitch the Tents : after them the baggage of the Rulers and Governours of his Army, & with them the armed Souldiers. Next these came Titus himself accompanied with his choice men, and many that bare his Colours : next, the Horsemen march'd immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certain chosen men, and their Companies followed. After them the Eagle, with many other Ensignes : and the Trumpets went before them. And after them followed the Army marching six in a rank : then the multitude of Servants that followed every Legion did drive their baggage before them : lastly came the Hirelings, and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike manner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samarita into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his Father, and then also was under the custody of the Roman Garifons. Staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day ; and after a days journey pitched

From thence accompanied with 600 chosen Horsemen, he went to Jerusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Jews were, to see if peradventure at sight of him they would yield without any further ado. For Titus undertood (and it was true) that the people desired Peace, but were overpowered by the Seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing. Titus riding along the high-way that went to the Walls, saw no man: but turning aside towards the Tower Essephus with his Horsemen, an infinite number presently issued out by the Towers of Women, at a Gate opposite to Heleus Tomb; brake his Guard of Horsemen into two parts, and advanced to hinder those Horsemen that were yet in the high way, from joining with the rest that had crost the way, by which means they had divided Titus from the rest of his company, in so much as he could proceed no further for the Ditch of the Town-Wall on one side, and for the Garden Pales on the other side: and there was no way for him to return unto his Souldiers, the Enemies being between him and home. Many of his Souldiers not knowing their General was in any danger, but supposing him amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that he had only his own valour to trust to, turned his Horse against his Enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and so he brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get unto his Company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the Victory, and hath a K particular care of Kings, Princes and Emperours. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of Darts and Arrows were shot at Titus, and he had no Armour at all (for as we have already said, he came to view, not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all past him; as though purposely every one had striven to miss him. But Titus with his Sword made way, cut down many that opposed themselves against him, and with his Horse past over them. The Jews seeing Titus his valour, cried out and exhorted one another to set upon him; but whithersoever he turned, the Jews fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those Souldiers that were with him, beset they were closed in and oppressed. Two of the most valiant amongst them were slain, the Horse of the one was killed with his master, but the others Horse was taken by the Jews. But Titus and the rest came safe into the Camp. And thus the Jews being successful at first, were mightily encouraged, and that encouragement being of moment, made them confident, or rather rash, a long time after.

M

<sup>The year of the World, 4234. after the destruction of the Temple.</sup> <sup>Titus Camp was 7. furlongs off the City.</sup> The Legion that was to pass by Emmas, being joyned to the rest of the Army over night, Cesar the next morning removed, and came to Scopus, where he had a full view of the City and Temple on the North part, the ground adjoining unto the City being very low, and not improperly called Scopus, being distant seven Furlongs from the City: in that quarter Titus commanded two Legions to encamp themselves, and the fifth Legion to retire three Furlongs off, to the intent that the Souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themselves without fear or danger; no sooner had they begun their work; but presently the tenth Legion came, N who were to pass by Jericho; which Vespasian had already subdued, and placed a Garison there. This Legion was commanded to encamp six Furlongs from Jerusalem, near Mount Olivet, on the East part of the City, and is enclosed with a deep Valley called Cedron. This great Army so suddenly arriving reconciled the dissensions within the City for some time: and the three Factions beholding with admiration the Roman Camp, became friends, and all differences were composed. They began to examine and consider what madness had caused them to suffer themselves to be enclosed with three Walls, to their prejudice, and loss of their lives: and that they should stand still, and be spectators as it were of such dangerous preparations, without making the least Countermeine or provision to defeat them; whilst some cried, We are only valiant against our selves, by our sedition mafflacing and murder-

The Souldiers agree among themselves.

A ing one another, till at last we shall betray our City into the hands of the Romans.

Thus being assembled they exhorted one another: and betaking themselves to their Arms they issued out of the City, first upon the tenth Legion, and with a great shout first upon the Romans that were entrenched in the Valley. The Romans being all at work in the Trenches, and most of them having laid down their Weapons (presuming the Jews durst not have made any salley by reason of the variance amongst themselves) were so much surprized, that great part of them immediately fled; some of them stood to their Arms, but were slain before they could get into a posture of defence. The number of the Jews was daily increased by their first success, and though yet their number was but small, they thought themselves many, and so did the Romans think them too, because of their good Fortune. The Romans, who always observe Military discipline, were that time by their sudden assaulting, so troubled, they observed no order, and fled: yet whensoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they easily wounded the Jews, partly because their eagerness was such that they did not much seek to defend themselves, inasmuch that they easily stayed the Jews from pursuing them. Yet the number of them that pursued them still increasing, they were much disordered and at last forced to forsake the field, and leave their tents: and the whole Legion had been in great danger, had not Titus upon the news thereof speedily reliev'd them, and upbraiding their cowardliness recalled them from flight; who with them, and the chosen men he brought, encountering the Jews on one side, slew many of them, wounded divers, put the rest to flight, and forced them into the Valley. The Jews being now in the lower ground, and having endured much at the Romans hands, since fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the Valley between them, they fought with the Romans; and the fight continued till noon.

The Jews drive the Romans from their Camp.

The fight of the Jews with the Romans.

A little after mid-day, Titus guarding the rest with those that he brought to succour them, and placing others to prevent the excursions of the Jews, commanded the rest to entrench themselves in the top of the Mountain. The Jews thought the Romans had fled, and their Sentinel upon the Walls, making a sign to them by shaking his Garment up and down, a great multitude of them ran violently upon the Romans, as though they had been Savage Beasts, so that none of their enemies were able to withstand them; but as though they had been stricken with some Engine; so all of them were diversely scattered and forced to fly into the Mountain. But Titus on the side of the Mountain remained with but few with him; notwithstanding his friends, who for their love to their Emperour stayed with him, and abode the danger, did earnestly persuade him to fly from the Jews, who desperately charged them, and not to endanger himself for them, who ought rather to abide it than he: That he should think upon his quality and condition, who was not a private Souldier, but General of them all, and Lord of the whole World, and not abide where there was such danger. But he pretended he heard them not, opposed himself against them that assaulted him, striking them upon the faces, killed those that made resistance, and pursued the rest down the Hill, and forced them to retire. The Jews were amazed at his Valour, yet did not flee into the City, but avoided him both sides, and fled into the Valley: and he pursuing them hindered their flight. In the mean time those that were Jews encamping above, seeing their Comrades beneath put to flight, fled likewise, thinking themselves not able to resist the Jews, and imagining that Titus was likewise fled for had they thought he had made head, they never would have forsaken their quarters; but now in disorder, they knew not wherefore, some fled one way, and some another, till perceiving the Emperour engaged, and fearing what might befall him, they with loud cries signified it unto the whole Legion. Whereupon the Romans turning again, and upbraiding one another for deserting their Emperour in such danger, they rallied and came with all the violence they could upon the Jews, and driving them down the Mountain, forced them to retire; yet the Jews fought in their retreat, and seeing the Romans too hard, because they were upon the higher ground, they drew down into the Valley. Titus assaulted them that were drawn up against him, and commanded the rest to go and finish their Trenches. And he with those that were with him to defend the workmen, kept the Jews from molesting them. So, if I may speak without flattery or envy, Cesar himself did twice preserve the whole Legion from destruction, and gave the Souldiers opportunity to entrench themselves.

During the intermission of the Foreign Wars, they fell to their former sedition again, which caused Civil Wars among them. And against the feast of Unleavened bread, which is the fourteenth day of April (for upon this day the Jews say that they were delivered out of the Bondage of Egypt) Eleazer and his Companions opened the Gates, to the intent that all that would might come in to adore and do their devotion. But John used this Festival-day as a means to effect his deceit; and caused many of his Company that were unknown, to enter in among the people with Weapons under their Garments, giving them charge when they were entering to possess themselves of the Temple: and so soon as they were within, they cast off their Garments, and shewed themselves in Armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the Temple, for all the people that were not of the Sedition, thought themselves betrayed: and the Zealots thought this Treason only practised to prejudice them; so that leaving the Gate which they kept before, and leaping down from the Towers without offering to fight, they fled into the Vaults of the Temple. The people flock about the Altar, and others were driven with them into the Temple, and killed with Clubs and Swords, and trodden under-foot. Many were slain upon private hatred, under pretence of siding with the Enemy. And whosoever formerly had offended any of those Traitors, he was put to death, as though he had been one of the Zealots. But they who had cruelly raged against the Innocent, gave the wicked leisure to escape out of those Caves whereby they had no harm: and having gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently than before fight against Simon: Thus the Sedition that was before divided into three parts, was now reduced into two. Titus being desirous to bring his Army nearer the City, sent out a commanded party of Horse and Foot, which he thought sufficient to hinder the excursions of the Jews from Scopus, and another Company he sent to plain all the grounds betwixt him and Jerusalem, who cut down all Hedges, and Pales, and Fences, and Wood (though they were fruit-trees) filled the Valleys, and made it plain ground; levelling the Rocks and Mountains that made the Country unequal; by doing of which all the way was plain'd from Scopus to Herods Monument, which is not far from the Lake of Serpents, called formerly Bethora.

*The slavery of the Souldiers among the Romans, cer-

About this time the Jews devised this stratagem against the Romans. The most courageous among the Seditious people went out into the places called the Women's Towers, and pretended to be driven thither by that party in the City that desired peace, and that fearing the Romans, they were come thither for shelter; others got up on the Walls, and pretended themselves Citizens, they called out for Peace and desired their friendship; promising to throw open their Gates that the Romans might enter: and whilst they were so doing they threw stones at their Companions aforsaid, pretending to drive them from the Gates. They pretend likewise great earnestness and importunity to the people for their consent, and as if that had fail'd they seemed to endeavour to force their passage to the Gates, sometimes advancing as if they would have gone off to the Romans, and then again retreating as men in great trouble and confusion. The Romans perceived not their designe but seeing the Seditious ready to fall into their hands, and the people (as they thought) ready to open the Gates, prepar'd in post-haste to have entered into the City. But Titus suspected their Kindness, as seeing no reason for it. For the day before, having by Joseph offered them peace, he perceived their minds far from any such thoughts: wherefore he commanded the Souldiers to keep their quarters and not remove; yet some of them, appointed to work in the Trenches, taking their weapons ran unto the Gates, and the Jews who O seemed to be driven out of the City, fled in appearance, but at last when they came unto the

of the Jews*

A the Gates of the Towers, faced about and encompassed the Romans, and assaulted them upon their backs: and they that were upon the Walls cast all kind of Darts and Stones upon them, so that they slew many and wounded more; for it was not easie to escape being assaulted both behind and before. Moreover, they were conscious that they had offended, and in fear of being punished, caused them to resist the more stoutly; so that after a long conflict, and many wounds given and received, at last the Romans were worsted, and the Jews pursued them to Herods Monument. And having done them much mischief, the Jews returned with great joy, deriding the Romans for being so easily deceived, lifting up their Shields and Bucklers; by way of exultation.

The Roman Souldiers were highly threatened by their Captains, and Cesar accosted them with this speech: *The Jews led only with desperation, do all things with advice and counsel, devising deceits: and fortune favoureth their practices because they are orderly, and true one to another. But the Romans (whom for their Obedience and Discipline fortune was wont formerly to favour) do contrariwise offend herein, and for their rash and unadvised fighting, are overcome: and which is worst of all, in Cesar's presence offering to fight without Orders, contrary to military Law and Discipline; which I am sure my Father will be unsatisfied to hear. For he who from his infancy, hath been trained up in Arms, never offended in this sort; and what shall we say to our Law that punisheth the least disobedience with death, when our whole Army disobey the Emperours command? But (saith he) they who so arrogantly have disobeyed our command, shall presently understand, that among the Romans, Victory against the Generals command, is but infamy. Titus having spoken in anger, declared what he would do, and how he purposed to punish them. Which strook them so deeply, they looked upon themselves as desperate, and people appointed to die. But all the other Legions flocking about Titus, besought him to pardon their fellow-Souldiers, and to remit the rashness of some few, for the obedience of the rest, assuring him that their future valour should be a recompence for this their offence. Whereupon Cesar was pacified, partly thinking it most profitable, partly to gratifie the rest; and so he was reconciled to his Souldiers; strictly charging them to be wiser for the future: after which he devised how he might be revenged on the Jews.*

D When all the ground between the Walls of Jerusalem and his Army was in four days made plain; Titus being desirous to conduct the baggage, and the rest of the multitude in safety, placed the best of his men in good order, and caused them to march from the North part of the City unto the West, along by the Walls of the City, placing his Foot in the Front, his Horse in the Rear, and between them both the Archers, whereby the Jews were disabled to make any Salley. Titus Souldiers being thus disposed, the baggage of the three Legions and the multitude passed along without any interruption. And Titus himself being advanced within two Furlongs of the City Walls, pitched his Tent against that Angle that is called Elephynus, where the compass of the Wall from the North bends into the West: the other part of the E Army entrenched itself against that part of the Wall that is called Hippier, distant in like manner two Furlongs from the City. But the tenth Legion remained upon Mount Olivet where it was before.

F Jerusalem was compassed round with a treble Wall, only on one side it was inclosed with Valleys inaccessible: and on that side it had only one Wall. It was built upon two little Hills, opposite to one another, and separated with a Valley, wonderfully thick built with houses. One of these Hills is far higher and steeper than the other, inasmuch that because of the strength of it, King David in times past called it a Castle (this David was the Father of King Solomon, who first builded the Temple in that place) but we at this day call it the high Market-place. The other Hill called Akra, is the place where the lower part of the City stands. Opposite against this Hill, there was also another lower than this Akra, and divided from it formerly with a large Valley, but afterward when the Assyrians reigned, they fill'd up this the G Valley, to joyn the City unto the Temple, taking down the top of Akra, and making it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The oldest Wall.

The Second Wall.

The third Wall.

Bezetha the fourth Hill.

Agrippa's cell in building the Wall.

The third Wall had 90 Towers.

Pfephina was 200 Cubits high.

Herod called these Towers by the names of three his most dear friends.

Hills are separated is called Tyropoon, and reacheth unto Siloe (which is a Fountain of sweet Water.) Without the City were two Hills compassed with deep Vallies : which Hills being rocky and steep, were every way inaccessible. The oldest of the three Walls, (by reason of the Valley about it, and the Hill whereon it stood) could not easily be taken ; for beside the difficulty of the situation, it was very strongly built, and repaired by David, Solomon, and other Kings. This Wall, beginning at the Tower called Hippicus, passeth on to that called Xystus, and so to the Palace; and at last endeth in the West porch of the Temple : on the other side towards the West it begins at the same Tower ; and passing by the place that is called Berith, it descends to the Gate of the Esseans, and so into the South, and from thence again it bendeth into the East, where is also Solomon's Pond, and reacheth unto the place called Ophelan, where it is joyned unto the East Porch of the Temple. The second Wall beginning at the Gate that is called Genath (which is a Gate of the former Wall) and encompassing the North part of the City, it reacheth to Antonia, a Castle so called. The third Wall beginneth at the Tower Hippicus, from whence it goeth to the North-part, and from thence to the Tower Pfephina, over against the Sepulchre of Helena, that was Queen of Adiabena, & Mother of King Izates; and passing along by the Kings Caves, it turneth towards the Tower near the Monument of Fulla, and in the Valley called Gedron it joyneth with the old Wall. Agrippa encompassed that part of the City that he built, with this Wall ; it being before all open and without defence. The City grew afterwards so populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit without the Walls : and this Wall reacheth a great way, being joyned unto the Hill next the City on the North side of the Temple. There was also a fourth Hill inhabited, named Bezetha, situate against Antonia, but separated from it with very deep Ditches, made on purpose to render the approaches to the Fort Antonia more dangerous and difficult ; the deepness of which ditches, made the Fort seem higher than it was. This place being added unto the City, is called in that Country-language Bezetha, which signifieth the new City. And the Inhabitants desired it might be fortified, Agrippa, Father to this Agrippa that finisheth the Wall, begun the Wall aforementioned : But fearing Claudius Caesar, fearing how sumptuous a Wall he built, should suspect him for designing to revolt, he only laid the Foundation of it, and left it unfinished.

The City could never have been taken by force, had he finished that Wall as he began ; it being built twenty Cubits long, and ten Cubits broad with hard Stone, which could neither easily be undermined, nor battered with Engines : and this Wall was built ten Cubits high, and no doubt had been raised higher, had not the liberality of the founder been checked. Yet afterwards by the Jews industry the same Wall was raised twenty Cubits high ; the Battlements hereof were two Cubits high, and the Tower three Cubits, and in all it was twenty four Cubits high, as before. Upon the Wall were three Towers, twenty Cubits broad, and twenty Cubits high, M built four-square very strong, and of as firm a foundation as the Wall it self, which for the building and fair tone was not inferior to the Temple above. Within this strong Tower, which reacheth twenty Cubits high, were Rooms for men to lodge in, and Cisterns to receive Rain-Water, and large turning stairs to every Room in it : and this third Wall had four-score and ten of these Towers, and between every Tower were two hundred Cubits space. The middle Wall had fourteen Towers, and the old Wall had three-score, and the compass of the whole City was three and thirty Furlongs. And although the third Wall was admirable, yet the Tower of Pfephina, which was built upon a Corner of the Wall, between the North and the West part of the City, was more admirable, (against which part Titus had encamped himself) for it was seventy Cubits high, had eight Angles, and was so fair a Prospect, that from thence upon a clear Sun-shine day, one might perceive Arabia, and see the uttermost parts of all the dominions of the Hebrews unto the Sea. Just opposite to this was the Tower Hippicus, and near unto it were other two, that King Herod builded upon the old Wall, which in bigness, beauty and strength, surpassed all the rest in the World.

For King Herod, besides his natural liberality and desire to adorn this City, pleased himself so much in beautifying these Towers, that they excell'd all other; and then he dedicated them to three most renowned persons, whose names they also did bear, to wit, to his Brother, his Friend, and his Wife : she (as is aforesaid) having been put to death for jealousy ; and the other two been slain in the Wars, after they had fought and performed valiantly. The Tower Hippicus, called by the name of his Friend, had

A four Corners, and every one of them was five and twenty Cubits broad, as many in length, and thirty Cubits in height, being no place hollow ; and above the high places and stone-work, there was a Well to receive Rain-water, twenty Cubits deep : above it were houses with double roofs twenty five Cubits high, and divided into many rooms : and above them were Battlements two Cubits high : and Towers three Cubits high : so that the whole height was accounted to be eighty five Cubits. The second Tower that by his Brothers name he called Pfephina, was in breadth and length forty Cubits, and so many Cubits high, in figure of a square Pillar, all which height was solid, and not hollow within : and above this a Porch ten Cubits high, decked with Towers and Pinacles. Over the midst of this Porch he built another Tower, distinguished into goodly Rooms and sumptuous Baths, that it should not want any thing necessary for a Prince : on the top it was beautified with Towers and Pinacles, so that all its height was almost four-score and ten Cubits : And it resembled the Tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continual light is kept to guide the Seamen that sail thither, but this was of greater circumference. In this house at that time Simon lodged, and tyrannized over the people. The third Tower was, according to the Queens Name, called Mariamne, the Wife of Herod, twenty Cubits high, all solid, and other twenty Cubits broad, having more magnificent and beautiful Houses and Lodgings than the rest. For the King thought it meet, that the Tower called by his Wives name, should be more beautiful than the other who only bare the names of men, but they were stronger than this that bare the name of a Woman. This Tower was in all fifty five Cubits high.

These three Towers were of great height, yet by reason of their situation they seemed far higher : for the old Wall whereupon they were built was placed upon high ground, and the top of the Hill whereupon they stood was above thirty Cubits high, whereby their height was much increased. The richness also was admirable ; for it was not ordinary stone, but all White Marble, every stone being twenty Cubits long, ten Cubits broad, five Cubits thick, and all so ingeniously contrived, that every stone by it self seemed a Tower ; and every Tower seemed to be but one Stone. They were placed on the North side of the City ; and adjoining to them within the City was the Kings Palace, surpassing all that can be spoken of it : being for greatness and excellent work to be compared to the richest buildings in the World. It was compassed about with a Wall thirty Cubits high, adorned with goodly Towers round about, every one of like distance from other, beautified with dwelling Houses and Lodgings for a hundred of the Nobility. The variety of the Marble it was built withal was admirable, for there was no sort, how rare or costly soever, but was there. The Ceiling of the Rooms for the length of the Beams and the beauty thereof, passed all credit ; and then their number, and richness of their furniture was extraordinary. In every room there were many Vessels of gold and silver, and many Porches round about, one answerable unto another, and Pillars in every one. There were many pleasant Walks with divers Trees, and many Allies with Fountains and Waters-works, and Cisterns adorned with Brazen Images, from which ran out Water, and about the Water many Dove-houses full of tame Pigeons. But it is impossible sufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the Kings Palace, and a grief to think what goodly things, and how rich, the Thieves did there set on fire : for these things were not burnt by the Romans, but by the Seditious Thieves (as is before said,) at the beginning of this Rebellion, who consumed all with fire, even from the Castle Antonia from whence the fire came, and destroyed the Kings Palace, and the Covers and Tops of the three Towers. The Temple was, as is before said, built upon a hard Mountain, and at the first, the Plain upon the top thereof was scarcely big enough to contain it and the Temple-yard, the Hill being very steep. But when King Solomon, who also built the Temple, had compassed the East part thereof with a Wall, he also placed a Porch upon the Rampire, and so for many ages after, it lay unfenced on other parts : wherefore the People every day bringing earth thither, at last made it plain and large enough : and breaking down the North Wall, they took in all that space which the Temple had formerly taken up : and the Hill being now inclosed with a threefold Wall, it was a work beyond all imagination. In the finishing whereof many Ages were spent, and all the holy Treasure offered to God, even from all parts of the World, was employed therein, as well in the Buildings of the higher, as of the lower part of the Temple ; the foundations whereof were laid three hundred Cubits deep, and in many places more : yet could not all the Foundations be seen, being buried in Valleys, that were filled up to make them equal with the frail streets of the City.

The stones of this building were of forty Cubits : for the abundance of treasure and H liberality of the people did effect that which was scarcely possible ; and that which all men thought could never have come to pass, in time and by industry came to perfection.

The building was answerable unto these Foundations. For all the Porches were double, and every one was supported by Pillars, each of them being five and twenty Cubits high, and all of one piece, and of white Marble : the top whereof was all of Cedar, whose natural beauty, for the good joyning of the wood and polishing thereof, did astonish all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carved works.
These Porches were thirty Cubits broad, and the compass of them altogether, with the Port of Antonia, was six Furlongs. The Court was curiously wrought and paved I with all sorts of stones. The way to the Second Temple was inclosed with stones of Lattice-work, which were three Cubits high, and most beautifully wrought : in which were placed certain Pillars equally distant one from another, to shew the Law of purification, some being written upon in Latine letters, others in Greek, forbidding all strangers to enter into the Holy-place : for the second Temple is called the Holy-place. To go unto the second from the first, we must pass fourteen stairs, and it was four square aloft, and inclosed with a Wall by it self ; whose outside being forty Cubits high, was all covered with stairs to ascend up into it ; and within it was five and twenty Cubits high : for all the part of the inner side was unseen, because it was built on the defect of a Hill. After the fourteen Stairs, there was a Plain made level with the K Wall of three hundred Cubits : from thence passed on five other Stairs which lead to the Gates, whereof on the North-side and the South there were eight, four on each side, and two on the East. For it was necessary that there should be a peculiar place

A peculiar place designated for Women for Religion sake.

for Women to exercise their devotion in, which also was inclosed with a Wall. And so it was necessary there should be two doors : and against the first Gate there was opposite unto it, one Gate on the North-side, and another on the South, both separated from the rest, whereby we entered the Womens apartment, for it was not lawful for any to pass by any other Gate unto the Women, neither could they go beyond their own door, because of the Wall : for that place was common both to the Women of that Nation, and all strange Women that came for Religion sake. There was no L Gate on the West part, but a Wall that reacheth along in that place. Between the Gates were Porches opposite one against another, reaching from the Wall unto the Treasure-house, supported with great and goodly Pillars, being as plain, and as big as they below. The Gates were covered with Gold and Silver, as also the posts

Gates were of Silver, and thian Brass.

and foreparts thereof were, one only excepted that was covered with Corinthian Brass, far surpassing in beauty the other that were covered with Silver and Gold.
In every Gate there were two doors, each one thirty Cubits high, and fifteen Cubits broad : and after the entrance where they were made larger, every one had on each side Seats thirty Cubits long, and large like a Tower, and forty Cubits high, each one supported with two Pillars twelve Cubits thick. All the other Gates were of the like greatness, but that which was covered with Corinthian Brass, which M was the entrance into the place allotted for the Women, and opened into the East Gate of the Temple, doubtless was bigger than the rest : for it was fifty Cubits high (the Gates whereof were forty Cubits) and was more richly adorned than the rest : for the cover of Gold and Silver was thicker than it was in the rest, which Alexander Tiberius his Father had melted, to cover all the nine Gates. And there were fifteen Stairs, that went from the Wall that separated the Women, unto the great Gate of the Temple : for these Stairs were shorter by five steps than those that went to the other Gates. The Temple it self was situated in the midst of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelve Stairs to go unto it. The Front whereof was in height and breadth a hundred Cubits : and behind, it was forty Cubits : and be- N fore it, was as it were two shoulders on each side rising up in height twenty Cubits.

The Sacred Sanctuary.

The first Gate hereof was seventy Cubits high, and twenty five wide, and had no door : for it signified that Heaven was spread over all, and might be seen in every place : and all the foreparts were gilded with Gold, and all the first building did appear and might be seen without, and all that was within and about the Gate glittered with Gold. The inner part thereof was divided into two Rooms, whereof only the first Room might be seen ; which was in height four score and ten Cubits, and in length fourty, and in breadth twenty. The inner Gate was (as is already said) all gilded with Gold, and all the Wall about it, and above it : it had a Golden Vine, whereon were hanging Clusters of Grapes of Gold, every Cluster being as long as a man is high

A high. And because it was ceiled above, the inner Temple did seem to be lower than it was without : and it had Golden Gates, fifty five Cubits high, and sixteen Cubits broad.

The Hangings were also of the same length, being a Babylonian Vail, wrought with Violet, and Purple Silk and Scarlet, admirable to behold : the permutation of which colours had a mystical meaning, bearing as it were the signification of the whole World.
For the Scarlet seemed to express the Fire, the Silk the Earth, the Violet the Air, and the Purple the Sea, partly in their colours resembling them, partly also as having their beginning from them : for the Purple is ingendered in the Sea, and the Silk is produced by the Earth. In this Tapestry work was curiously wrought, and deciphered all the Speculations of the Heavens, only the Celestial Signs excepted. Being B entered within, you come into a lower place of the Temple, which was sixty Cubits high, and as many in length, and 20 in breadth. Which place was divided into two parts, whereof first contained forty Cubits, having in it three most admirable things, Three admirable works :
famous throughout the World, to wit, a Candlestick, a Table, and the Altar of Incense. Upon the Candlestick seven Lamps were placed, signifying the seven Planets, The Can(for so many did there come all out of one stem of the Candlestick). Upon the Table were standing twelve loaves of Bread, signifying the twelve Celestial Signs, and Revolution of the Year. By the Altar of Incense (out of which proceeded thirteen Odours, coming partly from the Sea which is uninhabitable, and partly from the Earth which is inhabited) is signified that all things are in the hands of God, and owe him C obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20 Cubits, which also was separated from the other part by a Vail, and nothing was within it : this place was the Holy of Holies, and no man might enter, look into it, nor violate the same. On each side of the lower Temple there were many Lodgings and Doors to pass into, every one of them having three roofs one above another, and there was a Gate which led unto both sides of the Temple, and unto these Rooms : but the higher part of the Temple had not the like Rooms on each side, and therefore it was made so much narrower than the other, yet was it higher than it by 40 Cubits, neither was it so sumptuous as the lower. For the whole height was 100 Cubits, and the ground thereof 60. The outmost part was so curious and richly wrought, it was impossible to imagine any D workmanship that it wanted : for it was all covered with a Massie Plate of pure Gold, which shined far brighter than the Morning Sun, so that it dazzled the Eyes of the beholders, as doth the Sun when it is gazed upon. And afar off it seemed to strangers that came thither, like a white Mountain : for where the Temple was not gilded with Gold, there was it Milk-white. The top hereof was all set full of Rods of Gold, very sharp at the upper end like Pikes, lest the Birds should come and sit thereon, and so defile it : several of the Stones wherewith it was Built, were forty-five Cubits large, five Cubits in length, and six Cubits broad. Before the Temple there stood an Altar fifteen Cubits high, being forty Cubits broad, and as many long, and foursquare, having Corners made like Horns. The way to this Altar was on the South E side, where by little and little it ascended from below to the Altar. This Altar was built without any Iron, and never Iron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were enclosed with Stone-work very beautiful, which was a Cubit high, and separated the People from the Priests. Those that were troubled with flux of Seed, or Leprosy, were expelled the City ; Women also having their monthly courses ; and those that were not unclean, might pass this foresaid limit. Likewise men that were not purified, were not permitted to come within the inner Temple ; and those that were, might not come among the Priests : those also that descended from the line of the Priests, and for blindness did not administer their function, were notwithstanding admitted into the place appointed for the rest of the Priests that were found, and had share
F as they had : yet did they go attired as Lay-men, for only he that did Sacrifice, might wear Priestly attire.

The Priests that were admitted to the Altar and Temple had no infinity, they were clothed in fine Linen, abtained from Wine, and lived in abstinence for reverence of Religion, lest they should sin whilst they offered Sacrifice. The High-Priest also ascended with the Priests into the Temple ; yet not always, but every seventh day, and in the Calends of every month, or on a Festival, celebrated according to the custom of their Country, wherein all the people were present. When he sacrificed he was girded with a Vail, which covered his Thighs to his Privities, under which he wore a Linen Garment hanging down to his feet, and above it a round Violet Garment fringed at the Skirts, and adorned with Bells of Gold, and Pomegranates of the same ; the Bells signified Thunder, and the Pomegranats Lightning. Upon his breast he wore a Veil of five colours ; Gold, Purple, Scarlet, Silk and Violet, wherewith ( as we have said ) the Vails of the Temple were wrought. He had likewise a Rochet of the same enriched with pure Gold, and in shape like the Garment he wore on his Body to the Thighs : it was also buttoned with two Golden Buttons; made in the form of Aps, wherein was inclosed the greatest and most precious Sardonyx Stone that could be found, bearing the names of the 12 Tribes of Israel engraven. On the other side did hang 12 precious Stones, three and three in a rank, divided into four rows. In the first was the Ruby; the Topaz, and the Emerald : in the second the Carbuncle; the Jasper, and the Sapphire : in the third the Agate, the Amethyst, and the Diamond : in the last the Onyx, the Beryl, and Chrysolite : in every one of which one name of the twelve Tribes was written. Upon his head he wore a Miter of Silk, which was crowned with Hyacinth : and aloft of it was another Crown of Gold, wherein was engraven sacred Letters, to wit, the four Vowels. The Garment that he commonly wore was not altogether so glorious ; this he used only when he entered into the Sanctuary, which was but once a year, and that alone, the whole Nation observing a Solemn Fast that day. But we will hereafter speak more at large of the City and Temple, the Laws, Customs, Ordinances and Observations, for these things cannot be briefly declared.

The description of Antonia.

The Castle Antonia was situate between the two Porches of the first Temple, which looked unto the West, and the North : and was built upon a Rock of Stone of fifty Cubits high, on every side was inaccessible : it was built by King Herod, to shew the greatness and magnificence of his mind. For first of all the Rock K to the foot thereof was covered with thin and slender Stones like Slatcs. Which was both an ornament to it, and a security. Before the Bartlements of the Fort there was a Wall three Cubits high, within which the Castle Antonia was built forty Cubits high, being within richly furnished, and contrived like the Palace of a King, with all kind of Offices and other necessary Rooms. For there were Porches, Baths, and large Halls to place Tents in : so that in respect of the number and convenience of the Rooms it seemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. The Model of it was like a Tower invironed with four other Towers, at every Corner one, whereof they that were on the South and East-side were seventy Cubits high, the other two were but fifty. So that out of the two highest, there was a perfect view of L the whole Temple. Where it joynted to the Porches of the Temple, there was on either side a pair of Stairs for the Souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For always the Roman Souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in their Arms upon festival days, lest the people should attempt any Rebellion. For the Temple was as a Check upon the Town, and the Castle Antonia commanded the Temple : and had its Guards likewise, as there were also in Herods Palace, which commanded the higher part of the City. The Hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned ; and being the highest part of all, was joynted to part of the new City, which hindered the prospect of the Temple on the North-side. And thus I have spoken sufficiently of the City, and the Wall in this place, because we mean hereafter to describe M them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Jews refused to yield, and sallied out upon the Romans.

15000 follow
Simon.
The most warlike of the people joynted with Simon, being in number ten thousand, beside the Idumeans : and those ten thousand had fifty Captains, all subject unto Simon. The Idumeans that took his part were five thousand, and had ten Captains, the Chief of whom were Jacob the Son of Sofas, and Simon the Son of Cashla. John, who kept the Temple, had six thousand Armed men, over whom were twenty Captains : to these there joynted two thousand of the Zealots ; and four hundred, who before had followed Eleazar, and Simon the Son of Jairus. So that warring one against another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that was not so Seditious as they, was their prey. Simon kept the upper part of the City, and the greater Wall as far as Gedron ; and all that part of the old Wall which is between Sila, and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the River Euphrates : he also kept all the Hill Aera ( which is the lower part of the City ) unto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his Mother. But John kept all the Temple

Simon's Camp against John.

A ple and the space about it, Ophla, and the valley of Cedron : and that which was between these two places which Simon and John kept, was consumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans Tents were pitched near unto the Walls of the City, yet did not this Sedition cease ; for being flesh'd with their success at the Romans first coming, they returned presently to their former animosity. And dividing themselves again, every man fought for his own interest, doing all the Romans could have with'd to be done. The Romans did them less harm than they did themselves : for by them the City suffered no new calamity, but endured far more misery before it was taken and destroyed by the Romans than it did at that time. The Romans by destroying it, did rather end than increase their misery. For the Seditious did take the City, and the Romans did overcome and take the Seditious, and the City was far stronger than the Walls : so that all their miseries may be ascribed to their own Nation, and nothing but Equity and Justice imputed to the Romans, as every one shall clearly see by that which ensued.

The Seditious took the City and the Romans overcome and took the Seditious.

The City being in this estate, Titus with a select body of Horse went up and down without it, to espie where he might most easily assault the Walls. And being in doubt a long time what to do, for that by the Valley his Foot could not possibly get up, and the Walls were not possible to be battered with Engines : at last he determined to assault it on that part where was the Monument of John the High Priest, for there the first Wall was lower than in other places ; and not fortified with a second Wall, because that those parts of the new City were but little inhabited ; so that from this place the Wall might easily be assaulted : whereby Titus was persuaded that the higher City, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends, called Nicano, came unto him ; being then in the left shoulder with an Arrow, as he attempted to come near Joseph, who went thither of purpose to persuade the Jews which were upon the Wall to yield : for Nicano was very eloquent, Cesar perceiving their minds, by their violence to him who persuaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was moved, and began with more eagerness to besiege them : wherefore he permitted his Souldiers to demolish the Suburbs, and to gather all the Rubbish, Stones, and Wood, and other matter together, and make therewith a Mount. Then dividing his Army into three parts, he ordered what each of them should do, and in the midst upon the Mounts he disposed his Archers, and before them Engines for shot, wherewith he hindered the Salleys of his Enemies, lest they should annoy the Work, and beat those off from the Wall, who made any resistance from thence. After which all the Trees being cut down, the Suburbs appeared naked. The Romans having gathered the Wood together, were busied in the Work, and the Jews were not idle : For the people being tired with Murthers and Robberies, did hope to have an end of their misery, the Seditious people being busied against their Enemies : and they now hoped that if the Romans did overcome, they might berevenge upon them. John still kept where he was, fearing Simon, yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the Wall, men with Darts, which before were taken from Sefseis Governour of the Romans, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the Darts did the Jews small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to use them ; only some who were taught by some of the Fugitive Romans used them a little. Nevertheless they assaulted the Roman Souldiers that were building the Mounts with Arrows and Stones, made Salleys upon them by companies, and gave them disturbance : But the Roman Pioneers were defended by Hurdles, that were of purpose set before them : and every Legion had strange and admirable Engines against the excursions of their Enemy, and especially the Engines that the tenth Legion had to cast Darts, and others that cast Stones ; which did not only repulse them by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood upon the Wall : for every Stone though a Talent weight, was shot more than a Furlong, and flew not only those that were first struck, but also many that were stricken with the rebound. But the Jews always saw the Stones before they fell ( for they were white ) and avoided them : and they were not only desecured by the noise they made in flying, but they might easily be perceived : by which means the watchmen in the Towers gave warning always when these Engines were shot off, and when the Stones came, crying in their Country language, The Stone cometh : so the Jews upon the Walls knowing what they meant, avoided the Stones, and received no harm. Then the Romans devised to black the Stones with Ink, that they might not be seen as they flew, and do the more Execution. Yet the Jews were not so terrified, as to permit the Romans peaceably

Titus circuit, ing the Wall, which way he should attempt his battery.

The darts did the Jews little goods, because they were not expert in using them.

peaceably to build the Mount, but Night and Day they hindered them with Stratagemes and Salleys. When the Romans had finished their Work, the Carpenter measured the space between the Mounts and the Walls, with a Plumbet fastned to a line, which they cast from one place to another (for they could not measure it otherwise, because of the Darts from the Walls) and finding that they had Rams long enough, they set them up, and Titus commanded the Wall to be battered in three places; to the end that the Battery might not be hindered. The noise that these Rams made was heard round about the City, which was a great terror to the Citizens, and the Seditious were no less afraid. And seeing themselves all in the same danger, they determined to joyn unanimously together against the Romans: the Seditious upbraiding one another that they rather assisted the Enemy, than resisted them: and therefore exhorted one another mutually, at least for that time, to unite and make resistance against the Romans. And Simon sent an Officer unto the Temple, to proclaim leave for all such as would, to come unto the Walls: which also John did permit, notwithstanding he mistrusted Simon: so forgetting their old quarrel, they joyned all together against the Romans, and placing themselves upon the Walls, they cast fire upon the Engines of the Romans, and those who manag'd them; throwing Darts against them without intermission, whilst the bravest amongst them in great companies leapt down, and destroyed that wherewith the Engines were covered, and assaulted those that stood to defend them; by which means they did the Romans much harm, and more by their desperate boldness than their skill.

But Titus was still at hand to succor them that stood in need: and placing Horsemen and Archers about the Engines, he repulsed the Jews who came to cast Fire, beat off them that cast Darts and shot Arrows from the Towers, and so gave the Rams time and opportunity to play; yet these Rams did no great execution, only a corner of a Tower was shattered by the Ram of the fifth Legion. But without any detriment to the Wall: for the Tower being much higher than the Wall, when the Tower tumbled, it fell over the Wall, and carried nothing along with it. The Jews being repulsed, and for some time discontinuing their Sallys, perceived the Romans were grown secure, and dispersed carelessly over their Camp, as presuming their late ill fortune would discourage the Jews from any new attack, but they were mistaken in their account: for the Jews sallied privately at the Gate by the Tower of Hippicos, threw fire into their Trenches among their Engines, and assaulted them bravely when they had done. But the Romans being quickly sensible of their danger, got immediately together, and with the excellence of their Discipline, repelled not only the first insult and fury of the Jews, but beat back all their supplies. So there began a grievous Battle about the Engines; the Jews striving to fire, and the Romans to hinder them; great noise and clamour there was, and many in the Front were slain on both sides. At first the Jews had the better; and their fire did some mischief upon the Engines: and all had been quite consumed, had not the Souldiers from Alexandria hindered it, who for the opinion that M they had of themselves, did fight stoutly (being accounted the most valiant of all in this Battle) till such time as the Emperor with certain select Horsemen fell violently upon the Enemies: and himself slew 12 men, for whose deaths the rest fearing, fled, and were forced to retire into the City, and so the Engines were saved. It chanced that one of the Jews was taken alive, and Titus commanded that he should be crucified before the Wall, that perhaps the rest being terrified, might yield. After Cesar was retired, John the Captain of the Idumeans talking upon the Wall with one of his friends, being stricken in the breast with an Arrow by an Arabian Souldier, presently died: which caused great lamentation among the Jews, and sorrow amongst the Seditious, for he was very valiant, and wife.

CHAP. VIII.

The fall of the Tower, and how the two Walls were taken.

The year of the World, 4034, after
the Nativity
of Christ, 71.

THE night following, there was a great tumult among the Romans: For Titus the Emperour had commanded to build three Towers, 50 Cubits high a-piece, each one upon a several Mount, that from thence he might the more easily beat the Enemies from the Walls: But one of these Towers in the midst of the night fell down without any assault. And making a great noise with the fall, fear fell upon the whole Army; who suspecting it a Stratagem of the Jews, every one ran to his Arms, and so there was a great tumult in the Camp: and because no man could tell what it was a long time, they stood amazed, every one asking his fellow what had hapned. But seeing no Enemy come, they began to apprehend Treason amongst themselves: till such time as Titus understanding the matter, caused the truth thereof to be presently proclaimed throughout the Camp; and the Tumult (with much ado) was appeased.

The Jews bore up courageously against all other dangers, but were much gauled from these Towers which Titus had erected; for they were slain and wounded from thence with small Shot, Darts and Arrows, for they could build nothing to defend themselves so high, nor had they any hope to destroy them: for neither could they be thrown down for their weight, nor fired, being covered with Iron: therefore flying from the reach of the shot, they could not hinder the Ram from battering their Walls; which never ceasing, at last prevailed somewhat. So the great Ram, which the Jews called Nicon, because it overcame all, at last battered the Wall; and the Jews being weary with fighting, having watched all night before, out of sleepiness, or because they perfwaded themselves that the Wall was superfluous, they having two more beside it, they all forsook their quarters, and retired to the second Wall; and the Romans entered the first, that the Ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romans that had passed and entered the first Wall, went and opened the Gates, and let in the whole Army. Having thus gotten the North-side of the City which before Cestius had wasted.

Titus removed his Camp from thence, and went unto the place called the Affrians Camp, and seized upon all between that and Cedron; and being without shot of an Arrow from the second Wall, he began again to assault it. Then the Jews dividing the Wall betwixt them to defend each others part, resisted most valiantly: John and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders Tomb; and Simon defended all from Johns Tomb unto the Gate by the Tower Hippicos. And many times issuing out of the Gates, they fought hand to hand with the Enemy, but always repulsed by the discipline of the Romans, only for want of knowledge in Warlike affairs; yet in all fights upon the Wall, the Jews had the Best; for though the Romans had the advantage in fortune and knowledge, yet the Jews being desperate, attacked them without fear; for they are very courageous in Adversity. Moreover, the Jews were necessitated to fight to save their own lives; and the Romans were as hasty to conquer. Neither party was weary, neither party desisted in their assaulting one another: In the day time the Jews in Commanded Parties made their Sallys upon the Romans, who omitted no kind of fight from Sun-set, all the night long; which was more terrible to them both, than all the service of the day before: The Jews feared, lest the Romans should get the Wall; and the Romans apprehended lest the Jews should have sallied out upon their Camp. Thus all night long they stood to their Arms, and early in the morning they were at it again. The Jews strove one with another who should undergo the most danger, and most deserve his Captains favour. Simon's followers were so much at his beck, that if he should have commanded any of them to have killed himself, he would presently have done it. The Romans were encouraged to fight, by their discipline and success, as having never been used to be overcome. Again; their frequent Wars, continual Exercises, and large Dominions gave them great Courage, especially Titus their General being present to provoke them; for it was thought a heinous crime to be a Coward in the presence of such a Captain as Cesar was. Cesar himself beholding and looking on, was a witness of their deeds that behaved themselves valiantly, and rewarded every man as he behaved himself: It was an advantage to be known unto the Prince for a Valiant man: so that many of them shewed their alacrity was far greater than their strength.

Longinus breich into the midst of the Jews army and distur- eth it.

At this time Longinus one of the Horsemen coming out of the Roman Army, pre-<sup>H</sup> fed into the midst of the Jews Forces, and casting them down that stood in his way, by violence slew two of the strongest of the Enemies, striking one of them over the Face, and slaying another with his own Dart which he took from him: who for this deed was greatly honoured, having broken through a strong Body of the Jews that were placed before the Walls, and cast Darts at him on either side. Many of the Romans by this his Example were inticed to do the like.

The Jews now regarded not what they suffered, but only devised which way to harm their Enemies; not regarding death, so that they might kill any of the Romans. But Titus had as much care to preserve his Souldiers, as he had to get the Victory, attributing these rash Sallies to the desperation of the Jews, and accounting that only Virtue I which was done warily and with discretion.

CHAP. IX.

How Castor the Jew derided the Romans.

Castor a subtle and politic Jew.

<sup>T</sup>HEN Titus commanded the Ram to be set up against the Tower on the North part of the City, wherein a crafty and politic Jew with ten men had hid himself, all K the rest being fled: this Jew was named Castor. These men having lain still a while in their Arms, at last being afraid, and the Tower beginning to shake, they leapt up, and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly crave favour at Caesars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as he thought, and perceiving himself that the Jews did now repent of their Obstinacy, he caused the Ram to cease from battery, and the Archers to hold their hands; and permitted Castor to speak his pleasure. Castor said, That he desired to treat, and make a League of Peace.

And Titus answered, That he would grant it, if all the rest would be concluded, and that he would presently confirm a League of Peace between him and the City. Five L of Caesars fellows seemed to be willing, but the other five seemed to oppose it; Crying out aloud, That they would never be slaves to the Romans, whilst they could die in liberty. Whilst Castor and his fellows were debating the matter, the battery ceased. In the mean time Castor privily sent word unto Simon, willing him whilst the Battery was stoppt, to think of some expedient to be done in this necessity: for, for a while he would undertake to delude the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspense. In the mean time he seemed to exhort his Companions, to accept the kind offer of Titus: and they as it were angry thereat, drew their Swords and struck upon their Corsets, and fell down, as though they had been slain. Titus and his Souldiers were amazed at their obstinacy, for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceive what was done; M they wondered exceedingly at their desperation, and pitied their calamity. At the same time one struck Castor in the Buttock with a Dart, and Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it unto the Emperour, and complained of it, as a breach of the Truce. Titus with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would have sent Joseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Joseph denied to go, affirming that Castor only dissembled, and hindred his friends that would have gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled unto the Romans, offered himself to go. Castor invited him, as though he would give him something to secure him of his true meaning. Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would have cast him down something of worth; and when he came underneath the Tower, Castor took a great stone and threw it down upon N him, yet hurt him not, because he was aware of it, and avoided the stone; but it wounded another Souldier standing by. Then Castor considering this deceit, began to think that Pity and Mercy in War was hurtful, and that Cruelty was not so easily deceived; and being very angry at this deceit, he caused the Wall to be beaten with the Ram more than before. Castor and his fellows perceiving the Tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed thorow the flame, and conveyed themselves into a mine of the Tower; giving the Romans fresh occasion to admire their Courage, in passing thorow the Flames.

Titus assaulting the Wall on his part, took it five days after, and forcing the Jews from thence, He, accompanied with a thousand choice men, entred where the Wool- O men, Copper-Smiths, and Merchant-Taylors dwelt, which place was the new City, with

A with narrow and strait ways to go to the Wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the Wall, or, as he might have done by the Law of Arms, destroyed what he had gotten, he had obtained the Victory without any loss on his side. Yet hoping the Jews would yield, when they were in his power, he gave them more liberty to retire; for he did not think that they whose good he fought, would have been Traitors unto him who came to relieve them.

CHAP. X.

<sup>T</sup>ITUS having entred the City, suffered none of them that were taken, to be slain, nor the Houses to be burned, but permitted the Seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without prejudice to the People: he also promised the People to restore unto them all their Goods. For many besought him to spare the City for them and the Temple for the City. The People were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Jews thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and judged that Titus, for that he despaired to win the rest of the City, did now Coward-like propound these conditions. They likewise threatened the People, that whoever should speak one word concerning Peace, and yielding unto the Romans, should presently die: and some of them did resist the Romans from out of their houses, others in the narrow ways: and others going out at the higher Gates renewed the fight, wherewith the Watchmen being troubled, fled from the Wall, and forsaking the Towers, retired themselves into the Camp. The Roman Souldiers within the City cried out, because they were inclosed with Enemies, the Gates being shut, and assaulted without, by those who apprehended their Companions to be in great danger. The number of the Jews encreasing, and prevailing, for that they knew the ways and turnings of the Streets, many of the Romans were slain and violently born down, when they offered to resist in that necessity; D for a multitude together could not flee, by reason of the narrowness of the Streets that went unto the Wall: and all that entred into the City had been slain, had not Titus succoured them. For placing at the end of every Street Archers, and himself being where most need was, he repulsed the Jews with Darts and Arrows, with the help of Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight proved himself a stout Warriour, and continued fighting with the Jews till all his fellow-Souldiers were got off.

Thus the Romans having got the second Wall, were beaten from it again; and the Citizens so encouraged, they were as it were drunk with their good fortune, thinking the Romans durst no more attempt upon the City, and that they themselves were invincible, when they were prepared to fight. God, because of their Iniquity, had darkened their understanding, so that they never considered the Roman Forces were far greater than those they had encountered, and the Famine that hung over their heads; for as yet they lived upon the destruction of the People, and drank the blood of a City: but the good People did even suffer Famine already, and many of them perished for want of food; yet the Seditious did rejoyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eased of a great burthen, only desiring they might live that bear rebellious minds, and would joyn with them against the Romans, rejoycing at the death of the rest; and this was the affection they bare unto their Citizens. In this manner they armed themselves and resisted the Romans, who now again did attempt to enter the Breach: whilst the Jews threw down Stones and part of the Wall upon them as they came up, F drew them back again, and valiantly sustained them for three days. But the fourth day being unable to withstand Titus his assault, they were forced to retire as before: and he having gotten the Wall, destroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a Garrison in the Towers and Fortresses of the South part.

The Jews courage encreased.

The People in want, and many die for hunger.

Titus once more gotten the second wall.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Mounts raised to batter the third Wall. A long Oration of Jeseephus to persuade the People to yield: and of the Famine in the City.

TITUS now determined to batter the third Wall, conceiving the Siege would be now but short: He thought it convenient to give the Seditious some time to be-think themselves, to see that if either by the taking of the second Wall, or terrified with Famine, they would repent. For there was little or nothing left in the City to I supply them, and he was posted as he desired. And the time being come, for every Roman Souldier to receive his proportion of Victuals, Titus caused them to be led every one in order into a place, where the Jews in the City might behold them; he caused his Captains to distribute money to every one, and the Souldiers (as their Custom is) all armed, and drawing their Swords out of their sheaths, marched along, the Horse-men leading their Horses in great Pomp, and a great part of the Suburbs glittered with gold and silver. This spectacle was grateful to their own Souldiers, and terrible to the Jews: for all the old Walls, and the North part of the City, and many Houses were filled with the multitude of them who came to view this sight; and there was no part K of the City that was not filled with People to behold it. This Spectacle struck a great fear upon the very boldest among the Jews, and perhaps would have caused the Seditious People to have relented, had they not despair'd to have found mercy and pardon at the Romans hands for their offences committed; wherefore they thought it better to be slain fighting, than to be put to death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. That Destiny hindred this resolution, it being decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the City with the Seditious: hereupon for four dayes space they distributed necessities to the Souldiers, and on the fifth day, Titus perceiving the Jews were still obstinate, divided his Army into two parts, and about Johns Tomb he began to raise Mounts, and against Antonia, hoping by them to take the higher part of the City; and by Antonia to seize the Temple; which except he could effect, he could not safely take L the City; Against either of these places he raised two Mounts, each Legion making one.

The Jews and Simons followers opposed the work that was begun before Johns Tomb, and John likewise with a great number of the Zealots hindred them that made the Mounts over against Antonia: who not only fought with the advantage of the higher ground, but had learned also the use of Engines: for continual use by little and little made them skilful: and they had 300 Engines called Balistæes; and 40 Engines to cast Stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romans, and obstructed them in their work.

Titus foreseeing that Fortune would favour him, and that the City would be taken, M pressed it what he could, never ceasing to persuade the Jews to yield: adding many Arguments to his importunity, for he knew that many times words prevail more than violence, wherefore he exhorted them to save themselves, and yield the City unto him, referring them to Joseph, who should make a speech to them in their own Language, and he hoped they would hear their own Country-man.

Then Joseph keeping himself out of the danger of their shot, called out unto them to commiserate themselves, the City, the Temple, the People, and not be more hard-hearted unto them than strangers. For the Romans had a reverence for the Holy-places, notwithstanding they had no Society or portion in them. That till that very day they had abstained from violating of them: whereas they who were brought up among them, and might save them, did wilfully cause their destruction. He advised them to consider, that their strongest Walls were battered down; and only the weaker remaining un battered: He willed them to consider how they were not able to withstand the Roman Forces; and that it was no novelty to the Jews to be subject to the Romans. For although it be a good and commendable thing to fight for Liberty, yet that must have been done in the beginning: for he that was once subject and rebell'd, having a long time lived under the obedience of the Romans, seemed rather to be desirous of a shameful Death, than an honourable Liberty. Moreover, he reproached them that they should choose rather to be subject to a base People, than to them whom the whole World obeyed. For (saith he) What habitable place is it that the Romans have not Conquered? They themselves may perceive, how Fortune has still favoured them: and that God had settled the Universal Monarchy in Italy. That by the Law of Nature, and the Example of

Beasts

A Beasts as well as men we are taught to give place unto them that are stronger than our selves, and be contented to submit to their Victory that are valiantest in Arms. This (saith he) was the cause that your Ancestors (who were far more strong and politick than you, and had better means to resist) did submit themselves unto the Romans: which if God had not been pleased withal, he would never have permitted. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the City was as it were already taken, and the Citizens, whilst their Walls were whole, most of them destroyed? For the Romans well knew the Famine that was among them, how it every day wasted the people, and would in short time devour their Souldiers. For suppose (saith he) the Romans would desist, withdraw their Siege, and offer no violence; there is a Civil War within the City, which you cannot overcome, or avert; unless you could fight against Hunger, and the adversity of Fortune. He added, That it was best, before intolerable Calamities beset them, to change their opinion, and whilst they had time, to be counselled by good advice. That the Romans would not punish them for what was already past, except they persisted in their obstinacy. For they are (saith he) Kind, Courteous, Gentle to their Subjects, and prefer their Commodity before Revenge. They thought it their interest to have the City in their Power, and the Country about it; and therefore the Emperour proposed to make a league of Peace with them: but if he took the City by force, he would spare none, seeing they were admonish'd so kindly before, and in their greatest necessity refused to obey him. He told them also, that the third Wall would in a short time be taken, as they might perceive by the other two: and though the City were inexpugnable, yet the Famine would force C it to yield in despite of its Strength.

As Joseph did thus advise them, those upon the Walls rail'd at him, upbraided him, and shot at him. Joseph seeing he could not avert them from their imminent calamities, recounted unto them out of their own Histories whatever made for his purpose.

On wreches (saith he) and ungrateful to your Friends. You resist the Romans, and continue perverse, as though you had conquered others that came, as they now do, against you. When doth God the maker of all things deny help unto us if we be oppressed? Will you not remember your selves? For what cause did you enterprize these Wars? And how great a Friend and Protector do you daily offend? Do ye not remember the miraculous Works of your Ancestors in this Holy place, and how in times past it was by the Enemies destroyed? But I tremble to recount the works of God to such unworthy hearers: But consider and you will find, that you do not only resist the Romans, but God himself. Nechias at that time King of Egypt, who also was called Pharaoh, came, and with an infinite Army took away Queen Sara, the Mother of our Nation. And what did our first Father Abraham in this case? Did he betake himself to Arms to revenge that injury, though he had under his command three hundred and eighteen Captains, and under them an infinite multitude: Did he not rather desist from War, perceiving God not to accompany him? and lifting up his pure hands towards this Holy-place, which now you have defiled and prophaned, implore the assistance of his invincible God: And was not the Queen the second night after sent home again unto him untouched? whilst the Egyptian adoring this Holy-place (which ye have polluted with Murders of your own Nation) and trembling at the Visions he saw in the night-time, fled, rewarding the Hebrews with Gold and Silver, whom he perceived to be so beloved of God.

E Shall I recount unto you the going of our Ancestors into Egypt? who having for four hundred years been slaves to the Egyptian Tyrants and Kings, and able to have revenged themselves by force of Arms, yet did they rather expect and pray Gods leisure. Who knoweth that then Egypt, in revenge of their tyranny to the Hebrews, was overrun with all kinds of Serpents, and infected with all kind of Diseases, the Earth became barren, Nilus dry, and the ten plagues followed one another; our Ancestors were safely delivered without bloodshed, God Almighty conducting them, as willing to reserve them for his Priests.

F When the Assyrians had taken away from us the Holy Ark, did not Palestina and Dagon their privy parts being petrified, their Bowels and meat came from them, and with un-Affrian, and to make Satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our Ancestors, because they, depositing their Arms, they resigned themselves wholly to his pleasure. Was Senacherib King of Assyria, with all his Power out of Asia incamping before this City, overcome by humane force? Did not our Ancestors wave their own force and betake themselves to prayer, and God by his Angel in one night destroyed an infinite Army: so as that the next day the Assyrian found a hundred suns and five thousand of his men dead and, fled with the rest from the alarm'd Hebrews, though they never pursued? You know also, that in the Captivity of Babylon, where the people lived the space of seventy years, they got not their liberty till such time as God disposed Cyrus to suffer them to depart into their own Country. And continuing his assistance, they again (as the Priests in old time were wont) did serve and reverence their helper. In brief, our Ancestors did never achieve any great matter by force of Arms, neither did they leave any thing undone wherein they expected Gods help, but still remaining quiet at home, they overcome their Enemies wholly by his Providence: and when they trusted to their own strength, they always miscarried. For when Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Jeremy, went forth to fight with the King of Babylon at that time besieging the City, both he and his whole Party were taken, and this City destroyed. Yet consider how faryour Generals are inferior to that King, and your selves to the people of those times. For Jeremy declaring to the City, that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yield, it should be taken by force; yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands upon him. And you (that I may omit your iniquity done within the City, which though I would, I could not sufficiently decipher) do revile and attempt to kill me for giving you wholesome Counsel for your good; only for that I put you in mind of your sins, which you have not patience to hear. The same happened also when Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, besieged the City, God was highly displeased at our Ancestors, permitted them to be slain, the Town spoiled, and this Holy place for three years and six months to be made desolate. What should I shew unto you any more examples: Who first incited the Romans against the Jews? Was it not the impiety of our own Countrymen that did it? Whence was our bondage at that time? Did it not prove ourselves from the Seditious of our Ancestors, when the fury of Aristobulus and Hircanus brought Pompey unto our City, and God subdued them by the Romans, being grown unworthy of Liberty; and at length after a three months siege, though they were not so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege, yet they yielded themselves. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus the Son of Aristobulus, who invaded the Kingdom, and brought our Nation again into subjection; God laying this bondage upon them being provoked by the iniquity of our Nation? Herod the Son of Antipater, brought Sotius and the Roman Army, and besieged the City six months: and at last, for the greatness of our iniquity, it was taken and punished, and sacked by the Enemies. Thus you evidently see that our Nation never prevail'd by force of Arms. And assure your selves that even now the City will be taken. It is meet therefore that you who keep this Holy place, commit your selves wholly to God, and then you need not fear the forces of your Enemies, when your piety assures you of Gods help and succour. But what one Article of Gods Law have you observed? Nay, what have you not done that is forbid? How far greater is your impiety than theirs? and yet they suddenly perished for their sins. Formaking small account of secret sins, as Stealing, Deceit, and Adulteries, you violently take away mens Goods by force, you murder whom you please, devise new ways to sin: have made the Holy Temple the place of your impieties; and what the Romans themselves did adore, is by your own Nation polluted and defiled, whilst you derogate from the honour of our Religion by the impiety of your actions, and yet hope for his help, whom you have so heinously offended: you are very just people and obedient, and it is with pure hands you beg assistance of God. Did our King pray so unto God, when he obtained, that in one night so many of the Assyrians should be destroyed? Or did the Romans commit such impiety as the Assyrians did, that you may hope of the like revenge upon them. The Assyrian received a sum of Money to save the City, and yet not regarding his Oath, endeavour'd to destroy it. The Romans do only request the same Tribute that was paid by our Ancestors: and if they may have it, will never destroy the City, nor touch our Holy things. They will also permit you to enjoy freely your Families and Possessions, and suffer your Laws to remain inviolate. It is madness for you to hope that God will punish just men, as he did sinners and impious persons, seeing he can punish as he pleases. To be short, he destroyed the Assyrians the first night they encamped before the City. And if he had purposed to deliver you, and punish the Romans, he would have done it, when Pompey and Sotius came against the City, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or now N when Titus made his assault. But neither Pompey nor Sotius suffered any harm, and both of them took the City. Vespasian prosper'd so well in his Wars against you, that he hath got the whole Empire: And the Fountains which yielded you no Water before, do give it to Titus in abundance. For you know that before his coming, the Fountains without the City and Siloa were so dry that Water was sold by measure, yet now they flow plentifully, do not only serve his Army, but water all the Gardens about. What this wonder foretelleth, you have already experienced, when the King of Babylon came with his Army and destroyed the City, took it, and fired it, and the Temple; notwithstanding that (as I am persuaded) the Jews at that time were not so wicked as now. I think therefore that God hath forsaken this Holy place, and is gone over to your Enemies. Will not a good man fly a wicked house, and abhor the impiety of the Inhabitants. And do you think that God will abide your impiety,

The definition of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon.

To Joseph bitter invective against them.

The Jews sins against the Law.

The Romans use the same manner of us, to throw against the Jews, as the Assyrians did.

God knoweth when to revenge.

The Fountains that before this were dry, now flow to Titus.

A piety, who bolder all secrets, and knoweth all things that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seek to find? Nay what do you think your Enemies do not know? All your iniquities are apparent: and your contention with one another is, who shall be most impious, and with as much labour endeavour to be Vicious as others do to be Virtuous. Yet for all this it is not too late to amend, Gods wrath will be appeased, if ye acknowledge your sins, and be penitent for your offences. Throw away your Arms then, and pity your Country now ruined by your own means. Turn your Eyes and behold the beauty of the Place, whose ruin you seek. I am brave a City, how magnificent a Temple, how rich with the Gifts of all Nations! Who would fire these? who would desire the ruin of these? Or what is there in the World that better deserveth to be preserved? O hard hearted people, more blockish and insensible than Stones! Or if you do not pity your Temple, let your Families move you; look upon your Children your Wives, and your Parents, all ready to be consumed, either with Sword or Famine. I am sensible my Wife, my Children, and Family, must perish with you (and there was a time when they would have been considered) and it may be thought it is to save their lives I give this advice; but kill them, and sacrifice me for your welfare: I am prepared to die, if my death may be a means to preserve you in being.

Whilst Joseph made this speech unto them the Tears trickled down his Cheeks; but the Seditious being nothing moved, replied, that it was not safe for them to yield. The people however were persuaded to fly: and selling their possessions and what they had at small rates, they swallow'd down the Gold which they received, left the Thieves should take it from them. And when they had escaped to the Romans Camp, they emptied their Bellies, and found it again, and had wherewithal to buy them necessities. Titus also permitted many to go away whithersoever they pleased: which caused divers to flee, thereby to be delivered from the calamity which they endured in the City. But John and Simon were as diligent to stop the ways, lest the Citizens should escape, as they were to hinder the Romans from entering into the City: so that upon the least suspicion of any mans flight, he was presently put to death. The richer sort, whether they stayed or fled, were slain for their wealth and possessions. The Famine of the City, and the desperation of the Thieves increased alike every day; and when no more Corn was to be found, the Seditious persons brake into the houses, and searched every Corner to find Corn; if in their search they found any, they beat the owners thereof for denying it at first: if they found none, they tortured them for having hidden it. Whosoever was strong of Body, and in good liking they killed; upon presumption that he had some secret stores, or else he could not have been in so good plight and fat as he was. They that were pined with Famine, were slain; because they thought it no offence to kill them, who in a short time would die of themselves. Many gave all they had for one bushel of Corn, and thrusting themselves up privately in their houses, eat their Corn as it was unground: others made bread thereof as necessity and fear required. No man in the whole City fate down to eat his meat at the Table, but snatch'd it greedily from the fire, and devoured it half raw and half roast.

Most miserable was this manner of living, and a spectacle which none without Tears was able to behold; the strongest still got the most, and the weakest bewailed their misery: for now Famine was their greatest calamity. And nothing doth arm men more than shame; during this Famine, no reverence was had towards any man: Wives took the meat out of their Husbands mouths, Children from their Parents, and Mothers from their Infants, which was the saddest spectacle of all. No body had now any compassion, neither did they spare their dearest Infants, but suffered them to perish in their Arms, by taking from them the very drops of Life. Yet could they not eat in such secrecy, but some or other still came to take away from them that whereupon they fed. For if in any place they saw a door shut, they conjectured that they who were in the house were eating meat, and forthwith breaking down the Doors, they came in, got them by the throat, and took the meat half-chewed out of their mouths as it was ready to be swallowed down. The old men were driven away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food: the Women were drawn up and down by the hair of the head, for that they hid between their hands some part of their meat, and would not forgo it. No pity remained either to old age or infancy. They took the young Babes, their mouths full of meat, and dashed them against the ground. If any had prevented these Thieves, and eaten their meat before they could get at them, they were more cruelly and more tyrannously handled, as having committed a greater offence against them. They devised most barbarous and cruel torments to extort food from others: for they thrust sticks or such like into the cavity of mens yards, and thrust thorny rods into their Fundaments : and it is abominable to hear what the people endured to make them confess one loaf of Bread, or one handful of Corn which they had hidden.

The Honourable and Rich are drawn before the Tyrants.

The diffention between Zelaus and Simon was for Rule, their concord was in wickedness.

These Mifercreants did not yet for all this feel either hunger or thirst : for then their impieties had been more tolerable ; but they did it only to exercise their cruelty, preparing six days food for themselves aforchard. Some poor creatures eluding the Roman-Guards had been abroad in the night to gather Wood or Grass in the Field, and returning into the City were rejoicing in their felicity, having escaped the danger of the Enemy, but they were seized by these mifercreants, their Herbs taken from them ( though gotten with the hazard of their lives, ) denying them a small part of that, for which they had undergone such danger, yea they thought themselves obliged though robbed and spoiled, if they escaped the Swords of these Tyrants. These were the Calamities which the baser sort of people endured at the hands of the common Soldiers : but the Nobles & chief Men of the City were led to their Officers, accused before them of Intelligence with the Romans ; and for some forged Treason or other put to Death. Many times they suborned people to accuse them of intending to fly to the Romans. Those that Simon robbed were sent to John ; and those that John spoiled were sent to Simon : drinking as it were one to another in the Blood of the People, and dividing their dead Carcasses between them ; insonmuch that though they disagreed in their desire of rule and domination : they both conspired in mischief and iniquity. For he that did not give the other part of what by his cruelty he had extorted from the miserable Citizens, was accounted ungenerous : and he that received not his share, complained of the injustice, as believing he had a right to the Rapine and Cruelty.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities : but in short, I think never any City endured the like, nor never any People since the memory of men were so cruel and barbarous : and that their impiety to strangers might seem the less, they spake evil of the Nation of the Hebrews, and cursed them, and openly confessed themselves to be slaves, People of divers Countries, united together in wickedness, bastards and abortives of their Nation. They demolished the City, and forced the Romans (though against their will ) to except of a dismal Victory, halting the Fire into the Temple, as though it stayed from it too long. Neither were they at all affected, when they saw the higher part of the City on fire ; though many among the Romans beheld it with sorrow, as we will shew hereafter, when we describe the event of that business.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the burning of the Rampires.

The poor people in misery.

THE Mounts and Rampires that Titus built, did greatly advantage him : Yet his Soldiers endured some loss by the Jews from the Wall, to recompence it what he could, upon intelligence that their rapine and plunder in the Town being not sufficient to supply their necessities, the Jews were forced to seek out into the Valleys for food, he disposed certain parties of Horse, and other select men in Ambush to intercept them ; for though their exigencies were very great, yet being for the most part poor people with Families in the City they durst not run over to the Romans, lest their Wives and Children should be murdered in their absence, wherefore they were forced to make private excursions in the night to conceal themselves from the Enemy, and having fallen unexpectedly into this Ambuscade, they fought it courageously, as knowing it too late to expect mercy after such untractable obstinacy, but they were defeated, many of them taken, and tortured, and afterwards crucified before the Walls of the City. Titus looked upon their condition as very deplorable, for scarce a day past in which there were not 500 Jews taken and served in that manner by those parties of Horse, yet he thought it inexpedient to remove them, because they were a great security to the rest of his Army : But his great design was by the cruelty of that spectacle to terrify the City and hasten its surrender. Wherefore the Soldiers in hatred to our Nation, crucified all they took, one after one fashion, and another after another, in derision. And the multitude of the Captives was become so great, there was left no space for the crosses, nor indeed crosses for their bodies to be crucified upon. But the seditions Jews within the City were so far from relenting by this massacre, that rather their hearts were more hardened so that herewith they terrified the rest of the multitude : O for they carried the relations of those who were taken by the Romans to the Walls, and

A that they might see how those were used that fled to the Romans : the same sight they also shewed unto them that desired peace ; affirming that they whom the Romans had so used, were those that fled unto them for succour, and not captives by them taken. This deterred many who would otherwise have fled to the Romans ; till such time as the truth hereof was known. Yet some there were that ventured to the Enemy, as preferring Death and Torment at their hands, before the Miferies and Famine which they endured at home.

Hereupon Titus cut off many of the Captives hands, and sent them into the City to Simon and John, that their Calamity might testify them to be Captives, and not such as had fled voluntarily to the Romans, willing them to admonish their Friends to yield, and not compel him to destroy the City : and to assure them that in so doing, they might still save their lives, their Country, and Temple, which had not the like in the whole World : and he continually went about the Rampires halting the workmen in their business, as though he presently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had spoken. The Jews that stood upon the Walls, reviled both him and his Father, affirming that they contemned Death ; and would chuse rather to die, than become slaves : That whilst they lived, they would to their power defend themselves against the Romans, without any care either of themselves or their Country ; which Cesar sent them word were both in imminent danger. Moreover, they said that the whole World was a Temple dedicated to God, far more excellent than theirs, which notwithstanding should be conserved by him that dwelt in it ; whose help they hoped to enjoy, and did therefore deride all his threatnings, as things that could never come to pass without his divine permission. Thus did they opprobriously abuse the clemency of the Romans.

At this time arrived also Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him a considerable supply of Men, among which there was a company called the Macedonians, of equal years, and little older than young men, all trained up in Martial Discipline, and armed after the Macedonian manner, from whence they took their name : yet for the most part they did not answer the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagne was the most fortunate and happy of all Kings that were subject to the Roman Empire, till such time as he felt the frown of Fortune ; who in his old age proved that none ought to be accounted happy before his death : whilst Comagne was in prosperity, his Son said, he marvelled that the Romans did delay to assault the City, and enter the battered Walls (for this young Man was a great Warriour, and of exceeding strength, to the which he trusting too much, did many things rashly.) Titus smiled, and answered, that that was a work too great for the Romans. Upon which young Antiochus, accompanied with his Macedonians, assaulted the Wall, and himself with his strength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Jews, and cast his darts at them : but his whole Party (a few excepted) were there slain : for obliged by their extravagant boasting, they continued longer in fight than it was expedient for them : at last many being wounded retired, perceiving that the Macedonians to win a Victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the twelfth day of May began to build their Rampires : and labouring seventeen whole days, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth of the said Month. For they builded four vast Rampires, one of them over against Antonia, which was built by the fifth Legion opposite to the middle of the Struthian Waters : another was built by the twelfth Legion, twenty Cubits distant from the other. But the tenth Legion, which was of more account than the two former, erected a Mount opposite to the Pond called Amegadalon on the North-side : and the fifteenth Legion made the fourth, thirty Cubits distant from the other, over against the Monument of the High Priest John.

F The Mount being thus finished, John undermined that which was over against Antonia, and underpropped it with posts of Wood, and filling the Mine with Wood, Burmen and Pitch, he fired it : so the posts that held it up, being burnt, the Mine fell, and the Mount also with a hideous noise fell into it : and first of all there arose a great smoke and dust, for the Mines covered the flame : at last the fire having consumed the matter that covered it, the flame appeared. The Romans at this sudden and unexpected exploit were much amazed and disordered : so that thereby those who before made account of the victory as certain, began now to despair. Two days after Simon and his associates set upon the other Rampires : for thereon were planted Rams, wherewith the Romans began to beat the Walls. Amongst the rest, a man named Tephias of Garfas a City of Galilee, Megastarus one of Queen Mariamms Servants, and with them one of Adiabena the Son of Mabarcus, who for his fortune was named Agiras, which signified lame : these three taking fire-brands, ran unto the Engines, and there was none found in all the Roman Army more valiant than these men, nor more terrible : for they ran amidst the throng of their Enemies so boldly, as though they had gone amongst their Friends, and never made any stay, but breaking through the midst of their Enemies, they fired their Engines : and notwithstanding that on every side they were assailed with Darts and Arrows ; yet did they not give back, nor seek to avoid the danger, till such time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines. The flame mounting on high, the Romans came running out their Camp to succour their fellows : and the Jews upon the Wall with Darts and Arrows hindered them that fought to quench the flame, exposing their own Bodies. The Romans endeavoured to draw off the Rams : And the Jews were as earnest to hinder them : I however the Romans preserved their Rams. From thence the fire caught hold of the Rampires, those that opposed themselves were burned : and the fire increased, so that it could not be extinguished ; so the Romans invironed with the flame, and despairing to rescue their Works, retired into their Camp, and left them on fire. But the Jews were so much the more earnest, their number still encreasing by new supplies out of the City : and so encouraged by their Victory, they rashly adventured unto the Romans Camp and assailed the Guard there. Which guard was a Company placed round before the Camp in Armour ; with orders not to leave their ground upon pain of death. And these men esteeming it better to die gloriously, than ignominiously to suffer, resisted very valiantly : so that many that had fled retired themselves, back again to fight, both for shame that they had forsaken their place, and for fear of punishment thereof : and placing new Engines upon the Rampire of their Camp, they stoped the Jews from Sallying any more : for they came out unarmed, without any Arms of defence. For the Jews without any consideration came rashly upon their Enemies Pikes, and assailed them with their fists. So that the Jews prevailed more by their courage, than their Arms : and the Romans fled more for the Jews boldness than any harm they sustained by them.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Wall which the Roman Army built about Jerusalem in three days space.

Titus deliberated with his Captains what was to be done ; and they that were most forward amongst them, thought it best with the whole Army to assault the Walls : for that as yet the Jews had only fought with a part, and were not able to withstand the force of the whole Army, but would be all consumed with Darts and Arrows. The wiser sort persuaded Titus to repair his Rampires : but others counselled the contrary, to hold themselves quiet there, and only to keep all places about, that no food should be conveyed into the City, and so famish it without fighting. For that the Jews being now desperate, and desirous to be slain, would not be overcome by force. But Titus thought it dishonourable to lie idle with so huge an Army, and do nothing ; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them who would willingly fight to be slain : and he could not make any Mounts, because he wanted Materials, and it was most difficult of all to guard every place about the City, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleaguered round on every side, by reason of the difficult places and great compass

A pals thereof, fearing also the dangers that might ensue, the Jews issuing out of the City. For the Jews seeing their open ways possessed by the Romans, they would devise some secret ways, both urged thereunto by necessity, and also because they knew all places thereabout very well. And it so be that the Jews should secretly effect any thing to prejudice them, that then their Siege was like to continue so much the longer : so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the Glory of his Victory. For though all those ways might be taken, yet he preferred Speed before Certainty : and if so be he would use celerity and safety, then it was needful for him to compass the whole City round about with a Wall : for so all ways and passages might be blocked up, and the Jews seeing no hope of safety, should be compelled either to yield the City, or to be consumed with Famine. Nor by any other means could be secure, but by erecting Mounts ; having that Wall to defend them. And if any one think that work difficult, and not to be achieved, let him consider that it did not become the Romans to make a base and slender piece of work : and that no man in the World could without labour effect any great matter, but God only. Having with these speeches encouraged his Captains, he caused them to lead the Soldiers, and dispose them all about these businesses. The Soldiers had as it were some divine vigour and courage fall upon them : for not only the Captains, parting the circuit amongst them, but the Soldiers also strove who should first effect their part ; and every Soldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and Centurion the Tribune, and the Tribune to please the chief Commander, and he to please Cæsar, who every day went round about and beheld the Work : and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians Camp, where he was encamped, he drew a Wall all about, even to the new City ; and from thence by Cedron and Mount Olivet ; and so turned toward the South, and enclosed the Mountain with the Rock called Perisferemas, and the Hill next adjoining thereunto which hangeth over Siloe : and from thence bending his Work to the West, he brought it down all along the Valley of the Fountain : from whence ascending to the Monument of Ananus the High-Priest, where Pompey pitched his Tents, he brought it about by the North side of the City, and coming along to the Village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the Monument of Eleazar towards the East, and so joyined the Wall to his Camp, where he began. This Wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this Wall he built also thirteen Forts, every one ten furlongs in compass. And all this whole work was finished in three days space, which yet required Months to have been built in : so that the celerity in the building thereof makes it scarcely credible. The City being thus encompassed with a Wall, and Guards placed in every Fort, Titus himself continued to go round the first Watch, to see all things in good order : the second Watch he allotted to Alexander : and the third to the Captains of the Legions, and the Watchmen appointed every one his turn to sleep : and so till all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Famine in Jerusalem : and of the building of the second Rampire by the Romans.

The restraint of liberty to pass in and out of the City, took from the Jews all hope of safety ; and the Famine now increasing, consumed whole Households and Families : the Houses were full of dead Women and Infants ; and the Streets of the Cities of elder Men : and the young Men pale like Ghosts, walked about the Market place, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were alive could not bury them ; nor indeed cared they for burying them, being now uncertain what should betide themselves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell down themselves dead upon them as they were burying them. Many being yet alive, went into their Graves and there died. Yet for all this Calamity, was there no weeping nor lamentation ; for the Famine overcame all affections. And they who were yet living, without tears beheld those, who being dead were now at rest before them. There was no noise heard within the City, and the still night found all full of dead bodies : and which was most miserable of all, the Thieves at night came and took away that which covered the dead bodies naked, went laughing away, and in their bodies they proved their Swords, and upon pleasure pleasure only thrust many through, yet breathing. Yet if any desired them to kill him, or to lend him a Sword to kill himself, that so he might escape the Famine, they denied him. And every one that died, as he was dying, fixed his Eyes upon the Temple, and beheld it with grief, leaving the Seditious behind them. But they no longer able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted on the ground, first commanded that all such should be buried at the charges of the City: and at last finding no place wherein to bury them all, they threw them over the Walls into the Ditch. When Titus, going about the Walls, beheld all the Ditch filled with dead mens bodies, he lamented; and lifting up his hands to Heaven, call'd God to witness, that it was not his doing. Such was the estate of the City. But the Romans when none of the Seditious durst make any more excursions, pass'd their time in joy and mirth: for they neither suffered Famine nor sorrow, having abundance of Corn, and all other necessities out of Syria, and the Provinces adjoining, and many standing before the Walls, and shewing their abundance of Victuals to the Jews, did so much more increase their misery. Yet were not the Seditious people moved at these Calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the Nation, and minding at least to save them that were left alive, hasten'd to take the City; and so he began anew to build Mounts, though he scarcely found matter to do it withal. For all the Wood near the City was consumed in the first works; so that now the Souldiers were forced to fetch more Wood ninety furlongs off; and only against Antonia were erected in four places, four Mounts greater than the former. Cesar went about and hasten'd the Workmen; and now shewed the Thieves that were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent: and being as it were deprived of the exercise of their Wits and Bodies, they used both as though borrowed, and not their own. For neither did any affection move their minds, nor any grief there bodies: for they rent and tore the dead Bodies like Dogs, and filled the prisons with weak and languishing people.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Massacre of the Jews, both within and without the City.

Simon's cruelty against Matthias and his Sons.

At last, Simon having tormented Matthias, put him to death notwithstanding that by his means he had obtained the City. This Matthias was the Son of Boethus a Priest, whom the people for his fidelity towards them greatly esteemed: he seeing the outrages of the Zealots towards the people after John was joynd with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to help them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no evil. And when he was come into the City, he held him for his Enemy as well as the rest; notwithstanding, that by his only advice he was received into the City, as though Matthias had only done it through weakness. Wherefore calling him before the people, he accused him that he favoured the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to clear himself. And he put to death likewise his three Sons with him, for the fourth was before this time fled to Tirus. Matthias requested Simon that he might be put to death before his Sons: but Simon, in regard that by his means he had gotten the City, caus'd him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed upon the murdered bodies of his Sons, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananus his Executioner, who was the Son of Banadus. This man was the most cruel of all Simon's followers: who even when he was to kill Matthias, desired him, asking whether they could now help him, to whom he sought to fly: and he permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananus a Priest, the Son of Marbalus a Nobleman, and chief Secretary to the Council, a valiant strong man, born at Emanus, and with him fifteen of the chieftest men in the City were put to death. They took also Joseph's Father and kept him in prison, and with the publick voice of a Crier proclaimed, that no man should talk with him, nor visit him, pretending tear of Treason: and whoe-soever bewailed his estate, he was put to death without any Tryal. It happened that a certain man called Judas, the Son of Judas, who was one of Simon's Captains, and Governour of one of the Towers of the City, being moved with compassion towards these that perished without desert, and more with fear of his own life, assembled together ten of his most trusty Souldiers, and said to them: How long shall we endure these Calamities: for what hope have we of life, in being obedient to the most impious of all

An view once of the cruellest Souldiers against Simon. An view the Jews, with intent of the rebellious people. Joseph's Father taken. An confession with his companions.

A Famine consumes our City, the Romans are almost within our Walls, and Simon is cruel and faithless, even towards those that have well deserved at his hands, and we are in daily woe, and fear of his cruelty. On the contrary, the Romans keep their Faith inviolably. Wherefore offer them, let us deliver this Tower to them, and so save our selves and our City. And what punishment can Simon suffer, which he has not deserved? The ten men to whom in this manner he brake his mind, agreed herunto; and so he in the morning sent the rest of his Souldiers under his command into divers places, that they might not perceive his intent, and at the third Hour of the day, standing upon the Tower, he called the Romans and told them his design. But some of the Romans proudly contemned the offer; others fearely believed them, and the rest made no speed to come. In the mean time while Titus with certain armed men came unto the Wall, Simon had notice of the matter, and speedily got to the Tower, and slew those that were within, in the fight of the Romans, and cast down their bodies over the Wall. Joseph going about the Wall, and crying thither (for he never ceased requesting the Jews to remember with a stone, their desperate estate) was struck on the head with a stone, and so amazed with the blow, that he fell down: whereupon presently the Jews made a Salley out of the City, and had carried him away prisoner into the City, had not Titus sent men to defend him: and whilst they fought, Joseph was carried away, scarcely knowing what was done. The Seditious with loud cries rejoiced, as having slain him whose death they chiefly desired; and so they reported within the City. Hereupon the people were most sorrowfull, verily believing him to be slain, by whose intercession they had confidence of favour from the Romans.

When Joseph's Mother, who was in prison, heard this, she said to those of Jotapata that were her Keepers, that she had no hope ever to see her Son again; and with many tears lamenting to her Maidens, Is this the benefit (said she) of my having born a Son, that I shall not bury him, by whom I hoped to have been buried myself? But this false report did not long grieve her, nor comfort the Thieves: for Joseph was quickly healed of his wound, and recovered; and shewing himself, he cried out to them, That ere long they should find he would be revenged on them for his wound. And he ceased not to exhort the people to remain faithful to the Romans. But the Seditious seeing him alive were astonished, and the people conceived good hope. Many (presently without urging them) leapt over the Wall, and fled to the Romans; divers with stones going forth under pretence to fight with the Romans, yielded themselves; but they had worse Fortune there, than within the City; being now more harmed by plenty of Victuals which they found amongst the Romans, than with the Famine they suffered in the City: for being become by Famine all swollen, as though they had the Dropsie, upon the sudden filling of their empty Bodies they burst; and so all died, save only those who being wary, did by little and little accustom their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus escaped, fell into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Jews that fled to the Romans, was found amongst the Syrians, gathering Gold (out of his own dung) which he had swallowed, as before said, for that the Seditious did search all, and take that they could find from them: and there was very great store of Gold in the City, so that that was sold for twelve Atticks, which before was worth twenty five. This device being discovered in a report was spread all over the whole Camp, that the Jews that fled from the City, came full of Gold. Whereupon the Arabians and Syrians ripped up the Bellies of their poor suppliants, to see if they could find any Gold or Silver within them. And I am perswaded that there was no greater calamity befall the Jews than this: for in one night the Bellies of two thousand Jews were ripped up. Titus hearing of this cruelty, resolved to cause the Authors hereof to be compassed round with Horsemen, and slain with Darts; and he had done it, had not the multitude of offenders much exceeded that of the Jews that were so murdered. Wherefore, he called together the Leaders of these Auxiliary Troops, and the Roman Captains (for some of the Romans also had committed this fault) and said to them in anger, Is it possible that any amongst your Souldiers are so barbarous to commit such horrid Acts for uncertain gain, and are not ashamed to enrich themselves after so execrable a manner? what shall the Arabians in these Wars against Strangers do what they please, and presently cause the infamy of their vile Facts to redound to the Romans, by committing such murders, and exercising such cruelty against the Jews? (for now all that bare Arms under him, were detamed with this vile report) He declared to them, That such as hereafter were found in that guilt, should be put to death. Also he commanded his own Legions to make enquiry, who were suspected among them for this matter, and

and to bring him word thereof. But avarice is not terrified by fear of punishment: and the people have naturally a desire of gain, and no passion can be compared to the desire of wealth; though sometimes it is bridled and restrained for fear. But now God who hath given over the people to Perdition, suffered all things to be turned to their destruction: for that which Cesar did so strictly forbid, was still secretly committed upon the poor Jews that fled for mercy to the Romans. So that now whosoever fled out of the City, the Souldiers first looking about them, left any of the Romans should see them, ript up their Bellies, and so got an ungodly and impious booty; yet in very few did they find that they sought for; for the most of them that were slain, had no Gold nor Silver found within them. And this mischief caused many that had fled to the Romans to return again into the City.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sacrilege committed about the Temple, and the dead Bodies cast out of the City, and of the Famine.

John fell to Sacrilege and taketh away many Presents out of the Temple.

WHEN John could rob no more, nor get any spoil from the Citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to Sacrilege, and took away many of the gifts that had been offered to God in the Temple, and of the Sacred Vessels appointed for Divine Service, as Cups, Plates, Tables, and the Caskets of Gold that Augustus and his Wife had sent thither. Thus a Jew robbed and spoiled the Temple of those tokens of respect, wherewith the Roman Emperours and other Nations had honoured it: and he had the boldness to affirm to his Associates, that without fear they might use the Holy things of the Temple, seeing they fought for God and the Temple. Moreover, he dur'd to share amongst them the Holy Wine and Oyl, which the Priests kept for Divine Sacrifice in the inner part of the Temple. I will not cease to speak that which grief compelleth me: I verily think, that had the Romans forborn to have punished so great Criminals, either the Earth would have swallowed the City up, or some deluge have drowned it, or else the Thunder and Lightning which L consumed Sodom, would have light upon it: for the people of the City were far more impious than the Sodomites. In brief, their wickedness and impiety were the cause that the whole Nation was extinguished. What need I recount every particular misery? Manneus the Son of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the Gate that was committed to his custody, and yielding himself to him, related to Titus, that from the time that the Roman Army encamped near the City, from the fourteenth day of April until the first of July were carried out of that Gate he kept, a hundred and fifteen thousand eight hundred and fourscore dead bodies; and nevertheless, he had reckoned only those, the number of whom he was obliged to know by reason of a Publick Distribution, of which he had the charge. For others were buried by their Parents; and this was their Mournful, to carry them out of the City, and there let them lie. And certain Noblemen flying to Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the City six hundred thousand poor people which were cast out of the Gates; and that the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered the Bodies together in the greatest houses adjoining, and there shut them up. And that a bushel of Corn was sold for a Talent, which is six hundred Crowns: and that since the City was compassed with a Wall by the besiegers they could not go out to gather any more herbs, so that many were driven to that necessity, that they raked Sinks and privies to find old dung of Oxen to eat; and even the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romans hearing this, were moved N to compassion; yet the Seditious within the City, who beheld this miserable sight, were nothing moved, nor repented, but suffered them to be brought to this Calamity: for their hearts were so blinded by God, that they perceiv'd not the precipice into which they were going to fall with all this miserable City.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the Walls: and how the the Mounts were burned; and how Sabinus assaulted the Wall.

THE misery of Jerusalem every day increased, the Seditious being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: For now the Famine was not only amongst the People, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable fight to see the multitude of dead Bodies heaped together in the City, (from which came a pestilent and infectious smell) so that they hindered the Souldiers from making making excursions. For they were forced to tread upon dead bodies, as though H there had been a Battel fought within the Walls. But the hardness of their hearts was such, that so hideous a spectacle did not affect them, nor make them consider, that very shortly themselves should increase the number of those, whom they trampled on with so great inhumanity. After having in a Domestick War embro'd their hands in the Blood of those of their own Nation, they thought of nothing but employing them against the Romans in a foreign War : wherein they seemed to reproach God for delaying to punish them, since it was no longer hope of overcoming, but despair, which inspired them with this Boldness. The Romans though much troubled to get Wood to build withal, yet in one and twenty days finished their Mounts, having cut down all the Woods near the City for ninety Furlongs. It was miserable to behold that Country and place, formerly all beset with Trees and Fertile plants, now lying plain like a Desert : neither was there any stranger that before-time had seen Judea and the beautiful Suburbs of Jerusalem, who now beholding it, could abstain from tears, and not lament so woful a change. For this War extinguished utterly all signs of beauty : neither could one coming suddenly know the place, which he well knew before.

 When the Mounts were finished, both the Romans and the Jews greatly feared : the Jews, for that except they were destroyed, their City would be presently taken ; the Romans, for that if these were overthrown, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter : and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds discouraged with many incommodities. But the Romans were more grieved at the calamity of the City, than the Citizens within : for the Jews, notwithstanding these miseries, did nevertheless stoutly defend their Walls : but the courage of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Jews policy made their Mounts unprofitable ; that the strength of the Wall resisted the Engines, that the Jews boldness overcame their strength in fight : and especially, seeing that the Jews having endured such Calamity, Famine, and Misery, were still more courageous than before : so that they deemed their strength not possible to be overcome ; and that their minds were invincible, being hardened and encouraged by misery. What would they do (said they) if Fortune were favorable to them, since even now the is contrary to them, all that the does E to abate their courage serves only to confirm them in their resolutions ? Wherefore the Romans made a stronger Watch about their Mounts. But John followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the Wall were battered, endeavoured to prevent it : what they could, before the Rams were set up : and taking fire-brands in their hands, they assailed the Mount : but deceived with a vain hope, they were forced to retreat. For first of all, they seemed to disagree among themselves : so that they came from their Walls one after another in little parties, and by consequence softly and fearfully, and briefly, not after the manner of the Jews, but with less courage then they were wont. On the other side, they found the Romans better prepared : and more courageous than of late, who so defended their Mounts with their Bodies and M Weapons, that it was not possible for the Jews to come and fire them : and every one was fully determined not to shrink out of his place till he was slain. For besides that, if this work were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a shame, that their virtue should be overcome by surprize, or their valour by rashness and temerity, or their skill by a multitude, or the Romans by the Jews. Also they had Engines to cast Darts at them as they came down their Walls. And when any one of the Jews that was slain fell down, he hindered them that followed : and the danger of him that went before, terrified those that came after. They also that rashly adventured within the shot of a Dart, either were terrified with the discipline, and multitude of their Enemies, or else wounded with their Darts : and so they all retired N one accusing another of cowardliness, having achieved nothing.

 The first day of July the City was assaulted : and the Jews being now retired, the Romans let up their Rams, notwithstanding that they were assailed from Antonia with stones, fire and Sword, and whatsoever their Enemies in that extremity could find. For though the Jews had great confidence in their Walls, that they could not be battered, yet would they not permit the Romans to place their Rams against them. And the Romans being persuaded that the Jews so laboured, because they knew their Walls to be weak, and left Antonia by the breach of the Wall should be hurt : the Romans resolutely and undauntedly (notwithstanding that many Darts were cast at them from off the Walls) persisted to beat the Wall with their Rams. But when they saw O that their Rams, though incessantly playing, could make no breach, they resolved to

 A undermine the Wall, and accordingly, covering themselves with their bucklers against the Stones thrown by the Jews upon them, some with their hands pulled the Stones out of the Walls some digged under the foundation thereof, till four Stones of the Tower with much labour were broken and shaken. But the night hindered both parties from doing any more at that time, but soon after the Wall shaken with the Ram (in the place which John had undetermined to destroy the Mounts) fell down. This fell out otherwise than either party expected : For the Jews, who had cause indeed to be sorrowful for the fall of the Wall, and that they had not prevented this mischance, yet were as joyful and courageous, as if Antonia still remained firm and strong : And the joy of the Romans for this unexpected fall soon ceased, when they saw the other Wall that B John had built within. Yet they judged it easier to be taken then the former ; but ascend no man durst ascend it ; because those who first assailed it could not hope to come off alive. Titus, thinking that by hope and persuasion his Soldiers might be encouraged, and knowing that many times promises and exhortations make men forget danger, and sometime to condemn death it self, he called together the most valiant of all his Army, and spake to them as followeth :

 Fellow Soldiers, it were a shameful thing to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger, but to them that are exhortated, and to him that exhorts : for exhortations are only to be used in doubtful Affairs, where it is praiseworthy for every man to adventure himself, I confess it is a hardy attempt to ascend the Wall : yet it is also a glorious death to die in C such a fight, and especially, it becometh those that are desirous to win honour : and that they that first adventure valiantly to do it, shall not go away unrewarded. And first let this move you, which terrified others, to wit, the patient mind of the Jews, and their constancy in adversity. For it is a shame for the Roman Soldiers, who in time of peace exercise themselves in Warlike Feats, and are accustomed in time of War to get the Victory, now to be overcome by the Jews, and that at the end of the War, we having also God to help us, for all our harms proceed from the Jews desperation ; and their destruction and calamity by Gods favour and your valour is every day promoted. For what else is betokened by their sedition amongst themselves, their Famine, the fall of their Walls without our Engines to batter them, and the rage it self, but the wrath of God towards them, and his favour towards us ? D Wherefore it is unseemly for you either to give place to your inferiours, or to neglect Gods favour and furtherance. Is it not a shame that the Jews, who were they conquered, would sustaine no great reproach, as being accustomed to serve and obey others, should so valiantly contend death lest they should hereafter suffer or endure the like, and many times boldly the Romans adventure and make excursions even amongst the midst of us, not out of hope to overcome us but only to shew their valour ? and that we, who have conquered almost the Earth and Sea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious, lie idle never make valiant assault upon our Enemies, but being thus armed, expect till Fortune and Famine, deliver them into our hands ? Especially, seeing that by undergoing a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we have taken the City. For suppose that we were then to fight against them that are within the City (which I do not think) then having gotten the higher part of the City) E and being above our Enemies head we are assured of a perfect victory over them. I omit now the commendations deserved of those who have been slain in Wars, and whom immortal Glory keeps alive always in the memory of men of this life : and those that do not so think, and whose Souls and bodies descend together into the grave, I pray, that they may die of some evil death in peace. For what valiant man knoweth not, that the Soul of him that dies in War, is presently received into the most pure Airy Element, and from thence carried and placed amongst the Stars of Heaven, from whence their heroic Souls appear to their posterity as blessed Spirits to animate them to virtue by the desire of possessing the same Glory one day ? And that those who in peace die of some disease and sickness, their Souls are kept in the bowels of the Earth in darkness, notwithstanding that they be most Just and Pure : and presently they are forgotten, and their life and memory together with them extinguished ? Seeing therefore that we are all certain to die, and that to die by the Sword is a more easie death, than to die by any disease, why should we deprive our selves of this opportunity, seeing that at last we must necessarily quit our lives as a due debt to the destinies ? This I have spoken as though it were impossible to escape with life, but they that bear the minds of men, cannot mean to save themselves even in the greatest dangers. For first of all, that part of the Wall that is slain may easily be entered, and the Wall new-built is not hard to be thrown down : and many of you together enterprizing this work, may one exhort and help another, and your audacity and courage will quickly daunt the Enemies, and perhaps we may succeed G without great loss in so glorious an enterprize. For they will no more resist us if we once ascend the Wall : and let us but effect any one exploit either secretly or openly, and the Jews will

will never more endure us, though we be but few in number. I engage my self to renard him, that first enters upon the breach, that all the Army shall envy his happiness: for if he sur- vive, he shall command those that are now his equals: and who so is slain in this quarrel, I will do him great honour.

Sabinus a man of a low stature, yet both in hand and heart valiant.

The Romans invade Antonia.

A most furious fight about the entrance of the inner Temple. The Souldiers of the place was in command for the fight.

Though these words of so generous a Commander were enough to inflame the cold- est breasts, yet the greatness of the danger had made such an impression in their minds, that no body presented himself to go to the breach but one Sabinus, a Syrian, a man of excellent courage; yet of so small stature, that by his outward appearance one would have deemed him unfit to have been a Souldier: for he was of very small stature and of black colour, but he had a mind far greater than his body, and strength scarce able to be contained in so little room. Sabinus rising up, said; I offer my self to thee, O Caesar, first of all to ascend the Wall, and that with a willing mind; and I wish your good fortune may second my affection. But though it should not so fall out, but I happen to be slain before I get to the top of the breach, yet I shall have succeeded in my design: since I propose nothing to my self but the Glory and happiness of employing my life for your service. When he had so said, he took his Shield in his left hand, and holding it above his head, with his drawn Sword in his Right hand, about the sixth hour of the day, he went to the Wall: and eleven men followed him, who only imitated his virtue. But Sabinus with a divine fervour of Spirit went before them all; notwithstanding, that on every side the Jews upon the Wall cast an infinite number of Darts at him, and rowl'd down upon him huge Stones, which struck down some of the eleven that followed him. But Sabinus for all the Darts and Arrows stop't not, till such time as he had got to the top of the Wall, and put the Enemies to flight: who, terrified with his boldness and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come up after him, fled. But who may not justly blame Fortune, as taking pleasure to cross heroic actions? Sabinus, after having so gloriously executed his enterprise, was struck with a Stone, and thrown down flat upon his face most violently with a great noise: so that now the Jews seeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned again, and shot at him on every side: and he kneeling upon his knees, and covering himself with his shield strove to revenge himself upon his Enemies, and wounded many that came near him, till with wounding them, he was so weary, that he could strike no longer; and so at last he was slain: Thus the success was answerable to the difficulty of the Enterprise, although his virtue merited one more happy. Of those of his company, three having almost got to the top of the Wall, were slain with Stones; and the other eight being wounded, were carried back to the Camp. And this was done the third day of July.

CHAP. II.

How the Romans assaulted Antonia, and how they were driven back from thence by the Jews.

Two days after, twenty of the Souldiers which guarded the Mounts, two Horsemen, and an Ensigne of the fifth Legion with a Trumpeter, gathered themselves together: and about the ninth hour of the night they ascended by the ruins into Antonia without any resistance: and finding the first Watch-men asleep, they slew them and got the Wall, and commanded the Trumpeter to sound; by which sound the rest of the Watch-men being awak'd fled for fear, imagining that a great number of the Romans was gotten upon the Wall: Titus having notice of it presently gathered his Souldiers together, and accompanied with his chief Captains, and his Guards, he ascended the Wall. The Jews fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans broke in amongst them by the Mine that John had made to destroy the Mounts of the Romans. The followers both of John and Simon fought courageously to drive them back: for they thought it the utter ruin of all, if the Romans got into the Holy-place, which indeed was of importance to their victory. So they began a sharp fight in the very entrance; the Romans striving to get the inner Temple, and the Jews endeavouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now Arrows, Darts, and Spears, nothing availed either part, but they fought it out at handy blows with Swords: and in the conflict no man could discern on which side any one fought; for the Souldiers on both parts were mingled together, and through the straitsness of the place, could not keep their ranks: for there was such a noise that no man could hear one another, and many were

A were slain on both parts: and the dead bodies of those that were slain on both parts, and their Weapons falling with them, hurt many that trod upon them; and whosoever had the worst they presently cry'd out pitifully, and the Victors shouted for joy: for neither was there any place to fly, or follow, the fight was such, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that stood in the forefront of the Battel, were either of necessity to kill or be killed, for there was no void space left between the two Armies. At last the rage and despair of the Jews overcame the valour of the Romans, and they were all beaten back (having fought from the ninth hour of the night, unto the seventh hour of the day.) The Jews were encouraged to fight for fear they should be overcome. And this part of the Roman Army (for as yet the Legions were not come) thought it sufficient at that time to have gotten the Castle of Antonia.

CHAP. III.

There was one Julian, a Centurion, born in Bithynia, of good parentage, who was the most valiant dextrous and strongest man that I knew in all this War. This Julian seeing the Romans to have the worst, as he was standing by Titus in Antonia, he presently leapt down, and all alone charged the Jews who had the Victory, and made them retire into the inner Temple, and the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to have been a man. But he amongst the midst of them, flew whomsoever he light on, one of them for haste casting down another. So that this his deed seemed admirable to Cesar, and terrible to his Enemies. Yet did that destiny betall him which no man could foresee, for having his shoes full of Nails, as other Souldiers have, and running upon the pavement, he slipped and fell down, his Armour in the fall making a great noise: whereupon his Enemies, who before fled, turned again upon him. The Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cry'd out: but the Jews many at once, struck at him with Swords and Spears. He ward'd off many blows with his Shield; and many times attempting to rise, they struck him down again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly slain, because all parts of his body were very well armed, and he cover'd his head with his buckler, but no man helping him, his strength failed. Cesar was very sorrowful to see a man of so great fortitude slain in the fight of such a multitude, and that the place wherein he was, hinder'd him from helping him: and that others that might have helped him, durst not for fear. At last, when Julian had a long time striven with Death, and wounded many of them that assaulted him, he was with much ado killed, leaving behind him a renowned memory, not only amongst the Romans, but also amongst his Enemies. The Jews took his dead body, and bear back the Romans, and shut them up within Antonia. In this Battel Alexas and Gyptheus, two of John's faction, and of Simon's faction Malachias and Judas, the Son of Meron, and James the Son of Sasa Captain of the Idumeans, and two brethren of the Zealots, the Sons of Jairus, Simon, and Judas, signaliz'd themselves.

CHAP. IV.

Josephs Speech, persuading the Jews to yield the City: many of them fled unto the Romans.

After that Titus had commanded his Souldiers to ruine the foundations of Antonia, and make an easie entrance for the whole Army, he called Joseph to him (for he understood, that that day, being the seventeenth of July, the Jews were wont to celebrate a certain Feast to God, which they called Entelechismus, that is to say, the breaking of the Tables; and that they were much troubled that they could not celebrate the same) and again commanded him to tell John, as he had formerly done, That if he desired to fight, he should have liberty to come with what multitude he pleased, so that the City and the Temple might not both perish with him; that he ought to de-lift from prophaning the Holy-place, and from sinning against God : and that if he so pleased, he would grant him leave to Celebrate the Feast which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he would. Joseph to the intent that not only John might hear this offer of Titus, but also the rest of the people, got upon an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue declared to the Jews Cæsars pleasure, earnestly requesting them to spare their Country, and prevent the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accustomed Sacrifices to God. When he had thus said, the people were very sorrowful, and all held their peace, not daring to speak. But the Tyrant John, having used many railing speeches against Joseph, at last answered, that he need not fear the destruction of the Temple and City, seeing that it belouged to God.

Then Joseph with a loud voice cried out, True it is, you have kept it pure and unprofaned for God, and the Holy-things you have kept inviolate, neither have you committed any iniquity against him, from whom you expect help, but have offered solemn Sacrifice unto him. If any man should take from you your daily food, no doubt you would account him your Enemy : And can you then hope that God, whom you have deprived of daily Sacrifice, will assist you in this War ? Do you impute these offences to the Romans ? why they even now defend our Religion, and command the Sacrifice to be offered, which you have forbidden. Who doth not bewail this unexpected change, and lament our City ? Strangers and Enemies correct your impiety, and you a Jew born, and brought up in our Law, are more cruel than they. But consider, John, it is no shame to repent your wickedness in extremity : and at the last, if you be desirous to save your Country, you have a good example of Jechonias, sometime King of the Jews : Who, when the Babylonians warred against him, of his own accord went out of the City before it was taken, and willingly endured Captivity with all his Family and Kindred only, to hinder the ruine of the City, the profanation of the Holy-things, and the burning of the Temple. And for this act of his, he is of Sacred memory among the Jews, and hath thereby gained immortal praise amongst all posterity. This is a good example, O John, now danger is at hand : and I will promise you pardon from the Romans, consider that I your Country-man admonish you and promise this unto the Jews : and that in the name of Cæsar. God forbid, that ever I should be such a wretch as to forget whence I took my birth, and what love I ought to have for the Laws of my Country. Yet, you are intent to ed against me, and exclaim on me, and curse me. True it is, I deserve worse than this : because I seek to persuade contrary to the determination of Gods providence, and strive to save them whom his sentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient Prophets and their Prophecies, wherein this wretched City is foretold to be destroyed by those that being born Jews : murder our own Nation : and now not only the City, but also the Temple is full of your dead bodies ? Certainly, it is God that joys with the Romans, to expiate all these Abominations with fire.

Jechonias is slain by the Babylonians, and his name is in the City, by the ordinance of fate and Gods will, to be put to death.

Titus speaks, and is interrupted with fight.
Some of the Nobility among the Jews escape to the Romans.
Cæsar's humanity towards the Jews.
Those Jews that were fled besought the besieged with tears and fight to submit themselves.
Joseph thus discoursing with Tears and Lamentations, could speak no more for fighting : And the Romans compassionating his sorrow and affliction, were astonished. But John and his confederates were so much the more incited against the Romans, and sought to take Joseph ; yet his speech mov'd many of the Nobles : and divers fearing the Seditious Guards remained still where they were, making full account both of their own destruction, and the subversion of the City. Yet some there were, who finding opportunity, fled to the Romans : amongst whom were two Priests, Joseph and Jesus : and three Sons of Ismael the Priest, who was beheaded at Cyrena, and the fourth Son of Matthias the Priest, who escaped to the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three other Sons, as is before related : many other Nobles also came away with the Priests, whom the Emperor received very courteously, and sent them to Gophna : knowing that it was a grief to them to converse amongst people of different manners from them ; and he willed them to remain there, and promised every one of them great possessions after the War was ended. So they joyfully departed to the place appointed : but the Seditious, because they were not seen, reported to the people, that they who had fled to the Romans were slain, designing hereby to terrify the rest from flying to them : and thus their device a while prevailed, as their former did : and they that fain would, durst not now fly for fear. But afterward, when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the Walls with Joseph, and shew themselves to the people ; then many more of the Jews fled to the Romans.

And after they had gathered themselves together, standing all before the Romans, they besought the Seditious with tears to receive the Romans into the City, and save their Country : or if this pleased them not, at least to depart out of the Temple, and

 A To deliver it up to them. For the Romans durst not, except necessity urged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice against the Romans increasing, they fell to railing against those that had fled to them, and planned all their Engines to cast Stones, Darts, and Arrows upon their Holy-Porches. So that all the void space about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a Burying-place, and the Temple itself resembled a Citadel, and they now with their Weapons, having their hands imbrowed with the blood of their Country-men, presumed to enter into the Sanctuary where none ought to come : and they became so injurious against their own Laws, that what indignation the Jews ought to have conceived against the Romans, if they had so profaned the Holy-places, the same they caused the Romans to have against them for doing the like. For there was not one amongst the Roman Soldiers, that did not with reverence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wish that the Thieves would repent themselves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pitying the Seditious, once again spoke to John, and his adherents, saying : O ye impious people, have not your Ancestors inviolated the Temple about with a Rallester, and erected Pillars wherein are engraven Greek and Roman Letters, forbidding all men to enter into those limits ? and Did not we reverence you to kill any man that should pass them, though he were a Roman ? What rage then is it which carries you wicked wretches, to pollute the Temple with the blood not only of strangers, but of your Country-men ? I call my Country Gods to witness, and him who sometime dwelt in this Place : ( I say sometime, for now I am persuaded there is none ) I call also my Army to witness, and protest to the Jews that are with me, and depart this Holy-place, that then no Roman shall come into the Sanctuary, nor commit any thing of contumely of them, but I will preserve this famous Temple for you against your will.

CHAP. V.

Another assault given by the Romans to the Jews who defended the Temple.

Titus chose thirty of the Jew's, Scribes
 D Titus having spoken thus, and caused Joseph to tell them in Hebrew what he said to them, the Seditious thinking that the same proceeded not of good will, but of fear, began to be more proud thereupon. Then Titus, seeing they neither pitied themselves, nor the Temple, determined again to use force, though very loth so to do ; yet could he not bring all his Army against them, the Roman was so little. Wherefore out of every Company he made choice of thirty of the strongest among them, and over every thousand he appointed a Tribune, and made Cerealis their Captain or General, commanding him at the ninth hour of the night to assault the Guard of the Enemy. Also he himself would have gone with them ; but his friends, and the Captains about him, considering the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him : but represented to him, that he might do more good by staying in Antonia, and encouraging the Soldiers that fought, then if he should go and endanger himself : for every man being in the view of the Prince, would fight more courageously. Titus was herewith persuaded, and told the Soldiers that the only cause he went not with them was this, that he stayed behind to view and judge of every ones valour, to the intent that none that behaved himself valiantly might go away unrewarded, nor any coward escape unpunished ; but that he himself might be a beholder of every mans virtue. Having thus spoken he commanded the assault to be given.

Then he went up a Watch-Tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. But they whom Titus sent did not find the Guards asleep, as they hoped ; but with a great shout they received the Romans that came against them : and at this noise they awaked their fellows, who came in whole Companies to assist them, and made a Salley upon their Enemies. So the Romans sustained the violence of their first Companies : but the second that came, fell upon their own fellows, and used them like Enemies : for no man could know one anothers voice for the noise, neither could one see another by reason it was night : and moreover, some were blinded with fury, some with anger, some with fear : so that every one struck him that met him, without any respect. The Romans received small damage thereby, because that they were defended with their Shields, and remembered one anothers Watch-word. But the Jews fell on every side, shewing themselves rash as well in the charge as in their rallying ; so that many times one of them took the other to be his Enemy. And falling upon those that rallied, as though they had been Romans, assaulting them in the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellows than by their Enemies, till, day breaking, every one knew his companion; and then falling into ranks they betook themselves to their Darts and Arrows. Neither part gave back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romans together and apart, did in the view of the Prince shew their courage, every man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaved himself valiantly. The Jews fought stoutly, both for that they feared their own Imminent danger, if they were overcome, and the destruction of the Temple: and John standing by, encouraged them to fight, some with blows, and others with threatenings. They fought almost all with handy blows; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either far to fly, or any space to follow those that fled. I The Romans in Antonia cried to their fellows that fought the Battel, Now for the Victory: encouraging them to stand to it, when they began to give back; so that Antonia was as a Theatre for this Battel: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done. At last, in the fifth hour of the day the fight ceased, having continued from the ninth hour of the night, neither party forsaking the place where first they began Battel, nor any part having the Victory. Many Romans there fought courageously, and amongst the Jews these that follow: Fadus the Son of Merton: Simon the Son of Josias; and Jacob and Simon, Idumeans: this, the Son of Cabla, but Jacob the Son of Sofa: these were of Simons company: And of Johns followers, Gibbeus and Alexas; and of the Zealots, Simon the Son of Jairus. But on the seventh day, the Romans pulling down the Foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the Army; and the Legions coming to the Wall, presently began to raise Mounts; one against the corner of the inner Temple, which was situate between the North and East: another against the Gallery on the North side, betwixt the two Porches: and other two, one against the Porch of the West side of the outward Temple; and another against the North Porch. So with much toyl and labour they finish this work, fetching wood to build it with one 100 Furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by Ambushes, not being wary by reason of their confidence: and the Jews despairing of themselves every hour, more and more were encouraged. For many of the Horsemen going to get either wood or hay, while they were about it, took the Brides from off their Horses, and permitted I them to feed till they had ended their business; and presently the Jews issuing out in troops upon them took them away.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens Horses were slain rather by their negligence, than their Enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the severe punishment of one, to make others look better to their Horses. And so he put to death one of the Souldiers that had lost his Horse: by whose punishment the rest of the Souldiers being terrified, kept their Horses better. For after that, when they went about any business, they never left their Horses in the pastures, but kept always with them. Thus the Romans assaulted the Temple, and built their Mounts. The day following, certain of the Seditious, who now could get no more booties in the City, and also began to be pinch'd with hunger, assaulted the Romans that were placed towards Mount Olivet, about the eleventh hour of the day: for they hoped to take them unawares, as being at dinner. But the Romans perceiving their intent, came out of their places, and resisted them who attempted violently to break in upon them over the Wall: so that there was a hot fight; and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans having both courage & skill in warlike affairs. The Jews were led with desperate fury; and necessity and flame forced the Romans to fight. For the Romans accounted it a shame not to overcome the Jews; and the Jews thought it the only way to save their own lives, to break down the Wall by force. One of the Horsemen called Pedanius did a thing almost incredible, the Jews being put to flight, and driven into the Valley. He pursued them with his Horse as fast as he could gallop, and overtook a young man one of his Enemies, being heavy of body, and armed all over; and taking him by the ankle, he carried him violently away (thereby shewing the strength of his arm & his skilful Horsemanship) and so brought the Captive to Cesar, as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the Captive for having attempted to assault the Wall, he hastened to assault the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch the Mounts. In the mean time the Jews being ill handled in the former encounters, which still increasing to the overthrow of the Temple, they did, as the custom is in a putrified body, prevent the Plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the Porch that reached from the North to the East, joynted to Antonia: which they O firing, separated twenty Cubits from it, having now with their own hands begun to cast fire into the Holy-place.

Two

A Two days after, which was the 24 day of the aforesaid Month, the Romans set the Porch on fire, and the fire having gone fourteen Cubits, the Jews pull'd down the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed works, they pull'd down all adjoining to Antonia; when it was easie for them, and that they ought to have hindered the fire. The Porch being on fire, they permitted so much to be burned, as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the Temple never ceased, but many Excurfions were made each against the other.

About this time a certain Jew of low stature, and in appearance a contemptible person, every way an abject, both by reason of his base Parentage, and otherwise, named Jonathan, going to the Monument of John the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romans to come and fight a single combat with him. The Romans that beheld him, disdained him: Yet some amongst them (as it is commonly seen) were afraid of him: others wisely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to dye: because they that are desperate, neither fight advisedly, nor have the fear of God before their Eyes: and consequently, that it was not a sign of Valour, but of overmuch hardness, to fight with such a one, whom though they overcame, yet they could win no credit, but only hazard themselves to be vanquish'd. So a long time none of the Romans came against him; and he upbraided them of cowardlines. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsemen, named Pudens, disdaining his infoleny, and perhaps also for that he was of little stature, came against him: but in fighting with him Fortune was unfavourable to him, for hapening to fall down, Jonathan slew him I after which setting his foot upon the dead body, with his left hand he flourished his shield, and with his right his bloody sword; and striking his weapons one against another, he insulted over the dead body, and upbraided the Romans, till at length one Prifcus a Centurion, as he was thus vaunting, shot him thorow with an Arrow, and so he fell down dead upon the body of his Enemy; at which deed, both the Romans and the Jews raised a confused noise. So Jonathan was justly punish'd for having made too much Triumph for an advantage which he ow'd to Fortune, and not to his own Valour.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romans by a Stratagem of the Jews were confum'd with Fire: And of one Astorius.

THE Seditious that kept the Temple, were now every day openly in fight engaged against the Romans that kept the Mounts, and on the twenty seventh day of the Month of July they devised this Stratagem: they filled the void part of the East Porch of the Temple with dry Wood, Brimstone and Bitumen; and when they were assaulted, they fled out of it as not able longer to resist. Whereupon many of the Romans rashly pursued the Jews that fled, and with Ladders got up to the Galleries. But the wiser sort considering that the Jews had no just occasion to fly, kept their place. The Porch being now full of Romans, that were got up into it, the Jews gave fire to the Wood and Brimstone, and upon a sudden all the Porch was encompassed with the flame: so that the Romans who were out of danger were amazed at it, and those that were amid the flames became desperate: and being invironed with the flames, some fought to run back into the Town, and others to the Enemies, others killed themselves, so preventing the fury of the fire: and presently the flame overtook those that sought to flee. Cesar Cesar hath though offended at the Souldiers for having ascended into the Porch unbidden, yet seeing them die so woefully in the flames he compassionated them. And although the fire could not be quenched, yet the poor Souldiers dying amongst the flames were somewhat contented, that they perceived him to be extremely sorrowful for them, for whom they had hazarded their lives. For they beheld him crying to their fellows to help to extinguish the fire, and he himself laboured what he could to do it, so that every one esteemed his sorrow and lamentation for them as much as a sumptuous funeral: but some escaped the fire and got into the largest part of the Porch: yet invironed round about with Jews, and having long resisted, though with many wounds, in the end they were all slain.

A young man named Longus signalized himself amidst all this misery: and notwithstanding that every one that there perished, deserved particularly to be remembered, yet he shewed himself the most valiant of them all. The Jews were desirous to kill this man man, for that he was strong, and willed him to come down to them, swearing unto him to spare him. But his Brother Cornelius, who stood on the other side, intreated him not to blemish his own honour and that of the Romans, whom he obeyed: and so lifting up his Sword on high, that either part might see, he slew himself. Yet one Arius from amidst the fire escaped by this device; calling unto him one Lucius his fellow-Souldier and Chamber-fellow; I will (said he) make thee heir of all my Inheritance, if thou wilt catch me in thy arms. Lucius willingly endeavouring to do it, Arius cast himself down upon him, and so escaped with his life, but Lucius, upon whom he fell, was bruised against the pavement, and so died. This Calamity a while greatly afflicted the Romans; yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Jews Subtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they sustained great damage. So the Porch was burnt unto the Tower which John built during his Wars against Simon; and the Jews, after the Romans that were ascended into it were confounded, pulled down the rest. The next day the Romans fired the North Porch, as far as the aforesaid East-Porch, which contained the corners of the Wall built over the Valley Cedron, so that it was terrible to behold the Valley from thence, by reason of the depth.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Famine amongst the Jews.

The intestine Wars of the Jews that were well furnished with hunger.

The Jews eat their own girdles, shoes, the leather of their Targents, and all they.

Such were the affairs about the Temple: but an innumerable multitude perished within the City through Famine, for in every place where any shew or sign of food was, presently arose a Battel; and the dearest friends of all fought one with another to take the food from each other; neither did they believe those that were now a dying for Famine, when they said, they had nothing left to eat; but the Thieves searched those whom they saw yielding up the ghost, thinking that they had hid about them some food: but when they were deceived of their hopes, they became like mad-dogs; and the least thing made them fall against the doors like drunken men, searching the self-same houses twice or thrice together in desperation, and for very hunger they eat whatsoever they light upon, gathering such things to eat, as the most filthy living Creatures in the world would have loathed. In brief, they eat their Girdles, Shoes, and the skins that covered their shields, so that a little old Hay was sold for four Attiques. But what need is it to shew the sharpness of this Famine by things that want life? I will recount an act never heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous People, horrible to be rehearsed, and incredible, so that I would willingly omit this Calamity, lest posterity should think I lie, had not I many witnesses hereof, and perhaps should incur reprehension, not fully recounting all accidents of those that are dead.

CHAP. VIII.

Of a Woman that for Famine killed her Son, and dressed him for meat.

The Mothers fire in before their own Son.

A Certain Woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Jordan, the Daughter of Elezar, of the Town of Batbecor, which signifieth the house of Hyssop, descended of noble and rich parentage, flying with others to Jerusalem, was there with them besieged. Her richest goods the Tyrants had taken from her, which she had brought from beyond the River into the City: and whatsoever being hid, escaped their hands, the Thieves daily came into her house and took it away: whereat the Woman greatly moved, cursed them, and with hard speeches animated them the more against her; yet no man either for anger or compassion would kill her, but suffered her to live to get them meat: but now could she get no more, and Kimme tormented her with rage and anger more than danger. Wherefore by rage and necessity she was compelled to do that which Nature abhorred, and taking her Son to whom she then gave suck: O miserable Child (said she) in War, Famine and Faction; for which of these shall I keep thee? If thou come among the Romans, thou shalt be made a slave; yet Famine will prevent Bondage, or else our own Tyrants worse than them both. Be therefore meat for me, a terror unto the Seditious, a Tragic Story

A Story to be spoken of by Posterity, and such as is only yet unheard of among the Calamities of the Jews. Having thus spoken, she slew her Son, and sod the one half of him, and eat it; the rest she reserved covered. In a little time after came the Seditious, who smelling the faint of that execrable meat, threatened presently to kill her, except she forthwith brought some of that unto them which she had prepared. She answered, That she had reserved a good portion thereof for them; and presently uncovered that part of her Son which she had left uneaten; at which sight they trembled, and horror fell upon them. But the Woman said, This is truly my Son, and my doing; eat you of it, for I my self have eaten thereof. Be not more effeminate than a Woman, nor more merciful than a Mother. If Religion make you refuse this my Sacrifice, I have already eaten of it, and will eat the rest. The Seditious departed heretofore greatly trembling; and how great soever their ravenousness was, they left the rest of this detestable food to the wretched Mother. Presently the report of this heinous Crime was bruited all about the City, and every man, having before his Eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himself had done it. And now all that were vexed with this Famine, wished their own deaths; and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this Famine. This unnatural fact was soon after recounted to the Romans; some of them would not believe it, others pitied them within the City; and many heretofore increased their hatred towards the Nation.

Titus, to justify himself before Almighty God, protested, That he was not the cause of this misery; having offered the Jews Peace, General Pardon and Oblivion for all their Offences past; but they rather chose War than Peace, Sedition than Quietness, Famine than Wealth and Plenty, having with their own hands begun to set on fire the Temple, which he had preserved for them, that therefore such like meat was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable Crime of eating their own Children in the Ruines of their Country, and that he would not in any part of the World suffer the Sun to shine upon such a City, wherein Mothers eat their own Children; and where the Fathers were no less culpable than the Mothers, because, for all their miseries, they would not yet cease from Arms. Having thus spoken, he considered the Desperation of the Enemies, and that they would not recall themselves, who had already endured all such Calamities, which might, if it had been possible, have altered their Opinions, rather than to have endured the same.

CHAP. IX.

How the Wall was taken, and the Temple burnt.

THE Eighth day of August, two of the Roman Legions having finished their Mounts, began to place their Rams against the East-Galleries without the Temple, having E six days together without intermission already beaten the Wall with their strongest Rams, and nothing prevailed, the Stones being so strong, that the Rams could not move them. Others of the Romans laboured to dig up the Foundations of the Porch, that was on the North side; and after much toil, they only could pull away the outward Stones; but the inner Stones still supported the Porch. At last the Romans seeing they could not prevail by their Javelins and other Instruments, set up Ladders to ascend into the Galleries. The Jews did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting up: but when they were within the Galleries, then they came and fought with them, and cast some of them down headlong, forcing them to retire; others they slew that stood in rest; and others that were upon the Ladders going down, before they could defend themselves F with their Shields, were with Swords stricken down; they also thrust down some Ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great Massacre of the Romans, who fought most to recover their Ensigns, which the Jews had taken from them, esteeming the loss thereof a great shame to them. At last the Jews kept their Ensigns, and slew those that bore them; and the rest terrified with their deaths, went down again; although not one of the Romans died, who before he was slain did not some valiant act. Besides those Seditious persons, who in the former Battels had shewed themselves valiant, Elezazar, Son to the Brother of Simon, one of the two Tyrants, got great honour. Then Titus perceiving that he spared the Temple of the Jews to his loss, and with the death of his Souldiers, commanded fire to be put to the Porches of the Temple, whereupon Ananus G of Emmanuel the most cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the son of Magadatus guard revolted to Titus; who, for their Cruelties committed, determined to put them to death; from him, though though they hoped for pardon because they had now forsaken the Jews when they had gotten the better. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for necessity, and that they did not deserve to live, for forsaking their Country now set on fire by their Crimes: Yet his promise bridled his wrath, and he dismissed them; but they were not so much effeminated as the rest. The Roman Souldiers had already put fire to the Temple Gates: and, the Silver plate wherewith they were covered being melted, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreasing took hold presently of the next Porch. The Jews seeing themselves invironed with flames, were now altogether discouraged, and their hearts failed them; and being amazed, no man sought to extinguish the flame; and so they stood still beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was set on fire, nor endeavouring to save the rest: and so that day and all the next night the fire encreased: I for the Porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The next day Titus caused part of his Army to quench the fire: and calling to him his Captains, and fix that were the chiefest among them, to wit Tiberius Alexander, his Lieutenant General, Sextus Serealis Commander of the fifth Legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, Aternus Fronto Commander of the two Legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Julianus Governour of Judea, besides some other Colonels and Captains; he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the Temple. Some counselled to use the right of War, for that the Jews would never live peaceably whilst their Temple was standing; for all their Nation whosoever living, would assemble themselves thither at certain times. Others perswaded Titus, to save it, if so be the Jews abandon'd it, and ceased to defend it; but if they fought for it, then to burn it: for it was to be considered as a Castle, not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it would not be imputed to the Romans or to their General, but to the Jews who constrained them to do it; and he should not offend, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed, that although the Jews made use of their Temple as of a Fortref, yet it should not be destroyed: for he would not so be reveng'd upon inanimate things, neither would he ever fire so goodly a building; for it would redound to the dishonour of the Romans; as on the contrary it would be a credit unto them, if it were left remaining. Whereupon Alexander Fronto, and Serealis perceiving Cesar's mind became of his opinion; and so he dismissed the Council; and commanded the Souldiers and Captains to rest, that they might be the more able to fight when need required: and presently he appointed certain chosen men to make the Ways even and easie for the Army to pass by the Ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Jews being fearful and weary, made no resistance. The day following taking heart and assembling together, they assaulted the Guard that stood without the Temple, the second hour of the day. The Romans valiantly received their first assault, defending themselves with their shields as though they had had a wall before them; yet they could not long have born the shock, for that they were fewer in number than their Enemies, and not so desperate, had not Cesar (beholding the fight from Antonia) came with certain chosen Horsemen, before they retired to succour them. Whose force the Jews not sustaining, but the first of them being slain, the rest gave back, and the Romans likewise retreating, the Jews returned and charged them again; and when the Romans returned again, presently they fled, till about the fifth hour of the day the Jews were forced to betake themselves to the Temple, and there they shut themselves up. Then Titus returned to Antonia, purposing the next day to assault them with all his Army, and win the Temple. But the providence of God had already determined, that it should be consumed with fire. And now the fatal day was come after many years, which was the tenth of August, upon which day also the King of Babylon once before burnt it; yet it was now first set on fire by our own Country-men, who were indeed the cause thereof. For the Seditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then again they assaulted the Romans, and so fought with the Guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguish the flame; who putting the Jews to flight, pursued them to the Temple.

CHAP. X.

How the Temple was burnt against the Will of Titus.

Then a certain Souldier, who expected no Command, nor feared to do so execrable a Fact, moved with some divine fury, and lifted up by one of his fellows, took in his hand a flaming Firebrand, and cast it into the golden window, which entred into the buildings on the North part of the Temple, and the flame presently arose; and caused a great cry amongst the Jews, expressing their calamity; and every one hastied to extinguish the fire; neither accounting of their lives nor forces, if they lost that for which they had fought so long. News hereof was presently brought by one who came from the fight to Titus, who then was resting in his Tent, and he presently arose, and ran to the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captains after him; wherupon the Souldiers followed in great confusion, and there arose a great cry and tumult in the Army being disordered. Cesar both with his voice and hand made a sign to the Souldiers that were fighting, to quench the fire. But they did not hear him, there was so great a noise; neither did they perceive the sign he made unto them with his hand, because some were distracted with fear, and others with anger: and the Souldiers issued in, nor restrained either by commands or threatnings, but every one went whither his fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many pressed one another to death; and many being amongst the fiery ruines of the Galleries perished as miserably as those that were overcome. When they came to the Temple every one feigned not to hear Cesar's command, and so exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The seditious now had no hope to withstand them, but either fled or were slain: and many unarmed and unable people, whosoever they were found, were slain: so that about the Altar were an innumerable company of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the Temple stairs; and their Bodies were rolled down. Cesar, seeing he could not restrain the fury of the Souldiers, and that the fire encreased, entered into the Sanctuary, with his chief Officers, and beheld all the holy things there, and found its magnificence and riches far surpassing all report which strangers had given of it, and equal to that of the Jews themselves. The flame not having yet pierced into the inner part of the Temple, nor consumed the Houses and Rooms about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preserved; wherefore himself went, and intreated the Souldiers to extinguish the fire, and commanded Liberalis, the Centurion of his Guard, to bear those with a Truncheon that would not be obedient, and to drive them away. But their fury, and the hatred they bare against the Jews, rendered them deaf to Cesar's commands, and regardless of punishment, many were carried on with the hope of some booty, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, because they saw the Gates covered with plates of Gold. Moreover, a certain Souldier, when Cesar sought to quench the flame, fired the Posts about the doors: and presently the flame appearing within, Cesar and the Captains departed out; and so every one stood looking upon it, and no man sought to extinguish it. Thus the Temple was burnt against Titus's will. And although every man will judge it a lamentable case, in such a building surpassing all that ever was seen or heard of, both for greatness, workmanship, costliness and plenty of all things; yet in this we may comfort our selves, that Providence had so determined. For neither living Creatures, nor Places, nor Buildings, can avoid their Destiny. One may also admire the exact and just revulsion of time, for it was now destroyed in the same month, and on the same day, that the Babylonians first destroyed it. And from that time that Solomon began the first Temple, unto the destruction of the second Temple, which happened the second year of Tespatians Reign, were a thousand and hundred and thirty years, seven months, and fifteen dayes; and from the building of the latter Temple, which Haggai caused to be built in the second year of the Reign of Cyrus, unto the destruction thereof, were six hundred thirty nine years and five and forty dayes.

How many years there were between the first building of the Temple under King Solomon and the building of the latter Temple, which Haggai caused to be built in the second year of the Reign of Cyrus, unto the destruction thereof, were six hundred thirty nine years and five and forty dayes.

CHAP. XI.

A horrible slaughter continued in the Temple, of the Priests, the Treasure-house, and the Porch.

WHEN the Temple was thus consumed with fire, whatsoever the Souldiers found there, they carried away, and put all to the Sword that were in it, which were an infinite number: they shewed pity neither to old age, nor infants: but old, young, Priests and common People, all were slain without respect, and all sorts of persons tasted the calamity of War, whether they resisted, or entreated for mercy. And now the flame increasing grieved even those that were yielding up the Ghost: and by reason of the height of the Hill, and the Building together, one would have thought the whole City had been on fire. Then a most lamentable cry was raised between the Roman Legions, and the Seditious now invironed with fire and sword, and the people that were taken in the higher part of the City, and had fled to the Romans, lamenting their calamity. They of the City answered the cries and tears of those in the Hill, and many, whose Eyes death by Famine had almost closed, took strength a while to bewail the Temple, which they now beheld on fire. The Country beyond Jordan, and the Mountains about did echo to their Lamentations: and yet the Calamities surpassed all expression. For one would have judged the Hill whereon the Temple was situate, to have been burnt up by the roots, it was so all over fire: Yet the great quantity of Blood-shed seem'd to contend with the fire. Many that were slain were covered with those that slew them, and all the ground was over-spread with dead bodies: so that the Souldiers ran upon the dead bodies to pursue those that fled. At last the Thieves having driven the Romans without the Temple, ran into the City; and the rest of the People that were left fled into the outward Porch. And many of the Priests used Spits of the Temple in stead of Darts, and threw their Seats made of Lead, instead of Stones, against the Romans; at last nothing at all prevailing, and the fire falling upon them, they got to the Wall, which was eight Cubits broad, and there stayed a while. Yet two of the principal, when they might either have fled to the Romans, and have been saved, or else have endured like Fortune with the rest, cast themselves into the fire, and so were burnt with the Temple: One of them was named Meierus the Son of Belga, the other Jeseph the Son of Dalens.

The Romans thought it in vain to spare the Buildings about the Temple, seeing the Temple was already consumed; and so they set fire on them all, the Porches, Galleries, and Gates; two only excepted, one on the East-side, and the other on the South-side; both which afterwards they razed to the ground. They also put fire to the Treasury, which was full of an incredible quantity of Riches, as well in money as in rich clothing; and other things of great price; and indeed all the Jews treasures for the richest of the City had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the Porch that was left standing, many Men, Women, and Children, to the number of six thousand: And before Cesar and the Captains decreed any thing what should be done with them, the furious Souldiers fired the Porch wherein they were, and so they all perished in the flames, save a few, who leaping down to avoid the fire, were slain in the fall: so that not one escaped of all that multitude. A certain false Prophet was cause of their deaths, who the same day preached in the City, and commanded them to go into the Temple, where he assured them they should that day receive the effects of Succour from God; for many false Prophets were then suborned by the Tyrants, to persuade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romans, and to cause the Souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their City. Men easily believe, and are credulous in N. adventure; so that if any deceitful person promise deliverance out of Calamity, he that suffereth misery becomes full of hope thereupon.

CHAP. XII.

Of the strange Signs and Tokens that appeared before the Destruction of Jerusalem.

THESE miserable People were thus easily persuaded by Impostors who abused the Name of God; yet would they not believe, nor give any ear or regard unto certain Tokens and Signs of the ruine of their City: but as it were blinded, neither having Eyes nor Souls, they counterfeited themselves not to see what God foretold them. One while there was a Comet in form of a fiery Sword, which for a year together hung over the City. Another time before the first Revolt and War, the People being gathered together to the feast of Unleavened-Bread (which was the eighth day of April) at the ninth hour of the night, there was so much Light about the Altar and Temple, as though it had been bright day; and it remained half an hour: This the ignorant People interpreted as a good Sign; but they that were skilful in holy Scripture, presently judged what would ensue before it came to pass. At the same Festival, a Cow let to be sacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a Lamb in the midst of the Temple: and the inner Gate of the Temple, on the East-side, being of massive brass, and which at night had always at least twenty men to shut it, and was bound with Locks of Iron, and barred with bars, the ends whereof went into Mortice holes in the stones on either side the door, (the foresaid stones being on each side one whole Stone) was seen at the first hour of the night to open of its own accord: which being presently related to the Magistrate by the Keepers of the Temple, he himself came thither and could scarcely shut it. This also to the ignorant seemed a good sign, as if God opened to them the Gate of his blessings; but the wiser sort judged, that the defence of the Temple would fail of its own accord, and that the opening of the Gate foretold, that it should be given to the Enemies, and that this sign signified Desolation. A little while after the Feast days, on the one and twentieth day of May, there was seen a Vision beyond all belief; and perhaps that which I am to recount might seem a Fable, if some were not now alive that beheld it, and if that Calamity worthy to be so foretold had not ensued. Before the Sun-rise were seen in the Air all over the Country, Chariots full of armed men in battel array passing along in the Clouds, and begirting the City. And upon the Feast day, called Pentecost, at night the Priests going into the Inner Temple to offer their wonted Sacrifice, the place to move and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which said, Let us depart hence. And that which was most wonderful of all, one Jesus the Son of Ananus, an ordinary Priest, four years before the War begun, when the City flourished in Peace and Riches, coming to the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, in the Temple at Jerusalem, suddenly began to cry out thus; A Voice from the East; a Voice from the West; a Voice from the four Winds; a Voice against Jerusalem and the Temple; a Voice against Men and Women newly married; a Voice against all this People: And thus crying night and day, he went about all the streets of the City. Some of the best quality not able to suffer words of so ill presage, caused him to be taken and severely scourged; which he endured without speaking the least word to defend himself, or to complain of so hard treatment; but he continued repeating the same words. The Magistrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man spake thus through some divine motion, led him to Albinus General of the Romans, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he never entreated nor wept, but as well as he could, with a mournful voice he cried, Wo, wo to Jerusalem. Albinus asked him what he was, and whence, and wherefore he said so; but he made him no answer. Yet he ceased not to bewail the misery of Jerusalem, till Albinus thinking him to be out of his wits, suffered him to depart. After which till the time of War, this man was never seen to speak to any one: but still without ceasing he cried, Wo, wo to Jerusalem. Neither did he ever Curse any one, though every day some one or other did beat him; nor did he ever thank any one that offered him meat. All that he spake to any man was this heavy Prophecy. He went crying as is said, chiefly upon holy-days; doing so continually for the space of seven years and five months; and his voice never waxed hoarse nor weary, till in the time of the Siege, beholding what he foretold them, he ceased; and then once again upon the Walls, going about the City, with a loud voice he cried, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and People: and lastly he said, Wo also to my self. Which words were no sooner uttered, but a Stone shot out of an Engine, smote him, and so he yielded up the Ghost, lamenting them all.

The Jews interpreting the signs to their own great liking, as their Country ruins, and the cause of their own calamity.

If any one diligently consider all these things, he will find that God hath a care of Mankind, and doth forthew betime, what is most expedient for them, and that they through their own madnets, voluntarily perish in their wickednets. For the Jews, when the Cattle Antonia was taken, made the Temple four-square: notwithstanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple should be taken, when the Temple was made four-square. But that which chiefly incited them to this War, was a doubtful Prophecy likewise found in the holy Scriptures: That at the same time one in their Dominions should be Monarch of the whole World; And many wife men were deceived in their Interpretation, making account that he should be one of their own Nation; but indeed thereby was foretold Vespasian's Empire. But men cannot prevent Destiny, though they foresee it. Thus the Jews interpreted some of the Signs as they pleased, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their Country, and their own woful overthrow, their error was discovered to them.

The Seditious Simon Titus to a Parley.

The Romans by many incited the Jews against them.

After the Seditious were fled into the City, whilst all the Temple and places thereabouts were still on fire, the Romans placing their Engines over against the East-gate of the Temple, and there offering sacrifice to God, with great shouts they declared Titus Emperour. The Romans got much Spoil and Booty, so that they sold Gold in Syria for half the value. And among those Priests that kept on the Wall, a Child being thirsty, desired drink of the Roman Watchmen, saying, that he was thirsty. They pitying both his years and his need, gave him their hands that he should have no harm, and then he came down and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ran up again to his fellows, and none of the watchmen were able to overtake him; and they could only upbraid him with falsehood. But he answered, That he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not give him their hands to secure him to remain with them, but only to come down and take water, which he had done. The Roman watchmen greatly admired the subtilty of one that was but a Child. The fifth day, the Priests being almost famished came down, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom they besought to grant them their lives. But he answered them, That the time of pardon was past, seeing that was destroyed, for the sake of which he might have pardoned them, and that it was meet that the Priests should perish with the Temple: and so he commanded them to be put to death. Then the Tyrants with their followers being on every side beset by the Romans, and having no way to flee, they being thus beleagured round, requested to speak with Titus; who out of his natural gentleness, yielded to their request, his friends also perswading him thereto, that at least he might save the City (judging indeed that now the Seditious had already their minds) and so he went to the West part of the Inner Temple: for there was a Gate built above a Gallery, and a Bridge that joyned the Temple and City together, which was then between Titus and the Tyrants. Many Souldiers on both parts flocked about their Generals; the Jews about Simon and Johm, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, desirous to hear what he would say unto them: and Titus having commanded his Souldiers to be quiet, and to forbear shooting Arrows, spake to them first (in token of his Victory) by an Interpreter to this effect: Areye not wearied (said he) with the Calamities suffered by your Country? You who without considering our power, and your own weakness, have with rash fury destroyed your People, City and Temple: Your selves also have justly deserved to perish, who since Pompey first Conquered you, have never ceased to be Seditious, and at last have openly declared War against the Romans. Did you trust to your multitude? You have seen that a small parcel of the Roman Army hath sufficiently resisted you. Or did you expect foreign aid? What Nation is not under our Dominion? And who would rather make choice of the Jews than of the Romans? Did you trust in your strength of Body? Why you know the Germans serve us. Or in the strength of your Walls? What Wall, or what greater hindrance than the Ocean, wherewith the Britains invironed, have yielded to the Roman Forces? Or to your Cowage, and politick Counsell of your Captains? You have already heard that the Carthaginians have been by us surprised. It was therefore the Romans humanity that incited you against themselves, who first of all permitted you to possess your Country, and gave you Kings of your own Nation: and after all this, we kept your Laws inviolate, and suffered you to live

A as your selves desired, not only in your own Country, but also amongst other Nations; and which is the greatest of all our benefits bestowed upon you, we permitted you to gather Contributions and Gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and Sacrifices to God; of all which, we after the manner of the Law, neither forbade any to be brought unto you, nor hindered any that would offer to your Temple, but suffered you our Enemies to be made richer than our selves; so that you have used our own money against us. Having received so many benefits at our hands, you have now discharged your selves upon us, and like spiteful Serpents, spit your poison upon them that made much of you. Let us omit that by Nero's negligence you became forgetful of your duty, and like some Member in the Body broken or strunk, you being still tumultuous, at last were taken in a greater offence, and were encouraged with immoderate desires to hope for unlawful liberty. My Father came into your Country, not to punish you for your Revolt against Celsius, but by good counsel and gentleness to reduce you to good order. And whereas if he had come to destroy your Nation, he ought first to have cut down the very Root, to have come to this City and destroyed it with the Inhabitants: he rather chose first to enter Galilee, and the places adjoining, that in the mean time you might repent you, and consider of your Estate. But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardliness and weakness in him, and by our long-suffering you were emboldened against us: and when Nero was dead, you did as treacherous Subjects are wont to do, and took occasion by our civil dissention to revolt from us: and whilst my Father and I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your selves for a War against us: neither were you ashamed to oppose us, when my Father was declared Emperour, whom notwithstanding you had found most gentle Captains unto you. At last, when the Empire fell to us, and all things being now quieted, all Nations with gifts and presents came to congratulate us, behold again, the Jews showed themselves our Enemies, and you sent an Embassador beyond Euphrates, only to get aid to your Rebellion: You wall'd and fortified your Towns anew, and falling into factions among your selves, at last you came to a Civil War: all which none but the most vile people in the world would have committed. Wherefore being commanded by my Father, who was now urged thereunto, I came against this City with a heavy charge; yet did I rejoyce when I heard that the People desired Peace. Before I exercised Hostility against you, I exhorted you to Peace: after the War was begun, I desired a while from using severity; I spared all those that of their own accord fled to me, and kept my Promise to them, pitying those that were Captives. I punished only those that drew you into this War, and till forced so to do, I set not the Rams against your Walls; but always restrained my Souldiers so much desirous of your blood. As often as I overcame you, so often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquished. Again, when I approached the Temple, I (willingly omitting the Law of Arms) requested you to spare both it and the holy things; offering you leave to depart, and promising you safety, or licensing you to fight another time in another place, if so you thought good. All these my Offers you refused, and with your own hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches dare to present your selves before me in Arms. What thing can you now preserve so excellent, as that which is already perished? What pardon can you expect, seeing your Temple is destroyed? nay even now you stand armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission at the last cast. O wretches, with what hope? Is not your People dead? Is not your Temple destroyed, and your City now in my hands, yea, and your lives too? And can you imagine after this to end them by an honourable death? I will not strive with your obstinacy: yet if you will cast down your weapons and yield to my discretion, I will spare your lives; and I shall reserve the rest to my self to use as a good Master, who punishes not but with regret even the most unpardonable crimes.

To this they answered, That they could not yield themselves to him, though he gave them his word, having vowed the contrary, but they requested licence to depart with their Wives and Children into the Desert, and leave the City to the Romans. Titus was greatly enraged that they being in a manner already his Captives, should impose upon him Conditions, as though they were Victors; and he commanded a Herald to tell them that henceforth they should not flie to him, nor hope that he would receive them; that he would pardon none; and that they might employ all their force to fight and save themselves as they could, for he would now in all things use the Law of Arms: and so he permitted the Souldiers to sack the City and set on fire. The same day they did nothing; but the next day following they fired the Counsel-house, the Palace Aera, and the place of Justice, and the fire came to Queen Helens Palace, which was situate in the midst of Aera: also the houses and streets of the City full of dead Bodies were set on fire. The same day, the Sons and Brethren of King Izates, and with them many Persons of quality assembled together, and supplicated Caesar to pardon them: and he, though incensed against them all, yet not changing his manner, received them to mercy, and put them all in Prison, and afterward carried their Kings Sons and Kinsmen to Rome, there to remain as Hostages.

CHAP. XIV.

The Seditious get into the Palace, pillage it, and kill there 8400 of the People, who had fled thither for refuge.

THE Seditious went to the Kings Palace, where many had left their wealth, because it was a strong place: and driving the Romans from thence, they slew all the people there assembled, amounting to the number of 8400, and carried away all the Money; and they took there two Roman Souldiers alive, one a Horseman, and the other a Footman; and they flew the footman and drew him all along the City, as it were in the Body of that one revenging themselves upon all the Romans. But the Horseman affirming that he had something to say to them, which would greatly profit them, and save their lives, he was carried to Simon; and not having there any thing to say, Simon delivered him to one of his Captains called Aradals to be slain; and he brought him where the Romans might behold him with his hands bound behind him, and a veil before his eyes, meaning there to behead him: but he, whilst the Jew drew out his Sword, escaped to the Romans. Titus would not put him to death, because he had escaped from the Enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Roman Souldier, who suffered himself to be taken alive, he took from him his arms, and discharged him from bearing them any more, K which to a man of Courage was worse than Death. The next day, the Romans putting the Seditious to flight that were in the lower City, fired all as far as Silva; rejoicing that the Town was destroyed: yet they got no booties, because the Seditious had already robbed and spoiled all, and carried it into the higher City. For they nothing repented them of their wickedness, but were as arrogant as though they had been in prosperity: so that with joy they beheld the City on fire, and said, That they desired death, for that the People being slain, the Temple destroyed, the City on fire, they should leave nothing to their Enemies. Yet Joseph in this extremity laboured to save the Reliques of the City, much inveighing against their cruelty, and earnestly exhorting them to save themselves: but he nothing profited by all this, being only derided for his labour: for neither L would they yield to the Romans for their Oaths sake, nor were they able to fight with the Romans, being now as it were besieged round by them; yet their accustomed murders encouraged them to more.

This dispersed all over the City, they lurked in the ruins, lying in wait for those that sought to flee to the Romans; many of them were taken and slain; for Famine had so weakened them that they could not flee: and any death was more eligible than Famine. So that many fled to the Romans, having no promise, nor hope to be spared by them; and feared not to expose themselves to the fury of the Seditious, who never ceased from murder. And now there was no place in the whole City void, but was filled with dead bodies, who either perished by Famine or Cruelty. But the Tyrants and factious Thieves placed their last refuge in the Vaults, where they hoped, whatsoever happened, to hide themselves that they could not be found, and so, after the City was destroyed, to escape; which was only their vain fancy: For they could neither be hid from God, nor the Romans: yet at that time they trusted in those Caves, from whence they fired the City more than the Romans, and cruelly murdered those, that having escaped the flames, fled into secret places, and spoiled them: also if in any place they found any meat, though all bloody, yet they took it and eat it; and now they fell to fight one with another about the spoil they got. And I doubt not, but if they had not been prevented by the destruction of the City, their cruelty would have been such, that they would have eaten the bodies of dead men. N

How the higher part of the City was assaulted: and how some of the Jews fled unto Titus.

Titus perceiving that the higher part of the City could not be won without Mounts, being situate in a soil, round about which were high and deep Precipices, on the twentieth day of August he set all his Souldiers on work: and the carrying of Wood for that purpose was very painful, all Trees within 100 furlongs off the City being already cut down, and used in the former Work, as is before said. So the four Legions raised a Mount on the West side of the City; and the Auxiliaries made a Mount against the Porch, Bridge and Tower, which Simon, during his War with John, had built. About this time the Captains of the Idumeans assembling together, deliberated to yield themselves, and sent five of their Company to Titus, beseeching him to receive them to mercy: and he hoping that the Tyrant would yield after them, who were the greatest part of his Army, with much difficulty granted them Life, and so sent them back to their fellows. But Simon having notice of their design, presently slew those five that were sent to Titus; and taking the Captains (the chief of whom was James the Son of Sefa) he put them in Prison, and carefully watcht the Idumeans, who now having no chief Commanders, knew not what to do. But the Guard could not hinder them from fleeing; for although many of them were killed, yet divers fled and escaped, and were all received by the Romans, Titus's courtesy being such, that he remembered not his former Orders to the contrary. And now the Souldiers abstained from murders, and minded only the getting of Wealth; the common People they sold with their Wives and Children for a small price; many being exposed to sale, and few coming to buy them. Titus having published that none should flee unto him without their families, yet now received those also that came alone, appointing some to enquire who had deserved punishment, and to inflict it on them. So an infinite number was sold; and more than 40000 of the People were saved, whom the Emperour dismissed, and permitted to go whither they pleased.

At the same time a certain Priest, Jesur the Son of Thebathus was promised pardon on condition he would deliver certain holy things belonging to the Temple: and so he came and brought out of a Wall two Candlesticks, like to those that were in the Temple; Tables, Goblets, Cups, all made of solid and massie Gold: also the Veil and the Ornaments of the Priest, some precious Stones, and many Vessels made for sacrifice. Moreover, the Keeper of the holy Treasure, called Phineas, brought forth the Garments, and all things that belonged to the Priests, and much Purple and Scarlet, which were laid up in store, to make Tapestry or Hangings, among which also was some Cinnamon, Cassia, E and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded sweet Odours to be offered to God. He also delivered him much wealth of other men, and much sacred Treasure: for which although he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as those were that fled to Cesar.

CHAP. XVI.

THE seventh day of September the Mounts being finished, which was the Eighteenth day after they were begun, the Romans planted their Rams and Engines for battery, whereupon some of the Seditious, despairing to keep the City, left the Walls, and fled to the Mountain Acra; others hid themselves in Vaults; but the most resolute endeavoured to hinder the Romans from placing the Rams against the Walls. The Romans, besides that they were more in number, had their Courage increased by Victory. But on the contrary, the Jews being now all disheartened and sorrowful, so soon as any part of the Wall was broken down or shaken by the force of the Rams, straightways fled; and the Tyrants were surprized with greater fear than needed. For even before such time as the Enemies had entered the Wall, they stood in doubt whether to flee or no: and they who a little before were so proud and arrogant, now trembled and quaked, so that it was pitiful to see such a change in them, though they were wicked persons. But in order to have themselves, they endeavoured to assail the Wall that Titus had built to compass the whole City withall : but seeing themselves forsaken of all those that were wont to be truly to them, every one fled whither necessity drove him. In the mean time news was brought that all the West-wall of the City was beaten down ; others affirmed that the Romans had entred, and that they had seen the Enemy in the Towers, fear troubling their Judgment, and making them think they saw things which were not, whereupon they bewailed their misfortune ; and as though they had been lame, they stood still and fought not to flee. From whence one may plainly perceive Gods justice towards the impious, and the Romans Fortune ; for the Tyrants deprived themselves of their strong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their Towers, wherein they could never have been taken but by Famine : and the Romans having so much laboured at the lower Walls, now by Fortune took these, which their Engines could never have shaken ; for there were three inexpugnable Towers that could not be battered with the Engines, whereof before we have made mention. So the Tyrants having forsaken these, or rather being by Gods will driven from thence, they fled towards the Valley of Siloa : where after the fear was past, they again took heart, and attacked the new Wall that was in that place, yet not using such courage and vigor as need required, they were beaten off by the Guards that defended it, their strength now failing, and being wearied with labour, fear, famine, and calamity. Some were driven one way, and some another, and they were forced to hide themselves in Vaults and Sinks. The Romans having obtained those Towers placed their Colours upon them, and clapping their hands and shouting for joy, they cried, Victory, finding the end of the War nothing so terrible as the beginning. Yet they did not believe that this was the end, because they got the Wall without any bloodshed, but they admired that no man offered to resist them.

The Tyrants entice themselves, and of their own accord forsake the Towers from whence by no means but famine they might be driven.

The Romans enter the town and obtain the Victory.

The houses and families of Jerusalem reckoning are left full of dead bodies.

Whereupon issuing into every Street, they slew whomsoever they found without any respect, and fired Houses, and kill'd all the People that had fled into them ; and where they entered to get prey, they found whole Families dead, and houses full of Carcases consumed by Famine. Thus terrified with the heavy fight, they departed, not taking any thing away ; yet for all that they pitied not those that were left alive, but slew whomsoever they met, whereby they filled the narrow streets so full of dead bodies, that none could pass that way for them : all the whole City flowed with blood ; so that many places set on fire, were quenched with the blood of those that were slain. At evening they ceased from killing, but all night long the fire increased : and so in the morning, which was the eighth of September, all was set on fire ; the City in the time of the Siege having endured more misery and calamity, than ever it received joy and happiness from the time of the first foundation, notwithstanding that the same had been so great, that all Cities might justly envy it ; and it no wise deserved to be so oppressed with such misery, save only for that it fostered and bred such impious persons as wrought the overthrow thereof.

Titus entering into the City amongst the rest, admired the strong holds thereof, and the rocky Towers, of which the Tyrants like mad-men deprived themselves ; and seeing the height, firmness, bigness, and the joining of the Stones together, and their breadth, and height, he said, Surely God hath assisted us in this War, and he it was that drove the Jews from these Fortresses. For what could mens hands and Engines prevail against them ? And having spoke much to this effect to his Friends, he set those at liberty whom the Tyrants had left prisoners in the Towers : and when he destroyed the rest of the City and Walls, he left those Towers standing, as a Monument of his good fortune and victory, by which he had gained them, though inexpugnable. The Souldiers now being weary with killing the miserable Jews, and yet a great multitude remaining alive, Titus commanded that only the armed Jews, and those that resisted should be slain, but the rest left alive. But the Souldiers also killed old and weak persons ; all the able and lusty men they carried into the Temple, and shut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cesar left one Fronto a Libertine, and his friend to keep them, giving him also charge to make enquiry who had deserved punishment. Fronto slew all the Thieves and Seditious, who accused one another ; and reserved certain men of large stature and beautiful for the Triumph : And all the rest that were above seventeen years old, he sent bound into Aegypt, to be employed in certain works there, as digging, delving, manuring the fields, and other publick busineses.

These multitudes of the City and defence of the Tower which the Tyrants abandoned for fear, many nobles, Fortresses, monument, the old and weak Jews are slain, and the strong and lusty reserved.

Titus also sent into divers Provinces, to serve in the Theaters for the fights with Beasts or Sword-players ; and those that were under seventeen years of age were sold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, ten thousand died for hunger ; partly,

A partly for that their Keepers hating them, would not give them meat ; partly, for that they refused meat when it was offered them. For there was now great scarcity of Corn, by reason of the great multitude of People.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the number of the Captives, and those that were slain.

THE number of all the Captives that were taken during the whole time of the War, was 97000 ; and the number of all that died and were slain during the Siege, was 110000, most of them Jews by Nation, but not natives of Judea. For being assembled together from all parts to the Feast of unleavened bread, on a sudden they were involved in the War ; and first of all a Plague fell among them by reason of the straits of the place, and immediately after, Famine, worse than it. That the City was capable of so many men, it is evident ; for Cestius desirous to signify the flourishing estate, and strength of Jerusalem to Nero, who contemned our Nation, requested the High-Priests, that if possible they could, they should number all the People in their City : and upon the Feast of Easter, when they killed Offerings from the ninth Hour of the day until the eleventh (and to eat a Lamb not fewer than ten persons were assembled ; for it is not lawful to feast alone, yea, many times twenty are in a Company) they numbered two hundred fifty six thousand five hundred Oblations, or Lambs to be killed ; so that if we reckon to every Lamb ten men, the number amounts to two Millions seven hundred thousand men, all purified, whole and sound : for it was not lawful for any that were Lepers, or had a flux of seed, nor for Women, that had the monthly D Terms, to eat of that Sacrifice ; nor yet for any Stranger that came thither for Religion's sake.

So this great multitude was assembled together from other places, and was there by the providence of God shut up as it were in a Prison. And the City being filled with men of War, was besieged ; so that the number of those that were slain surpassed all that ever perished, either by any Plague sent from God, or by the means of men ; they were partly openly slain, partly taken by the Romans : who searching the Vaults, and opening the Sepulchres, spared none they met with. There also were found more than two thousand, whereof some slew themselves with their own hands, others were kill'd by others, the rest perished by Famine. The stink of dead bodies was so great, that many minding to search the forehead places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire : yet others for lucre sake treading on the dead Carcases, searched the dead Bodies, if they could find any thing ; for great Riches were hid in the Vaults ; and covetousness omitted no way to gain.

Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the Tyrants, who even in their extremity ceased not to tyrannize, kept Prisoners ; yet God plagued them both according to their deserts : for John being almost famished with his Brethren in a Vault, besought the Romans to save his Life. And Simon, having long striven with necessity, as we shall hereafter relate, at last yielded himself, and was kept for the Triumph ; but John was condemned to perpetual prison. The Romans beat down the Walls, and fired the remaining parts of the City.

CHAP. XVIII.

A brief History of the City of Jerusalem.

Thus was Jerusalem taken in the second year of Vespasian's Reign on the eighth day of September. It had been formerly five times taken, and was now finally destroyed. First, Apsehus King of Aegypt; after him, Antiochus; then Pompey; and after them, Herod with Sofius took the City, and yet destroyed it not: But before them Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon destroyed it, when he had enjoyed the same, a thousand three hundred and threecore years, eight months and six days after it was first built. He that first built it, was one of the Princes of the Canaanites, furnished the Juss, by reason of his Piety. He first consecrated this City to God, by building a Temple to him, and changed the Name Solyms, into that of Jerusalem: But David the King of the Jews having driven out the Canaanites, gave it to his own People to be inhabited: and after four hundred threecore and four years and three moneths, it was destroyed by the Babylonians. From King David, who was the first Jew that reigned there, till the time that Titus destroyed it, were a thousand one hundred seventy and nine years; and from the time that it was first erected, until it was by him destroyed, were two thousand one hundred and seventy seven years: yet neither the Antiquity, nor Riches, nor the Fame thereof, now spread all over the World, nor the Glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it from being destroyed. Such was the end of the Siege of Jerusalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the Souldiers to get to exercise their outrage against (for they would have spared nothing that they could spoil) Cesar commanded them to destroy the City and Temple, leaving only standing certain Towers, that were more beautiful and strong than the rest, to wit, Phaselus, Hippios, and Marianne; and the Wall that was on the West side; meaning there to keep a Garrison, and that they should be Monuments of the Valour of the Romans, who had mastered a City so well fortified as by these it appeared to have been. All the rest of the City they so plained, that those who had not seen it before could not believe that it had ever been inhabited. This was the end of their madnels, who were always given to Sedition in Jerusalem, a most beautiful City and famous amongst all Nations.

How the Souldiers were rewarded.

Cæsar determined to leave the tenth Legion for a Garrison in Jerusalem, with some Troops of Horse, and other Companies of Foot: and all Wars being now ended, he purposed to give solemn praise to the whole Army for their valiant Acts, and to reward the most Courageous for their deserts. Wherefore placing a great Tribunal in the midst before the Camp, and standing up in it with the chief Officers about him, from whence the whole Army might hear him, he gave them hearty thanks that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during those Wars; praising them for their loyalty during all the time, and that in many actions they had shewed themselves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their Country: likewise that they had now given all Nations to understand, that neither the multitude of Enemies, nor strong holds, nor greatness of Cities, nor the rashness or barbarous cruelty of their Adversaries could ever resist the Forces of the Romans, or escape their hands; notwithstanding that in many things fortune favoured them: adding, that it was glorious for them to have ended this War that had continued so long; which was all they hoped for at their coming, and especially that his Father and himself, whom they had elected to be the Roman Emperors, were approved and embraced by all men, all standing to their appointment, and acknowledging themselves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover, that he admired them and loved them all, for that they had shewed themselves valiant and courageous: and that he would now recompence those with honours, and due rewards, who had behaved themselves most valiantly, most hazarded themselves,

He caused a great multitude of Oxen to be Sacrificed, and distributed the flesh to his Army; and during three days he feasted all his principal Officers, after which he dismissed all the Troops to the places designed for them, appointing the tenth Legion to keep Jerusalem, and not sending it back to Euphrates, where before it was. He also removed the twelfth Legion out of Syria, remembering that under Cestius his Government they had fled from the Jews, being before at Raphanaus; which he sent unto Malta that is situate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia; the other two he kept with himself, as sufficient to guard him into Egypt, which were the fifth and fifthteenth Legions. And coming to Cæsarea by the Sea-coast, he there laid up all his spoils, and caused the Captives to be kept, because the Winter-Season permitted him not to sail into Italy.

How the Emperour Vespasian went from Alexandria into Italy during the siege of Jerusalem: and Titus went to Cæsarea Philippi, where many captive Jews were slain in the Spectacles which he gave to the people

D

Whilst Titus was busied in the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian in a Merchants Ship failed to Rhodes, and from thence departing in a Galley he sailed all the Cities by which he passed, being joyfully received of them all, and went from Ionia into Greece, from thence to Corcyra, and into Slavonia, and afterwards by Land, Titus being returned from Cæsarea on the Sea-Coast, came to Cæsarea Philippi, and there made a long abode, proclaiming all sorts of pastimes: wherein many Captives perished, some being cast to wild Beasts, others forced in great Companies to fight one against another. Being in this place, he understood that Simon the Son of Giora, was taken. This Simon at such time as Jerusalem was besieged was in the higher part of the City, when the Roman Army entered the Walls, and began to wait: and with his most trusty Friends, and certain Masons, having provided them all necessary Tools, and Victuals that might suffice them all for many days, he went into a secret Cave, unto the end thereof, and there he caused them to dig further, hoping so to get out at some place where he might safely escape away. Yet this his hope had not so good success as he expected: for they had digged but a little way, before their Victuals failed them: notwithstanding that they had made very great sparing thereof. Then Simon thinking to deceive the Romans, cloathed himself in white, and put on a purple Cloak about him, and so came out of the Earth in that place where the Temple had formerly stood. They that did see him, were astonished a while, and stirred not, but let him alone: yet at last they came to him, and demanded what he was; but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captain unto him, and presently some of the Souldiers run to call him, and so he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captain of the Souldiers. Terentius having learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related to Cæsar the manner of his taking; and thus Simon was by the will of God delivered into his Enemies hands, who hated him above measure, and so he was justly punished, for having so cruelly tyrannized over his own Country-men, not taken by their force, but yielding himself unto them, having cruelly butchered many under pretence of false Criminations, to wit, for having revolted to the Romans.

force, but that it can at one time or other punish those that violate it; and it many H times inflicteth grievous punishment upon men, when they think they have escaped all, & are not presently punished; which also Simon felt, after he fell into the Romans hands: his coming out of the earth could a great many more of the Seditious at that time to be taken in the Caves. When Cesar was returned to Cesarea by the Sea-Coast, Simon was presented bound to him; and he commanded that he should be referred for his Triumph, which he purposed to make at Rome. After making some abode in that place, he celebrated his brother Domitian's birth-day with great solemnity; & in this solemnity he brought forth divers Jews, whose punishment he had of purpose deferred till this time: the number of all that perished there with fighting against Beasts, and amongst themselves, and by fire, amounted to more than 2500 men. Yet the Romans thought all these punishments too light and easie for them. After this Titus went to Beritus, which is a City in Phœnicia, (and a Colony of the Romans: ) and here also he made some long abode, and celebrated the birth of the Emperour his Father, with far greater Solemnity then the former, as well in giving divers Shews to the people, as in great expence and Sumptuousness, and causing many Captives to perish, as before.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Calamity of the Jews at Antioch.

K

AT the same time the Jews who liv'd at Antioch were in great misery; for the whole City was incited against them, both for some new crimes laid to their charge, and for certain offences before committed; which necessarily I must recount before I proceed. The Nation of the Jews was mixed amongst almost all Nations of the World; and especially amongst the Syrians, by reason of their vicinity; and many of them were at Antiochia, because it was a great City: and the Kings that succeeded Antiochus permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to enjoy all the liberties of the City. For Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, destroyed Jerusalem and sacked the Temple; but his Successors restored all the Brass vessels that were taken from the Temple to the Jews, to be used in their Synagogue at Antioch, and permitted them to have the same liberties in the City, that the Greeks enjoyed; and the other Kings also of latter times used them after the like sort: so that their number greatly encreased, and they enlarged their Temple, and enriched it with sundry offerings, and oftentimes gain'd some Pagans to be of their Religion; and so rendered them also a part of their Nation. Now about the time that the War broke out, and Vespasian arrived in Syria, the Jews began to be generally hated of all men: and one of them named Antiochus, of considerable parentage, whose Father was chief of all the Jews in Antioch, at such time as the people of Antioch were assembled in the Theater, came in amongst them, and accused M his own Father, and the rest of the Jews to have conspired together to burn the City in the night time; and he nam'd some other Strangers to them, as Conspirators with the rest. The people hearing this, could not repress their rage, but presently caused those that were accused, to be burnt in the Theater: and made great speed to set upon all the Jews, hoping that by speedy dispatch they might preserve their Country, which otherwise was like to perish. Antiochus, to enrage them the more, offer'd to sacrifice according to the custom of the Pagans; thereby as it were assuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Jews and their customs; moving them also to compel all the rest of the Jews to do the like, and whosoever refused so to do, were to be judged Traitors. The Antiochians followed his counsel: but few Jews would obey; and they that denied to sacrifice, were slain. Then Antiochus receiving a party of Souldiers from the Roman Governours, became most cruel against his Country-men, and would not permit them to keep holy the Seventh day; but in it obliged them to do all labour and business, that they were accustomed to do upon any other day; and he so urged them hereto, that within short time the seventh day was not only violated amongst them at Antioch, but also in other places and Cities round about.

The Jews at Antioch having endured this persecution, fell into another as great calamity, whereof I intend to speak. It hapned that the four-square Market and the publick Places, where all Writings and Registers were kept, as also the Kings House, were burnt: and the fire so encreased, that with much ado it was hindered from firing the whole City. Of this fact Antiochus accused the Jews, thereby incit-

ing

Ating the Antiochians, against them; and it was not hard for him to believe his calumnies although they had not hated them before, by reason of that which lately pass'd: so that now they almost perswaded themselves, that they had seen the Jews put fire to the houses; and so in a great rage all of them set upon those that were accused. Wherefore Collega the Lieutenant-Governour, had much ado to pacifie the people, notwithstanding that he requested them to permit him to inform Cesar of all that was past. For Vespasian had already sent Cesennius Pœtus to be Governour of Syria, but he was not yet arriv'd there. Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth; and not one of the Jews accused by Antiochus was prov'd guilty: for certain impious people had done all this mischief, being indebted; thinking that if they burnt the market-place, and the publick writings, their debts could not be required at their hands. Nevertheless the Jews lived in great fear, and expected the event of these forged accusations.

CHAP. XXII.

AFTER Titus had received Letters from his Father, that he was arrived in Italy, and that all the Cities where he came welcomed him very joyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pomp and triumph, he was eased of the care he had before, and very joyful for his Fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy reverenc'd Vespasian, though absent, as though he had been present with them, desiring to see his arrival, whose coming they so heartily wish'd for. The Senate, remembering what calamities had befallen the City in the change of Princes, desired to receive their Emperour honorable for his old age, and martial renown, whose presence alone would be to his subjects advantage and safety. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with civil Wars, long expected his arrival, affirming themselves thereby to have an end of their calamity, and to recover again their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the Souldiers, who knowing his skill in martial affairs, by that which himself had already done, and finding their other Emperours ignorant and unskilful, much wish'd his coming; in hope thereby to be delivered from the disgrace wherein they lived, and to be both honoured, and preferred from danger. The Nobility seeing him so beloved of all men, could no longer wait his coming, but went to meet him at some distance from the City, and accompanied him; and no man stay'd his coming, but in whole multitudes they went to meet him; they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meet him, than stay'd at home.

When news was brought that he approached near the City, and how friendly and courteously he had entertained all men, the people with their Wives and Children stay'd in the way he came, to salute him: and wheresoever he came, with joyful applauses and acclamations they shout'd, calling him their Conserver and Benefactor, and he who alone was worthy to be the Roman Emperour; and the whole City was as it had been a Temple, all hung with Garlands, and full of sweet odours and perfumes: and the multitude of the people being such that he could scarcely get into the Palace, he offer'd Sacrifices to his household gods for his safe return; and all the people were feasted by their Tribes, Kindred, and Neighbours, and made vows to their Gods, that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his Son after him, and that the Empire might never depart from his lineage. The City of Rome having thus received Vespasian, it was soon after blessed with all happiness and prosperity.

The Scythians Rebellion against the Romans.

SOMEtime before Vespasian went to Alexandria, and whilst Titus besieged the City of Jerusalem, a great part of Germany was revolted, with whom the French that bordered upon them, were confederated, renouncing their allegiance, in hope to free themselves from the Yoke and Government of the Romans. The first motive that caused the Germans to revolt, and to war against the Romans, was their temerity and rash nature prone to fight having but very little hope of success, together with the hatred of the Romans, who they knew alone could by force bring them into subjection; and they were chiefly thereunto encouraged by the present opportunity. For seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with civil Wars, by reason of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the World under their dominion was now in suspense, they thought that by reason of their troubles and Civil Wars, fit opportunity was offered them to recover their freedom; and they were hereunto perwaded by Cassius and Civilis, two of the most potent amongst them, who long before desired alteration, and now finding opportunity, shewed what minds they bare. Whereupon taking courage they made trayal what the common people thought of this point, and the greatest part of them manifestly condescended hereunto, and perhaps the rest were not unwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods providence, Vespasian sent Letters to Pesutius Cerialis (who before had been Governour of Germany) and declared him Consul, commanding him to go into Britain and take the Rule of the Country. He forthwith obeyed Vespasian command: and hearing that the Germans had revolted, he went against them, they having now levied an Army, and gave them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forcing them to return to their obedience to the Romans. Notwithstanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had assuredly been punished for their offence: For so soon as news of their Rebellion was brought to Rome, Cesar Domitianus, Vespasian's Son (who although very young understood matters of War beyond his age) hearing of it, and being led by the courage which was hereditary to him, undertook the Expedition to go and conquer them: The Barbarians terrified with the report of his coming, submitted to him, thereby gaining this, that without bloodshed they were brought under subjection as before. And all things in Gallia being well disposed of, so that it was not easie for them, although they would, to rebel any more, Domitian returned again to Rome, having gained great Credit to his Age and Country.

At the same time also the Scythians rebelled; and assembling in great multitudes, passed over the River Ister, and with great violence and cruelty coming unexpected, slew many Roman Garisons, whom they found in strong holds; and Pompeius Agrippa Lieutenant-General, who had been Consul, meeting them, gave them Battle, and was slain: which done, they went all over the Countries adjoining, wasting, robbing, and spoiling them. When Vespasian heard thereof, and how Mesias was all waited, he sent Rubrius Gallus to chastise them; he having slain many of them in fight, forced the rest to retire into their own Country. This General having thus ended that War, provided to prevent them if hereafter they attempted the like: for he built far stronger Forts than were before, so that the Enemy could no way pass out of their own Country; by which means the Wars in Mesias were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the River Sabbaticus, and the Famous triumph of Vespasian and Titus.

The year of the World, 4036, after the Nativity of Christ, 74.

Titus having some while remained at Berytus (as is before said) returned from thence, and shewed many spectacles in all the Cities of Syria, where he came, relieving for that purpose the Jews that were Captives, to let all men understand their overthrow; in his Journey he beheld a River worth the mentioning; it runneth in the midst between Aracas and Raphaneas, two Cities of the Kingdom of Agrippa, and hath a miraculous nature: for when it floweth, it is very full of Water, and runneth with a swift streame; but having flowed six days, it is on the seventh day so dry that you may see the bottom, and the next day it continueth his course; for which cause the Jews call it Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Jews Sabbath, which is the seventh day. When the Antiochians understood, that Titus was coming to their City, they could not contain themselves within their Walls for joy, but all went out to meet him; and not only Men, but also Women and Children expected his coming thirty Furlongs off; and when he approached near them, they holding up their hands to him, saluted him with great joy; and having received many courtesies from him, they returned with him; and amongst other acclamations, they often besought him to banish the Jews out of their City. But Titus returned no answer, making as though he heard not what they requested. Yet the Jews doubtful what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great fear. Titus tarried not at Antioch; but passed from thence to Zeugma towards Euphrates, where the Ambassadors of Vologesus King of the Parthians came to him, and presented him a Golden Crown for his Conquest of the Jews: which he receiving, feasted the Ambassadors, and so returned to Antioch, where the Senate and people besought him to come into the Theatre, all the people being assembled there expecting him, and he accorded so to do: and again they besought him to expel the Jews out of their City; but he answered, that their Country, whereunto he might have banished them, was now destroyed, and there was no place that would receive them. The Antiochians, seeing they could not obtain their first petition, requested another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the Brazen Tables, wherein were engraven the Jews privileges. But Titus would not grant that: he leaving the Jews in the same Estate he found them, he departed from thence into Egypt. And as in the way he past by Jerusalem, comparing the desolation of that place with the beauty & goodly buildings it had before it was destroyed, he lamented and pitied the overthrow thereof, not insolently rejoicing as another would have done, for having destroyed so fair and strong a City: but cursing the Seditious who forced him to destroy it, and being sorry he had made his virtue known by the calamity of that miserable people. For full great part of the Treasure of the City was found in the Ruins; and some the Romans found of themselves; but the most they got, the Captives told them of, which was Gold and Silver, and other precious things buried by the owners in the Earth being uncertain what would befall them. Titus going forward in his journey speedily past through this deplorable Solitude, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to sayle in to Italy, he sent the two Legions, that accompanied him, unto the places from whence they came, the fifth into Mesias, and the tenth into Pannonia, commanding Juba and Simon, the two chief of the Prisoners, and others, to the number of seven hundred, all of goodly stature and beautiful, to be carried into Italy, in order to use them in his triumph. When he arrived at Rome, as he desired, the people were affected towards him, as if he had been their Father, and went out to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his Son Titus, meeting him in his own person with great joy: all the Citizens likewise received him with exceeding joy, seeing that now the Father and his two Sons were met. Within a few days after they purposed to make but one Triumph for both, though the Senate had decreed to each a peculiar Triumph for their valiant deeds; and in the day prefixed for the same no man in all the City remained at home, but every one got a place to stand in, that they might see the Emperours, leaving only Room between them for their passage. All the Soldiers before day-light with their Captains in the head of the Companies came and expected the Emperours, not at the Palace Gate, but near the Temple of Istis, where the Emperours that night lodged: and at day break Vespasian and Titus came forth, both both crowned with Lawrel, and in Purple Garments made after their Country fashion; and they went to Octavian's walks, where the Senate, Nobles and Roman Knights expected their coming. Before the Porch was raised a Tribunal, and in it were placed Seats of Ivory, on which they ascending sat down, and presently all the Souldiers with a loud voice shouted forth their praises. The Emperours were unarmed, and clothed in Silk, and crowned with Lawrel. Vespasian having received their praises, as they offer'd him to speak more in his commendations, he beckned with his hand, and made a sign to them to be silent: which done, he rose up, and covering the greatest part of his head with his Garment, he made the accustomed prayers and vows: and Titus also did the like. Then Vespasian spake to them all in general, but in few words, so he dismissed the Souldiers to go to dinner, which, according to the custom, the Emperour was to provide for them: himself departed from them to the triumphant Gate, fo-called for that all Triumphs passed that way; and after they had eat there, they put on triumphant Robes, and offered Sacrifices to the Gods, whose Images were placed by the Gate, and so went in triumph all along the places designed for publick Shews, to the end that all people might have a better view of their magnificence. But the spectacles there exhibited, both for number, variety, and costliness, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could devise, both workmanship, Riches, Variety, and Novelty. For almost all things that ever were in any place amongst men that lived in felicity, either Rich or Glorious, and pleasant to behold, all were that day shewed and seen in this Triumph, as a Testimony of the grandeur of the Roman Empire. For there was such store of works of Gold, Silver, and Ivory, that one would not have deemed them to have been made only for the pomp of that day, but to have been so plentiful, as if they had flowed all about the City: some carried fine Tapestry made of all sorts of Purple, & curiously wrought with Pictures & Babylonian works and there was so many Gems and precious Stones, some set in Crowns of Gold, some in other works, that it appeared that without reason we judged them to be rare and scarce. Moreover, the Pictures of their Gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatness & workmanship, and all of precious matter. Moreover divers sorts of living creatures were there to be seen, all adorned with some attire agreeing and alluding unto their nature. There was also an infinite multitude of men in Purple Garments wrought with Gold, who carried all these things; and all those that were designed to serve for this pomp, were attired in such Garments, than which nothing could be more Glorious. Even the Cap-ives were not without gorgeous attires: but the variety and beauty of the Garments made the sadnes of their countenances less remarkable. The Pageants, that were born in the Triumph, were of admirable bigness, so that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was possible that men should carry them: for many were built with three or four lofts one above another, surpassing all that can be imagined for work and cost; some of them being hang'd about with Tapestry of Gold; and all things annexed unto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought Gold or Ivory: Wherein was curiously represented the manner of War, and all Stratagems, and Arts of fighting, that could be devised: some in one part of the Pageant, some in another. There might one have beheld most most fertile and fortunate Countries destroyed: whole Troops of Enemies slain, some flying, others taken Prisoners: strong and huge Walls battered down with Rams; Castles and Fortresses destroyed: great and populous Cities assaulted, and a whole Army entering the Breach: all places filled with massacred men; and how those that were not able to fight, yielding themselves, asked mercy: the Temples set on fire; and after all else was wasted, the houses thrown down upon their owners heads: and a River not flowing, as it was wont, into tilled places, and to serve for the use of Man and Cattel to drink, but carrying Streames of blood to quench part of the flames, which consumed the City to ashes; all which the Jews in their War endured. These things were so artificially represented to the view of those that had not seen them, as though they were now a doing. Upon every Pageant stood the Governour of the City, representing the manner how it was taken. After all these followed many Ships: and in every place were carried the spoils taken in War: amongst which those that were taken in the Temple of Jerusalem were most remarkable: for there was a Golden Table weighing many Talents, and likewise a Golden Candlestick, the use whereof was now not such as we were wont to put it to; for in the midst of the stem thereof was fixed a Base, and out of it proceeded many small branches, framed like a three-forked spear, every one being at the top made like a Lamp, which were in number, shewing the honour of the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath amongst the Jews. After all this was carried the Jews Law, which was the last of all the spoils. Then followed some that carried several Images of Victory, all made of Gold

A and Ivory. Afterwards came Vespasian, followed by Titus, and Domitian accompanied them gallantly adorned, and mounted on an excellent Horse; and so they went all to the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pomp. Here they made some play.

For it was an ancient Custom of their Country, to repose themselves there, till some came and brought news to them of the death of him who was General of their Enemies. This at this time was Simon Giora, who was also carried in the Triumph, and having a Rope fastned about his neck, was drawn all along the Market-place, where they that drew him kill'd him. For it is the custom of the Romans there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word was brought that he was dead, all the people made joyful exclamations, and so they fell to Sacrifice: which done according to the custom, they returned to the Palace, where they made a great Feast, as others also did for themselves at their own Houses. For this day was sacred amongst the Romans in joy of the Victory over their Enemies, and an end of civil Calamity, and the beginning of good Fortune and hope, which they quied in their new Princes.

When the Triumphs were ended, and all the Roman Empire quieted, Vespasian built a Temple, and dedicated it to Peace, which he did in so short a space, that it was admirable: and having bestowed great cost upon it, he also beaueified it with divers Pictures and carved works. And he placed in that Temple all things that men of former Ages had gathered together from the uttermost parts of the Earth. And he placed there all the Golden Vessels, and other things that the Jews used in their Temple, doing them great reverence. But their Law, and the Tapestry or Purple Veils of the Sanctuary he commanded to be kept in the Palace.

How Herodius and Machabeus were taken by Bassus.

D Cæsar sent Lucius Bassus into Judea to be Lieutenant General there, who receiving the Army of Cerealis Petilianus, took the Cattle and Garrison of Herodium by composition. After this, gathering together all his Troops which were dispersed in divers places of the Country with the tenth Legion he purposed to War against Machabeus; for he thought it necessary to destroy that Cattle, lest its strength might move many to rebel: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it had great assurance of safety; and those that sought to assault it, were in great danger: For it was built upon a Rock that was exceeding high, and which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so devised, that it was hard to come to it being environed round about with Valleys of incredible depth and very difficult to pass over: for that which is on the West part is threecore Furlongs large, and endeth at the Lake Asphaltites; on which side Machabeus hath a very high Prospect: and it is environed on the North and South with Valleys of the like depth: whereby it is impossible to win the Cattle; but that Valley which is on the East side, is at least a hundred Cubits deep, and endeth upon a Mountain near Macheron. Alexander King of the Jews seeing the Nature of the place, there built a Cattle, which afterward Gabinus in the War against Archelaus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, judged his place worthy to be fortified, as a Principal defence against the Neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly situate upon a Mountain, whence one might behold their borders. Wherefore making a large Wall, he built a City there in the place that enters into the Cattle: he also compassed the very top thereof with another Wall, and in the corner he placed Towers that were 60 Cubits high; and in the very midst of all he built a Palace for largeness and beauty admirable; and he made many Cisterns to receive Water in convenient places, which served the people abundantly, striving as it were with nature, that the places which he had made Strong, he by Art might make yet inexpugnable. He also laid up there in store Arms and warlike Engines, and also all provisions wherewith the Inhabitants might be able to hold out a long siege.

G In the Kings Palace, grew the Herb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatness; for no Figtree was taller or broader then it and it was reported that it had continued

er face Herod's time; and had endured longer, had not the Jews ruined it when H they took the place. In the Valley that lieth on the North side of the City, there is a place called Banar, where also groweth a Root of the same name, the colour whereof resembleth flax, and it shineth at night like the Sun-beams, and is not easie to be pulled up, till one cast upon it the Urine of a Woman or her flowers: w otherwise toucheth it is fare to dy, except he carry the Root hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner: They dig all round about it, so that they leave a very little of the Root covered with Earth, and then they tie a Dog to it, who striving to follow his Master, who makes as though he would go away, easily pulleth up the Root; and the Dog presently dieth, as it were in his head that seeketh to get it; but afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, need to stand in fear thereof. This Herb notwithstanding all this danger is diligently sought out for the virtue it hath. For it driveth away Devils (which are the Souls of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be applied on them: whereas otherwise if they had no help, these Devils possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also do spring certain hot Waters, very different in taste one from another, for some are bitter, some sweet: there are also sources of cold Waters, one near another in a Plain: but which is most admirable, there is a Cave hard by, not very deep, environed with an eminent Rock above, from which there stands out as it were two Doggs or Paps hard by one another, and out of one of them floweth very cold Water, out of the other very hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serve to cure many Diseases, and especially all pains of the sinews. In the same place also are mines of Sulphur and Alum.

Bassus having viewed this place on every side, resolved to besiege it; and he endeavoured to fill up the Valley that was on the East side, and so make away to it: which he began to do, hasting to raise a very high Mount in order to batter the Castle. Those that were inhabitants, constrained the Jews that were strangers to go into the lower City, judging them an unprofitable multitude; and so they caused them to endure the first brunt of the Enemies, and they themselves kept the Castle, both for that it was strong, and easie to defend, and that they hoped that by yielding the place to the Romans, they might obtain pardon of them. Yet first they purposed to make Trial if they could avoid the siege: and therefore very courageously every day they made excursions, and fought with those that were near, and many were slain on both parts. Fortune and opportunity sometime caused one side to be victors, sometime another: for the Jews got the best, when they could assault the Romans unawares, and the Romans overcame, when they were aware of the Jews coming, and armed themselves. But the siege was not ended by these Skirmishes: at length a chance befel, which obliged the Jews to yield the Castle.

Amongst those that were besieged was one Elezar a young man, very hardy and bold in any enterprize, and who oftentimes made excursions, and fought to hinder the Romans work, whom always in every fight he greatly endangered, and by his valour and adventurous courage gave those that were his fellows opportunity to assault the Romans, and to fly again and retire in safety, himself being always the last that retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts separated, he as it were condemning all men, and thinking that none of his Enemies durst undertake to Combat with him, stayed without the Gate, speaking to those that were upon the Wall, and giving great attention to them. Then one Rufus an Egyptian, one of the Roman Army, spying this opportunity ran upon him so suddenly, that he unawares took him all unarmed as he was, and they upon the Walls stood amazed, whilst Rufus led him into the Roman Camp. Then the General of the Romans caused him to be led into a place, where they in the City might see him, and there to have all his Cloaths taken off, and to be whipped: the misfortune of this young man greatly discouraged the Jews, so that all the City was melted into Tears for the calamity of this one man. Bassus seeing this contriv'd device against them in order to move them to compassion, so that for to save him they should yield their Castle: which fell out as he desired. He presently commanded a Cross to be erected, as though he would presently have crucified Elezar: which sight greatly moved them in the Castle to sorrow: whereupon with loud cries they lamented, saying, that this calamity was insupportable. Elezar beought them not to neglect him, who was now to die a most miserable

The Jews that were foreigners, fled to the lower City.

The conflict of the Jews with the Romans, began a new struggle in hand, and there in held attempt.

Elezar's courage much moved the Jews to mourn themselves.

A ble death; and moreover to provide for their own safety in yielding the Castle unto the Roman Forces and success.

They moved with his words, and many also within the City intreating for him (for he came of great Parentage and had many Kindred) though contrary to their natures, compassion took place in them: and so sending some of their company speedily, they desired to parley, declaring that they would yield the Castle on condition that they might safely depart away, and Elezar might likewise be restored to them. Which offer of theirs the Romans accepted; and the Jews in the lower part of the City having intelligence of this agreement, resolved likewise to fly away in the night: but so soon as they had opened their Gates, those that had agreed with Bassus, gave him intelligence thereof; either envying that their Country men should escape, or else fearing that Bassus would punish them for their flight: yet for all this, the most valiant of those that fled, who got out before the rest, escaped, the rest were slain to the number of one thousand seven hundred men; the Women and Children were made bond-slaves. And Bassus thinking it meet to keep his promise to them of the Castle, permitted them safely to depart, and restored Elezar to them.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Jews that Bassus slew: and how the Emperor caused the Lands of Judea to be sold.

THIS done Bassus prepared to carry his Army into the Forrest called Jardes, where he had notice that many Jews were assembled together, having escaped from Jerusalem and Macher during the Siege. So coming to the place, and finding it to be as it was reported to him, he first of all invironed it with Horsemen, that if any of the Jews sought to escape, the Horsemen might dispatch them; and he commanded the Footmen to cut down the Wood into which they had fled to hide themselves. So through necessity the Jews were constrained to fight, in hope by a courageous Charge to make a passage for themselves. Wherefore with a great Cry they violently assaulted those by whom they were invironed, and the Romans valiantly received them; and by their valour and the Jews desperation the fight endured a long time, yet the event of the Battle was favourable to the Romans; of whom only twelve were slain, and very few wounded, but all the Jews were slain in the fight, being in number three thousand, and also their Captain Judas the Son of Fairus (of whom we have already made mention, and who during the siege of Jerusalem was Commander of a Company there, and hid himself in a certain Cave, and secretly escaped from thence) At that time Cesar writ to Liberius Maximus his Governour, and to Bassus, to sell all the Lands of Judea: for he would not build any more Cities, but appropriated it to himself, leaving there only eight hundred Souldiers, and giving them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirty furlongs distant from Jerusalem: and he imposed a Tribute upon all Jews wheresoever they lived, commanding every one of them every year to pay two Drachms to the Capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay to the Temple of Jerusalem: and this was the miserable estate of the Jews at that time.

IN the fourth year of Vespasian's Reign, it hapned that Antiochus King of Comagena with all his family fell into great misfortune upon this occasion. Cesennius Petus Governour of Syria (either for envy, or for that indeed it was so; for it is not well known) sent Letters to Cesar, declaring to him that Antiochus was determined to revolt from the Romans, together with his Son Epiphanes; that he had made a League with the King of the Parthians; and that therefore it was necessary to prevent them in time, lest if they first began to revolt openly, they might trouble all the Roman Empire with War. Cesar did not neglect this news, for that the nearness of both the Kings Countries one to another seemed to require that they should be quickly prevented: for Samsata the greatest City of Comagena is situate upon Euphrates, and so might both easily receive the Parthians, and be a strong Hold for them; and also there they might easily pass over the River. Wherefore Vespasian sent word to Petus, That he permitted him to do what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entered into Comagena with the sixth Legion, and certain other Companies of Foot, and some Troops of Horse, accompanied with Arifobolus King of Chalcis, and Sohemus King of Emesa, who came to assist him. They entered the Country without any fight; for none of the inhabitants offered to resist. Antiochus though surpris'd with this unexpected news, yet did not so much as think of any War against the Romans; but determined to leave the whole Kingdom in that estate that then it was in, and with his Wife and Children to depart from thence, hoping hereby to clear himself to the Romans, from that which they suspected of him: and going almost a hundred and thirty furlongs from the City into a Plain, there he encamped. Petus sent men to Samsata to take it, as they easily did, and were left to keep the City, whilst he with the rest of the Souldiers purpose to go against Antiochus: But the King, though by necessity urged thereto, yet would not fight against the Romans; but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoever: But his two Sons being lusty strong young men, and skilfull in martial affairs, could not easily abstain from fight in this their distress. Wherefore they had recourse to their forces, and in a great fight that endured a whole day, they shewed their Valour, and came off with little loss. Yet Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his Country, but taking his Wife and Daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby discouraged his Souldiers, who despairing to keep the Kingdom for him, revolted to the Romans. But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seek to save themselves, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten Horsemen, they passed the River Euphrates: And so being out of danger, they went to Vologesus, by whom they were received, not as Fugitives, but with great honour, and according to their Degree, as though they yet possessed their ancient dignity.

Petus coming to Larusus of Cilicia, sent a Centurion to arrest and carry Antiochus bound to Rome. But Vespasian permitted not the King to be so ill treated, considering more the old Friendship between them, than the offence which he believed had given occasion to this War. Wherefore he commanded, that in the way as he came, he should be unbound and stay a while at Lacedemon, and forbear his journey towards Rome; allowing him money sufficient to maintain his Kingly dignity.

Epiphanes, and those with him hearing this, were eased of the great concern they took for their Father, whom they greatly feared to be fallen into some danger; and now they also conceived some hope to be reconciled to Cesar; whereof Vologesus writ to Vespasian, N who courteously gave them leave to come to Rome; and their Father was presently sent for to them from Lacedemon, and so they remained at Rome in great honour.

The Nation of the Alans, being originally Scythians, inhabit about the River Tanais, and the Marshes of Maoris, as in another place we have recounted. They conspiring with the King of Hyrcania to pass into Media and sack it (for he was Master of that passage which King Alexander had made in such wife, that it was shut up with Iron Gates) obtained leave to pass, and so came into Media, whilst the Medes nothing feared any such matter, and sacked and spoiled all their populous and wealthy borders being full of Cattel, none daring to resist them; for Particus King of that Country, for fear fell into the strongest hold he had, and left all his goods behind him, and with much O redeemed his Wife and Concubines, whom they had taken, for a hundred talents.

Having

A Having therefore Licence to rob and Spoile, for that no man resisted them, they came into Armenia, and wasted all the Country thereabout. Tyridates was then King of that Country, who with an Army coming to fight against them, was almost by them taken alive in the Battle; for one cast a halter about him and began to draw him amongst the Enemies: and so had done, but that he with his Sword quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reason he fought against them, wasted all the Country, and carrying with them a great multitude of Men and Cattle out of both Countries, they returned into their own.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Massada, a very strong Castle, was taken.

B Bar dying in Judaea, Flevius Sylva succeeded in his place; who perceiving that all the Country else were Conquered save one only Castle, he with all the forces he could make went against it. This Castle is called Massada. The Captain of the Sicarians, named Eleazar, who commanded in it, was a very strong and valiant man, of the Tribe of Juda, who perswaded a great many Jews, as is before said, not to enrol themselves when Cyrenus was Consul, and sent to tax Judaea. For at that time the Sicarians had conspired against those that obeyed the Romans, and in all things used them like Enemies, taking and driving away their Goods, and firing their Houses, affirming that they nothing differed from strangers, who betrayed the liberty of their Country, rather than they would fight for it, and that they had rather they were on the Romans side. But this was only an excuse to hide their avarice and injurious dealing, as the proof made manifest; for they themselves revolted and bore Arms against the Romans, and their enterprises against the Romans were worse than the rest; and when their first forged pretence was known and confuted, they raged more than before against those that upbraided them with it.

D For at that time the Jews abounded with all manner of Iniquity, so that none was left uncommitted, yea, though one endeavoured to invent some new Villanies, yet could he devise none that was not then practised: All laboured with this malady, both in particular, and in common; and every one strove with other to surpass his fellow in impiety against God, and injustice towards his Neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker fort; and the meaner fort destroyed the Potentates, and took their riches away from them; those gaped after rule and dominion, these after mischief.

The Sicarians were the first that were so cruel and injurious against their neighbours; for not provoked thereunto, either by deed or word, they slew and injured all men without cause; but in comparison of John they were very moderate. For he did not only slay all that counselled that which was good and profitable, as his greatest Enemies, especially the Citizens; but also he many ways injured his Country, like one who impiously condemned God himself. For he did eat forbidden meats, and violated the purity of his Countries Customs: so that it was no wonder to see him observe no justice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the Laws of God. Again, what Villanies did Simon Giora leave undone? Or what injury did he abstain from offering to their Bodies, who had chosen him for their Ruler? What did kindred and friendship then avail any man? Yea, it occasioned them to be more cruelly used, and more tyrannously butchered, than otherwise. For they thought it a pitiful offence to abuse Strangers, but a glory to exercise cruelty upon their most familiar Friends.

F The Idumeans were followers of this fury, who kill'd the high Priests, and left not any one of note in the City, by whom God might be honoured; and induced all injustice possible, wherein the Zealots excelled. For they committed all mischief, leaving nothing unattempted, that had ever before that time been practised: yet they took their Name from those that practise good and godliness, but in truth it was to mock and flout those that did well (so savage and cruel was their nature) or else accounting the greatest impiety to be goodness. But their end was as they deserved; God punished their impieties with his just vengeance: For even till the end of their lives, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, undergoing all sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserved: But what punishment could be devised sufficient for their deserts? I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens cruelty: Wherefore I will return where I left.

 Sylva being advanced against Eleazar, and those that kept Massada with him, who were Sicarians, he presently subdued all the Confines and borders round about, and put in every fit place Garrisons, and invironed the Castle with a Wall, left any of the be- sieged should escape, and that the besiegers might there keep a continuall guard. Moreover, he placed his Camp in a fit quarter for the Siege, where the Rock that the Castle was built upon joyned to the other Mountain; but it was an unfit place to get necessaries in: For not only victuals were fetcht far off by great labour of the Jews, who were commanded to do it; but also water for the whole Army come where else, for there was no Fountain near that place.

The situation of Massada.

The journey by the Rock called the Snake.

Fruit for an hundred years kept uncorrupt.

This done, Sylva attempted the Castle; wherein it was requisite for him to use both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the Castle, which is thus situate. It is invironed round with a huge Rock very high on every side; and the Valley underneath is so deep, that one can scarce see the bottom, all rocky and inaccessible to all Animals; saving only that in two places there is a difficult passage to it, one from the Lake Aphalites towards the East, and the easiest of the two on the West side: the first is called a Snake; taking its name of the frainties and crooked turnings; for the Rock that is eminent, seemeth as it were broken in funder, and by little and little often returneth again into it self, and is by degrees extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no halt, but must step with one foot first upon them, and the other upon another, and must stand upon one foot while he removeth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be killed in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side between the Rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man alive. When one hath gone thirty furlongs by this way, one comes to the top of the Hill, which is not steep, but hath a Plain upon it. Jonathan the high Priest was the first that built a Castle in this place, and called it Massada; and Herod after him bestowed great labour and cost in fortifying it, for he invironed it with a Wall of seven furlongs Circuit, all of white stone, twelve Cubits high, and eight Cubits broad; and placed in it twenty seven Towers that were fifty Cubits high, by which men passed into the houses that were round about the Wall within. The King appointed the top of the Hill for Tillage, because it was a more fertile and fat soil than any ground else, so that if at any time they within the Castle wanted provision, yet they might not be famished, having this ground to furnish them. He also built in this place a Palace for himself, the way to which was on the West side within the Castle wall, whose prospect was towards the North; and he invironed the same with a very strong Wall, and in the Corners thereof he built four very firm Towers threecore Cubits high, and very sumptuous within, having divers Roomes, Galleries and Baths, supported in every place with Pillars, every one of which was one only stone: The Walls thereof were of solid stone of divers colours: and to every house, and in the top of the Hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certain Cisterns out of the Rock to hold water; so that by this means water was as plentiful, as though they had had Fountains within the Castle. There was a way to the Castle under ground from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive; but the way above ground was inaccessible; for as we have already said, by the way on the East side no man could pass, and as for that on the West, it was stoppt up with a Tower built in the strait there of distant a thousand Cubits from the Castle, by which it was impossible to pass; and it was not easie to get it by force; and the more leisurely one went, the greater was the danger. Thus was this Fortrefe strengthened both by Art and Nature.

The provision within the Castle was admirable for the plenty thereof; for there was Corn sufficient for many years, besides Wine and Oyl, and all sorts of Pulse, and great quantity of Dates. All which Eleazar, having deceitfully obtained the Castle with his Sicarians, found there: which provision was all as found and as fresh, as though it had newly been laid up in store: notwithstanding, that from the time it was placed there, to the time that the Romans took it, were a hundred years: And the Romans found the Reliques of the fruits incorrupt: and one may justly think that the cause hereof is the Air about the Castle, which by reason of the height of the place is most pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was also found all manner of Armour in great quantity, which Herod had made, and would have armed ten thousand men; also much unwrought Iron, Brasse and Lead; so that one may judge that provision to have been reserved for some great cause.

It is reported, that Herod prepared that Castle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers: First, That the People of the Jews would depose him, and make them Kings whosoever Ancients had before reigned.

The other which was more considerable, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Egypt,

The year of the World, 4018. After the Victory of Christ, 76.
Herod expect- ing a double retri- bued the place for a refuge.
 A Egypt, who without concealing her intent often requested Antonius that Herod might be slain, and that she might have the Kingdom of the Jews given to her. And it was a great marvel that Antonius doting so upon her, did not fill her request. Herod upon such apprehensions built Massada, and left it so furnished that without taking it the Romans could not put an end to the War against the Jews. After the General of the Romans had now compassed all the place, without with a Wall (as is before said) to the end that none might escape, he began to assault the Castle, but found one only place that he could fill up with Earth. For behind the Tower which on the West-side stopped up the passage to the Castle and Palace, there was a great Rock very large and long, yet not so high as Massada by three hundred Cubits: The Rock was called B Leuce, which signifieth white. When Sylva had gotten this Rock, he commanded his Souldiers to build a Mount thereon, and they cheerfully labouring, raised suddenly a mount two hundred Cubits high: yet by reason of the height it seemed not firm nor sufficient enough to bear the Engines; wherefore upon it was built a Platform with great stones fifty Cubits high, and as many Cubits broad; the Engines were such as Vespasian and Titus had devised to batter Walls with: and upon this Platform they made a Tower threecore Cubits high, all placed about with Iron.

From hence the Romans with many shot from their Engines drove the Jews from off the Castle Walls, not suffering them to lift up their heads. And Sylva having made a mighty Ram, caused the Wall to be continually battered therewith so that it could scarce- ly make a breach in it; and the Sicarians quickly prevented it, by building another Wall within, which could not be broken with the Ram, because it was yet soft, and so broke the force thereof; for they saw'd Timber in pieces, and as it were made two rails; & then filled the space between the two rails with Earth, and with other planks they kept the Earth from falling down, so that they made a work like the Wall of a house; which for that it yielded to the blows of the Ram (being soft Earth) the Ram could not prevail against it, but rather made it more strong than before by raising the Earth together.

Sylva perceiving this Judged that he might sooner destroy the Wall with fire than with his Engine, and so he commanded the Souldiers to cast upon it many burning fire- brands; and the fire quickly took hold of the Wall, because it was for the most part built with Wood; and easily also pierced through it, by reason it was not close wrought together: and there was a great flame.

At the very beginning of the fire the North wind greatly annoyed the Romans; for the fire blowing furiously from above against them, it drove to extremely upon them, that they were in great despair, fearing their Engines would be burnt; but presently the Wind changing and blowing from the South (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire again upon the Wall, so that all of it, even to the foundation thereof, was wholy set on fire. The Romans thus assisted by God, returned again into their Camp joyfully, purposing the next morning betimes to give the assault, and that night to place stronger Watches, lest any of the Enemies should escape. But Eleazar was far from thinking to flee; neither would he permit any one of his company to think of it. For seeing now the Wall was fired, and not knowing any way else to save himself, considering likewise what the Romans would do unto their Wives and Children if they should take them, he deliberated of all their death's, which he in that extremity judged to be the best way they could take. And so he assembled the most valiant of all his companions, and exhorted them all thereto, after this manner.

Generous Jews, we long ago resolved with our lives to serve neither the Romans, nor any other save only God: for he alone is the true and just Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that requireth you to shew your resolute minds: let us not therefore dishonour our selves, and beside our slavery, suffer also intolerable torments, if we be taken alive by the Romans. For we were the first that revolted from them, and now the last that war against them. And I verily think that God hath given us this benefit, that we may die well in our own liberty, which he denied to others, who were overcome contrary to all expectation. We are certain to be conquered as soon as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our dear friends, is a Glorious resolution for valiant men; and of this our Enemies cannot deprive us, who labour to take us alive, and carry us away Captives; and we are not able to ransom ourselves. For truly, at the first (when we who coveted liberty suffered all misery at the hands of our own Countrymen, and worse at the hands of our Enemies) we should have considered, that God, who was sometimes favour- able to the Nation of the Jews, had now condemned it to perdition: for had he yet been favourable to us, or had he been but lightly offended with us, he would not have permitted so many men to have perished, and have delivered his Holy City into the hands of the Enemies to be consumed with fire. We only amongst all

After the victory of Christ, 76.
 all our Nation have hoped to live in liberty, as though we had no ways offended the divine Majesty, or being guilty of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you see how we are punished for longing after vain hope, being brought into greater extremity than we expected. Neither hath our Castle, by Nature inexpugnable, any thing profited us to our preservation; but we having store of Victuals and Arms, and all other necessaries, have left all hope of safety, God himself manifestly taking it from us. For the fire that once was carried against our Enemies, did not of itself return against us and the Wall we built: But it was for the punishment of offences, who furiously raged against our own Nation: wherefore I request you, let us not be punished by the Romans, whose forces are invincible, but of our selves let us satisfy the anger of God, and so it will be more tolerable for us; even by that means our Wives shall die undefiled, and our Children shall not taste of servile Captivity. After whose deaths, we will then help another to die with credit preserving our liberty, which is the best sacrifice of all. Yet let us first fire our Castle, and burn our Treasure: for it will be no small grief to the Romans, if they neither get our bodies alive, nor find any jot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let us only leave our victuals as a sufficient testimony, that Famine did not cause us to be conquered; but that we, at first we resolved, preferred death before bondage.

Eleeazar having thus spoken, they that were present did not all accord with him; for some joyfully halted to execute his advice, thinking it a glorious death. But others moved with compassion towards their Wives and Families, were something backward or else abhorred to kill themselves, and looking one upon another with Tears, shew'd their disagreement from that which Eleeazar advised. Which when Eleeazar perceiv'd, and that his counsel through fear was defeated; fearing also that they who courageously had at first accorded thereunto, would be withdrawn by the Tears of others, he did not to end his exhortation; but standing up, he begun with a vehement discourse to speak to them of the immortality of the Soul, and fixing his Eyes upon those that wept with a great exclamation, said:

How much am I deceived, who thought that valiant men fighting for their liberty would rather chuse to die than to live? but ye see your selves not to excel any ordinary men, who fear to die, notwithstanding that thereby you may escape great misery and calamity; though in this point you ought not to have expected any admonition thereunto, nor to have made any delay to do it. The ancient custom, which have endured ever since men had reason, the divine doctrine of our Nation, which hath continually been confirmed by the deeds of our predecessors, do instruct us, that it is miserable to live, and not to die. For Death dismisseth our Souls from prison to their moisture and proper place, where never after they shall be touched with calamity. But whilst they are dead in a mortal body, and participate of his miseries, they may in a manner be affirmed to be dead. For there is no proportion between two things, one whereof is Divine, and the other Mortal. True it is, that our Souls can do much being joyed in our bodies, which they use as their instruments, secretly producing in them motion, and many other actions passing the Nature of Mortal things. But when the Soul is loosed from that heavy burthen, which weighs it down to the Earth, and hath recovered its proper habitation, then it enjoyeth free and perfect felicity, and remaineth invisible to mortal Eyes, as God himself is, as likewise it is in our bodies. For it cometh secretly into them, and so departs from them again, that no man can perceive it, being of a nature incorruptible, and yet causing great changes in our bodies. For whatsoever the Soul toucheth, that presently liveth and flourisheth; and what it forsaketh, that incontinently withereth and dyeth: so much doth it participate of immortality. Sleep may be an evident argument to you of this which I speak, in which the Soul not being distracted taketh a most pleasant and sweet repose; and communicating with God, it foreseeth many future events. Wherefore then should we fear death, who love the rest that we have in sleep? were he not a mad man that is furnished in the Law of our Nation, should give example to others to desire and contentment Death. But if we seek confirmation hereof from strangers, let us see the examples of the misfortune of Indians: for they being just men tolerate this life as a necessary office of nature for a certain time, though against their wills; yet do they even in perfect health hasten to unloose the Soul bound in this Mortal Body, though not urged thereto by any calamity or necessity, but only for desire of immortality, and solemnly take leave of their Friends; neither do any one seek to hinder them, but esteeming them most fortunate, they send by them commendations and other messages to their Friends departed: so firm is their belief that the Souls of the dead have Communion and conversation together. And thus having all instruction what to say to the Souls departed, they with great applause leap into the fire, that thereby their Souls may be purified and separated from their Bodies. And their Friends go more joyfully with them

 A when they go to their death, than any death, that bringeth his Friend on the way when he is to go a great journey; and they befall only themselves, and not those who are dead and have attained immortality. Shall not we then be ashamed not to believe so firmly as the Indians do, desisting through our own flesh our Country-laws which are to be revered of all men: yet supposing that by our law we had been instructed contrariwise, to wit, that to live in this life is bliss, and to die calamity: yet notwithstanding, this present necessity, this present time had been a sufficient motive to cause us to embrace death rather than life, seeing that the will of God and necessity oblige us thereunto. For who can doubt that God, to punish us for having made ill use of life, has long since resolved to deprive us of it? and that it is not to our own forces or the clemency of the Romans that we are beholding for not being all slain in this War? But a more potent cause hereof there was which made them conquerors. Were they the Romans that slew the Jews that inhabited at Caesarea, whom the Inhabitants thereof upon the Sabbath-day, they being assembled in one place together with their Wives and Children, massacred, notwithstanding that they had no intent to revolt from them, nor ever lifted up their hand in their own defence, not being fearing the Romans, who only accounted themselves our Nation their Enemies that revolted from them? But some may object the Jews at Caesarea, and the Inhabitants thereof were always at variance, and that now they revenged their old quarrel, having gotten opportunity. What then shall we say of the Scythopolitans, who bare Arms with the Grecians against us, and denied to assist their own kindred against the Romans? What profit did they receive by their this good will and fidelity? for they were altogether with their whole Families cruelly slain: and this was the reward they had for their labour, for having withstood us from doing the like to them. It were too long to recount particularly all things to this effect. For as ye know there is no City in all Syria that hath not massacred the Jews inhabiting in it, and that is not more an Enemy than the Romans were. They of Damascus, although they could not devise any probable cause for it, yet massacred all the Jews living among them, amounting to the number of eighteen thousand, beside their Wives and Children. And is it not for certain reported, that the number of the Jews slain by the Egyptians were above 60000? It may be, that finding no assistance in a strange Country, they were martyred by their enemies: but they that in their own Country fought against the Romans, wanted nothing that might have caused perfect hope of a full victory over the Romans, they had Weapons, Armour, Walls, and strong holds inexpugnable; and resolution to stand no danger for the sake of liberty: in a word, nothing that might put us into a condition to resist. But for how long time did this suffice? For our fortresses all were taken and subdued by the Enemies, as though they had been built to make their victory more famous; and not to do us service. And we may justly deem those happy who were slain in the Wars, for they died in liberty. Yet who doth not pity the multitude of those that fell into the Romans hands? or who would not batten to die, rather than endure the like misery that they suffered? Some of them were tortured with stripes others burnt, others halfe eaten of wild Beasts, were referred alive for the second meal: the most miserable of all are those that are yet alive, who often wish for death, and cannot find it. Where is now that potent City; that was once the Capital City of our Nation, so strengthened with Walls, so fortified with Towers & Castles to defend those Walls, scarcely able to contain the provisions for War, having in it so vast a multitude of men to fight for it, wherein God himself was thought to dwell? What is now become of it? It is razed down, even to the very foundations; and scarce any memory or reliques thereof left standing, the whole people destroyed, only a few old and unhappy men survive, who sit among the ashes of the Temple, and a few Women, whom the Enemies referred to satisfy their filthy lust. And with any amongst us, considering all these things, desire to behold the light of the Sun, although he could live without molestation; who a such an Enemy to his Native soil, who is so effeminate, or deprecates his life, that he doth not grieve to have lived till this time? would God we had been all in our graves, before we had seen that sacred City fired by a hostile hand, before we beheld the Holy Temple destroyed by impious fire: and seeing that the hope we had to be revenged on our Enemies, is now vanquished, and that we are left alone in misery and necessity, let us hasten to die well, and take compassion on our selves, our Wives and Children, and that whilst we have time. For we are all born to die, and all that are begotten by us, and the youngest men living cannot avoid it: but injury, and bondage, and to see our Wives and Children abused before our faces, is no necessity proceeding from Nature, but they only are forced to endure it, who, when they might have died without it, did refuse for fear. We first of all, trusting to our strength, rebelled against the Romans; afterwards they exhorted us to obedience, but we denied: which of them then will not be enraged against us, if they can take us alive? Most miserable shall those young men be, whose strength will endure many torments; and those old men will move compassion, whose aged years cannot suffer tortures: one shall see his Wife carried a way from him, and another his Son, having his hands bound behind him, cry out to his Father for help: who now whilst they are free from the thraldom of their Enemies, may H gloriously assist us with their Swords. Let us with our Wives and Children die Freemen, let us together depart out of this life. This our Religion commandeth, this our Wives and Children persuade; God himself hath driven us to this necessity for this purpose. The Romans would have it otherwise: who fear lest any of us should persevere, and not fall into their hands alive. Let us therefore hasten, that instead of their hope, whereby they verily persuaded themselves to take us alive, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them with sudden admiration of our glorious deaths.

Whilst Eliazar was yet speaking, and desirous still to continue his exhortation, they interrupted him: every one now in a hurry bent to follow his advice, made haste to effect it; and as though they had been urged by some Spirit thereto, one laboured to effect I another in the execution thereof, judging him to shew most valour and fortitude, that first dispatched himself. They were also desirous to kill their Wives and Children with themselves. And which is most strange, their minds were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody work; but with the same resolution they had, when they heard Eliazar speak, every one retained his good affection towards his Friends: yet permitting reason to take no place, and persuading themselves that thus they had well provided for their Children, they embraced their Wives and Children for their last farewell, and took their leaves of them, kissing them with Tears, and then all at once slew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their own, comforting themselves in being forced to do so, and that hereby they should escape the tyranny and K cruelty of their Enemies. Finally, no man was so cowardly, who did not venture on this action: so every one of them killed his dearest friends. O miserable people, whom necessity forced to slay their Wives and Children, and to account this action the very least of all their miseries. After which, not enduring the grief that ensued upon this fact, and thinking that in living any while after them, they should injure those whom they had slain, they with all speed possible gathered all their riches together, and set them one fire: which done, they elected ten by lot, who should kill the rest; and every one prostrating himself upon his Wife and Children, and embracing them in his Arms, was slain willingly by those that executed that wretched office: who having without fear dispatched them, they cast lots whose fortune it should be to kill all the L rest; and he upon whom the lot should fall, was to kill the other nine, and lastly himself upon them all; and every one so encouraged one another, that there was no difference between those that were to be killed and those that were to kill; and so the rest offered themselves to death: which done, he who was the last of all, being yet alive, went amongst the dead bodies, and searched to see if any still lived that needed his hand in so great a multitude of slain people; and finding all of them dispatched, he went and fired the Palace: which done, he with all his force thrust his Sword into his own body up to the Hilt, and so fell down by his dearest Friends.

The Jews gathered all their goods together, and cast them into the fire. Ten chosen by lot to kill the rest of the Jews.

In this manner they perished with a belief that they left not one person alive to fall into the Romans hands: but a certain old Woman, and another who was Eliazar Cousin, (who in learning and wisdom surpassed all other Women) and five Children hid themselves in a Cave, wherein Water was reserved to drink, whilst the rest were butchered in this Massacre: the slain were in number nine hundred and sixty, accounting Women and Children. This calamity hapned the fifteenth day of April. In the morning the Romans expecting that the Jews would encounter them, made Bridges from their Mounts to the Walls, and so assaulted the Walls; and seeing none of the Enemies appear, but all the Walls on fire, and a profound silence in every place, they could not conjecture what was the cause of it; and at last they made a cry at once, as though they had been beating the Walls with a Ram, thereby to see if they could make any Enemies come out. The Women in the Vault heard this cry, and coming forth declared to the Romans all that had hapned. The Romans did not easily believe their words, by reason the greatness of the fact seemed incredible; but they endeavoured to quench the fire, and passing forward they came to the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies; yet they did not insult over them as Enemies, but admired that so many should be so obstinately minded to despise death.

Of the Death of the Sicarians that had fled to Alexandria and Thebes.

The Jews after the death of Christ.

After that the Castle of Masfada was thus taken, the General of the Romans leaving a Garrison there, went to Cesarea, because there was no Enemy left in all the Country. But not only Judea was destroyed through the continuance of the War, but many of that Nation, though far distant from it, tasted of its troubles: for it so fell out, that afterwards many Jews perished in Egypt at Alexandria. Those Sicarians who had escaped thither, were not content to be safe and free from danger, but there also they attempted alteration, and to recover their Liberty against the Romans esteeming themselves nothing inferior to them, and that only God was their Lord. And some of the nobler race of the Jews, seeking to withstand this Enterprize, were by these Sicarians slain; which was no sooner done, but they incited the People to revolt.

The better sort of the Jews seeing this, and that they could not repress them without danger, they assembled all the Jews together, and declared to them the temerity of these Sicarians, accusing them as the Authors of all the misery that had befallen the Jews, and that if they thought it sufficient to force them to fly, yet they were not certain of their lives; because the design being known to the Romans, they would punish them for it, though no partakers of their wickedness. Wherefore they admonished the multitude to beware, lest they drew themselves into the same danger, wherein the Sicarians were, and to provide for their own safety by delivering such people to the Romans. The Jews were persuaded by these speeches: and foreseeing the danger that might ensue, they furiously assaulted the Sicarians, and took of them six hundred: and shortly after those who fled into Egypt and Thebes were taken and brought back again, whose hard-hearted obstinacy was so great, that none can without admiration hear of it. For notwithstanding that all torments and tortures, that could be devised, were inflicted upon them, only to force them to confess that Cesar was their Lord; yet not one of them would say so, or make any shew thereof; but all persevered in their former opinion, as though the Body tormented had been dead and not alive. Moreover, the incredible obstinacy of their Children was most to be admired, for not one of them could be constrained to call Cesar Lord. So much did their Resolution overcome the Torments inflicted upon their Bodies.

How the Temple of Onias at Alexandria was shut up.

At That time Lupus was Governour of Alexandria, and with all speed by Letters gave Cesar notice of these troubles. The Emperour, seeing that it was necessary to beware of the Jews, who were naturally inclined to sedition and unquietness, fearing also that they would once again gather themselves together, and cause some to join with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the Temple, which they had in the City Onion, which was built and so named upon this occasion: Onias the Son of Simon, one of the high Priests, being driven out of Jerusalem, when Antiochus King of Syria warred against the Jews, he came to Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Protonotus, who was then also Enemy to Antiochus; affirming, that he would draw into his Country the People of the Jews, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, he requested him to permit him to build a Temple in some place of his Country, wherein he might worship God according to the custom of their Country: for so the Jews would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their Temple at Jerusalem, and be friendly to him; and many of them would flee to him for Religion's sake.

Protonotus agreed so to do, and gave him a piece of ground for that purpose a hundred and fourscore furlongs from Memphis, in that place which was called the Country of Heliopolis: where Onias building a Castle, erected also a Temple, not equal to that that of Jerusalem; but yet with a Tower like that of Jerusalem, with very great stones, H and threecore Cubits long; and he built an Altar after the fashion of that of his Country, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (save only a Caneftick) which had in stead thereof a Lamp to give light, which he caused to be hung before the Altar in a Golden Chain; and he invironed all the Temple with a wall made of Brick, and the Gates he made of Stone; and the King granted to it great revenues of money and ground, to the intent that the Priests might have plenty of all things which they required.

But Onias did not this with a good Conscience, but for that he was at variance with the Jews of Jerusalem, who had forced him to flee: and he perswaded himself that by the building of this Temple, he might withdraw all men from Jerusalem thither; and I of this there was a Prophecy nine hundred and seventy years before, and Isaias had foretold that a certain Jew should build a Temple in Egypt.

Thus that Temple was built; and Lupus having received the Emperors Letters, went to the Temple, and taking away certain gifts from it, he shut it up: and after him Paulinus who succeeded in his stead, left not one gift there (for he threatened the Priests if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any, that came thither to sacrifice, to come near it; but shutting up the Gate thereof, he left no sign of divine Service there; and from the time it was built, till the time it was shut up, were three hundred thirty and three years.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Massacre of the Jews at Cyrene.

THE Boldness of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease, spread over all the Towns about Cyrene. For one Jonathan a Weaver, and a wicked man, having escaped, perswaded many simple people to follow him, and led them into the Wilderness promising to shew them signs and visions, and so he deceived the simplest sort of the Jews: but the noblest of them of Cyrene, understanding his deceit, gave Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Governour of Lybia; who sending some Horse and Foot, easily surprized them being unarmed, and the most part of them were slain; yet some were taken alive and brought to Catullus. But their Leader Jonathan at that time escaped: yet being diligently laid and sought for over all those Countries, he was at last taken; and being brought to Catullus, he sought to delay his own punishment by offering an occasion of Cruelty to Catullus: For he accused the M richest among the Jews to have been his advisers to this matter.

A part of Jonathan's companions were taken and slain, the rest kept captive alive, and brought to Catullus.

Three thousand Jews slain by Catullus.

Catullus was glad of these accusations, and exaggerated them very much with Tragical terms, so that he might have a pretext of War against the Jews, and not content to credit whatsoever was maliciously spoken, he himself instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Jew, whom he had long hated, and his Wife Bernice, he put them first of all to death; and after them all that were rich, who amounted to the number of three thousand. And this he thought he did without controul, because he confiscated their Possessions to Cesar.

Joseph by Catullus persecuted is accused by Jonathan.

And lest any Jew living in any other place, should complain of his injustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off; and perswaded Jonathan, and certain others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trusty and faithful Jews both at Rome and Alexandria: one of those who were thus falsely accused was Joseph, who wrote this History. But this proceeding of Catullus had not such success as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Jonathan and the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the false accusations invented by himself. But Vespasian, suspecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to know the truth: and finding these crimes injuriously imposed upon those men, at the intercession of Titus, he acquitted them, and punished Jonathan according to his desert; who being first whipt, was afterward burnt alive.

Jonathan being first beaten is burnt alive.

Catullus at that time, by reason of the mildness of the Emperour, had nothing said to

A to him: but not long after he fell into a grievous Disease, and was cruelly tormented not only in Body but also in mind. For he was greatly terrified, and continually imagined to see the Ghosts of those whom he had so unjustly slain ready to kill him; so that he cried out, and not able to contain himself, leapt out of his Bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this Disease daily increasing, his Guts and Bowels rotting, and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leaving behind him an evident argument, that the Divine Justice punisheth impious Malefactors.

This is the End of the History, which we promised to set down with all fidelity, for those that are desirous to know the event of the War between the Jews and the Romans. And as for our Style, we leave it to the judgment of the Reader: but touching the Verity of the History, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I do affirm that to be the only scope, which I aimed at in this whole work.

The year of the World, 4038. After the Nativity of Christ, 70. The Conclusion of the seven Books of the Wars of the Jews.

THE FIRST BOOK OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

The Son of MATTHIAS.

Written against APPION, touching the Antiquity

Of the RACE of the JEVVS.

K

The History of the Antiquity containeth the events of five thousand years.

The Cause that moved him to write this Book.

All things among the Greeks are made so, that such things as were done among the Egyptians, Chaldees, and Phenicians, are not happy memory and notable antiquity.

I Suppose, most worthy Epaphroditus, that I have sufficiently testified unto those who shall read the Books which I have written touching the Authentick History of the Jews, that our Nation is most Ancient, and that they had their Original from themselves, and have from the first beginning inhabited that Country, whereof they are possessed at this present. To which effect I gathered out of our sacred Writings, and published in the Greek tongue, a History containing the occurrences of five thousand years. But for that I see there are divers, (who being too much seduced by the scandalous Calumnies and Reports which some, who are ill affected towards us, have published against us) have misbelieved that which I have written of our Antiquity, and labour to approve our Nation to be Modern, because none of the ancient and most renowned Historians among the Grecians have thought our Ancestors worthy to be enrolled in their Writings: For this cause I hold it a part of my duty to write a short Treatise hereupon: both to reprove the malice and impostures of those our Calumniators, and to correct their Ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to know the truth, what the Original of our Nation is. For proof whereof, I will produce no other Testimony but such as from Antiquity hath been judged worthy of credit among the Greeks; laying open before their Eyes, that they, who have slanderously and falsely written against us, are convicted by their own mouths. I will also endeavour to shew the Causes why very few Grecians have made mention of us in their Histories: and moreover, I will make it known, that they who have written concerning us, have been ignorant either really or feignedly of the Truth of those things which they have reported.

First of all therefore, I do not a little marvel at those who in reference to matters of Antiquity suppose that the Truth ought only to be gathered from the Greeks; and that they alone can justly claim the honour and knowledge of faithful writing; whereas they neither vouchsafe either us, or any others the credit of Truth in that we set down; although I am able to prove, that all things have fallen out quite contrary. For which cause it becometh us not to look to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is right, and gather the same by the Effects. For whatsoever is set down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution in a manner but yesterday: I mean the Foundations of Cities, the Inventions of Arts, and the Establishment of Laws, and their Application to write History with some care.

But for the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phenicians, without mentioning us, they themselves confess, the memory of their Writings is most ancient and credible. For all these Nations dwell in such Countries as are not subject to the corruption of Air; and have carefully provided, that none of those things that have been done by them should sleep in obscurity, but be kept in memory in publick Writings of the learned men: whereas innumerable corruptions have crept in among the Greeks, by which the memory of things past is defaced.

Eut

A But always those who have established new estates, have supposed in their own behalf, that whatsoever was the Founder of theirs, he was the first of the world. Yet they have had the knowledge of Letters very late, and have attained the fame with very great difficulty.

For they that speak of the most ancient use of the fame, boast that they received the knowledge thereof from the Phenicians and from Cadmus. Notwithstanding, there is not any one of them that can shew any Record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publick Registers: whereas there is still great doubt and question, whether those Letters were in use during their time, who managed the siege of Troy.

B And indeed, their opinion, who affirm that they were ignorant of the use of those Letters which are at present allowed and accustomed among us, is not to be refuted. For it is most manifest, that there is not any Writing extant among the Greeks, that is more ancient than Homer's Poem, which, as is most manifest, was compos'd since the time of the siege of Troy. And yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his Poem in writing, but that it was compos'd of divers Songs, and only sung by rote; by which means it came to pass, that there are so many contradictions in the same.

And as for those who have undertaken to write Histories among them, I mean Cadmus the Milesian, and Anaxilaus the Argive, and others, They lived but very little time before the passage of the Persians into Greece.

C Furthermore, they who among the Greeks were the first that introduced Philosophy and the knowledge of Celestial and Divine things, namely Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, all of them confels with one accord, that they were instructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees; and they published some few writings, which are supposed to be the most ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly believed also that they were written by them. What reason therefore have the Greeks to be so proud, as if there were none, but themselves only, who knew the affairs of Antiquity, and could exactly write the truth thereof? Or who cannot easily conjecture by their own Writers themselves, that their Writings were founded only upon hearsay and supposition, and that they followed only vain conjectures? Hence it cometh to pass, that in their Books they cavil and reprove one another, and make no conscience to maintain and write contradictions about one and the same thing.

But it may be said, that I should oblige my self to a fruitless labour, if I should go about to inform those who are better experienced than my self, in how many points Helicaeus differeth from Acusilaus touching the Genealogies; in how many places Acusilaus hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath proved that Helicaeus was a liar in the greater part of that which he hath recited. Ephorus hath been reproved by Timaeus; and in general, all have taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timaeus vouchsafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philistus or Gallias, in the Histories of Sicily. Neither do those, who have writ the Histories of Athens and Argos, agree better together.

E What need I reckon up the differences amongst those, who in particular have treated of Cities, or of less matters, since in the Relation of the Persian War, and the exploits performed therein, those of greatest authority are most at odds? Thucydides is accused by some for a liar in divers places, notwithstanding that he seemeth to have written the History of his time most exactly. But the Causes of this discord are divers, as they who shall narrowly pry into them shall find. For my own part, those two which I shall here set down, in my opinion are of greatest weight.

The first, and in my judgement the chiefest is, that amongst the Greeks from the beginning they have not been industrious to keep publick Registers of such matters as happened in any time or place: which hath occasion'd them to erre, and given those a privilege to lye, who afterwards went about to write any thing of such matters as were acted long since. Neither are only other People of Greece to be accused of negligence for not making account of such Registers; but amongst the Athenians also (who glory in the antiquity of their Country, and who are most exercised in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is said, that the most ancient and publick Writings which they have are those Capital Laws which were set down by their Law-maker Draco, who lived but a little time before Pisistratus the Tyrant.

What need we speak of the Arcadians, who vaunt themselves of their Antiquity? for who knows not, that they have learned the use of Letters long after those before mentioned? Whereas therefore there was not any Writing published before that time, which might instruct those that would learn, or reprehend those that disguis'd the Truth: from thence it is, that so many differences have happened amongst Historians.

Thucydides with a mollus. an History of his time. The causes of discord among the Jews.

Another cause of our second error, is that they, who added themselves to compose Histories, did not busie themselves about the inquisition of the Truth (notwithstanding that all of them ordinarily promised no less) but they laboured to shew how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole study thereon, as the only means whereby they hoped to obtain reputation above others.

Some of them therefore applied their Stile to Fables; others by flattering praises thought to curry favour with Kings and Cities. The rest employed their studies to accuse and calumniate the works of other Writers; in hope to build their own reputation upon the ruine of others.

The sign of a true History.

In effect they have followed that course in composing their History, that was every way different from the true nature thereof. For the assured sign of a perfect and true History is, when all men accord in setting down the same thing: whereas these Writers have endeavoured to make men believe that they were the truest of all the rest, because they contradicted them. We ought indeed to grant the Superiority to the Grecians in all that concerneth Eloquence and the Ornament of Language, but not in that which appertaineth to Antiquity or Truth of History, and especially in what concerneth the truth of ancient History, and what hath passed in every Country.

Wherefore as the Egyptians and Babylonians long since used all diligence in writing, because their Priests were heretofore enjoined, who did most curiously treat of all such matters; the same also did the Chaldees amongst the Babylonians, and the Phoenicians also (inhabiting amongst the Greeks) taught them to use Registers both concerning publick K and private affairs, which because all men confess, I will omit to speak off.

I let pass also to recount what care our Nation hath had of this point (no doubt greater than those Nations above mentioned had) charging our High Priests and Prophets to execute this Office, which Custom hath been observed even until this Age, and (if I may presume so far) will be observed in all succeeding Ages, as by my ensuing discourse I will endeavour to make manifest. For our Nation did not only depute this Office to the most virtuous and religious men amongst them in the beginning, and to such as were consecrated to the Service of God; but they also provided to preserve the Line and Descent of Priests from all impurity, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongst us can be a Priest, who is not born of a Woman descended from the same Line. Neither in this case is any respect made either of Riches or Honours: but the party who claimeth the dignity of Priesthood, must by many Witnesses prove his Genealogy, and that he is descended from Priests.

This Custom is not only of force in Judea, but wheresoever else any of our Nation inhabit, as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the Priests in their Marriages have this respect, not to marry with any Woman that is not of their own Line; & they send to Jerusalem the Name and Pedigree of the Woman whom they have married, and all the Testimony hereof which they can deduce from her Ancestors.

Now if War molest our Nation (as often it hath in the time of Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the Great, Quintinus Varus, and especially in this our Age) then M those Priests who survive, make new Genealogies and Pedigrees out of the ancient Registers for those that remain of the Sacerdotal Race. And they marry none that have been Captives, for fear they may have had commerce with strangers. What more evident token can there be of the Priests integrity, than that every Priest during the revolution of two thousand years is registered together with the Names of their Fathers; and if any one do erre or falsify any of the things before said, he is then interdicted from the Altar, and from exercising any Priestly function. So that in the Writings of such men, all things must of necessity be true and as they ought to be; for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any dissonance and disagreement is found in their Writings. For such things as pass in ancient times beyond the memory of men, were only written by N our Prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inspiration from God himself: but other things of latter time are only recorded by those who lived in the Age, wherein the things they write of were done.

The Books amongst us, containing the Histories of all Ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22 Books, to which Books it is impious to deny credit.

Five of these Books were written by Moses, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, with such notable events as happened even from the beginning of the World till his death, which is little less than three thousand years.

After the death of Moses, till the time wherein Artaxerxes lived, who was King of the Persians, and Son to Xerxes; every one of the Prophets of our Nation wrote the History of

A of his time wherein be lived, so that of these mens Writings we have thirteen Books: the four other Books, which make up the Number already mentioned, are known to contain holy Hymns made to the praise of God, and wholesome Precepts for mans life and conversation. All things which from Artaxerxes until our time have hapned, are also set down in writing: yet the Books wherein they are registered, do not deserve so much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certain succession of Prophets in that Age. Moreover, it is evident, that to the former works, we give as great credit as to things which we our selves write; and notwithstanding they have been so long written, yet in all that time no man durst presume either to alter or to blot our any thing therein contained. For all Jews even from their Cradle do believe these B Books to be sacred and divine, and therefore give all credit possible unto them, yet, and would willingly suffer death, rather than do the contrary.

Many Captives of our Nation have been cruelly tormented, and divers ways put to death in open Theaters, only for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed against their Laws, nor violate the writings of their fore-fathers. Now who amongst the Greeks did ever sustain the like? Nay, they are so far from doing it, that none can be found amongst them, who would suffer any loss in his goods or fortunes, to preserve all the writings of their Nation from destruction: and the reason hereof is, because every one esteemeth the verity of their Histories to depend upon the will of the Writer. And this they do also concerning their most ancient Historians; and not without cause: for they every day see men of their own times writing Histories of matters long before past in former ages, wherein neither themselves were present, neither yet do they vouchsafe to credit the writings of such as were then eye-witnesses thereof; yea, some among them have divulged Histories of such things, as of late be set our Nation, when themselves never have been in the place where such matters pass as they write of, nor have lived in any neighbour place, where they might have probable report how matters pass, but only compiling a few broken stories, they most impudently arrogate to their parcht stuff the name of a History.

I myself have composed a most true History of the last War, and of every particular thing there done, as well I might, having been present in all those affairs. For I was Captain of the Galileans amongst our Nation, so long as any resistance could be made against the Romans: and then it so fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and being Prisoner to Titus and Vespasian, they caused me to be an eye-witness of all things that past. First, in bonds and fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the Siege of Jerusalem. So that nothing could then pass whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman Army, I committed to writing all things with all possible diligence. My self did only manage all matters disclosed to the Romans by such as yielded themselves, for that I only did perfectly understand them. Lastly, Being at Rome, and having leisure, after all business was past, I used the help of some Friends (for the skill of the Greek tongue) and so I published a History of all that had hapned in the foresaid War: which History of mine is so true, that I hear not to call Vespasian and Titus the chief Commanders in that War to witnesses for them. I first gave a Copy of that Book to them, and afterwards to many noble Romans, who also were present in the War. I sold also many of them to our own Nation, to such as understood the Greek language, amongst whom were Julius, Archelaus, Herod, a Man of great vertue, and to the most worthy King Agrippa, who all do testify, that my History containeth nothing but truth, and who would not have been silent, if either for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithstanding all this, some ill disposed Persons endeavour to discredit my History, as though they were disputing pro and contra amongst children in schools, never considering that he who promisseth other men a true Relation of things past, must either be privy to them by his own knowledge, as having been present in the affairs, or else have that which he speaketh from other mens mouths, by report of those who know them: both which I have done. For I gathered my other Books of Antiquity out of holy Scripture, being my self a Priest, and skilful in our Law; and the History of our War I have written, my self being an Agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witness of the rest; so that nothing was said or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuse them from impudency and malice, who labour against me to prove my Relation false? Perhaps they alledge, that they have read the Commentaries of Vespasian and Titus, yet for all this, they were not present in any action, repugnant to that, which my History recounteth.

Thus (as I thought necessary) I have made a digression, to shew how they are able to perform their word, who discrediting my History, promise to set down the truth in writing. I have also sufficiently (as I think) demonstrated, that the registering of things is more ancient amongst other Nations, than amongst the Greeks. I will now first of all dispute against those, who labour to prove our Nation of no Antiquity, because (as they say) no Greek Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth proof and testimony of the Antiquity thereof out of other Writers; and so I will shew that their malice, who seek to discredit our Nation. First therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a Country bordering upon the Sea, nor are we placed in merchandise, nor for this cause wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities lye far from the Sea, in a most fertile soil, which we cultivate with all industry; and our whole endeavours are how to get food for our Children, and to keep our country Laws, and to leave to our posterity the knowledge of Piety; in which work we think all our Age ought to be employed. Beside all this, we have a form of living, different from all other Nations. All which concurring together, we had no need to traffick with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phenicians do, who give themselves to bargaining and merchandise only for the covetousness of money. Neither were our Ancestors delighted in thefts and robberies; nor did our Fathers make war upon any Nation, for desire of larger possessions: notwithstanding our Country was furnished with many thousands of strong warlike men. Wherefore the Phenicians failing to the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made known to them; and by them the Egyptians, K and all other Nations, failing upon the Seas, brought Merchandise into Greece. The Medes also and Persians were known to them, after such time as they reigned over Asia, and the Persians brought war even into Europe.

Moreover, the Greeks knew the Thracians, because they were their Neighbours; and the Scythians, by failing to Pontus; and finally, all that were disposed to write, knew all the Nations bordering either upon the Eastern and Western Seas; but such as dwelt far from the Sea-coast, were long time unknown; as also appears in Europe: For neither Thucydides nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, make any mention of Rome; notwithstanding that so long since it was mighty, and made so great Wars: because it was but lately that the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their most exact Writers, L and particularly Ephorus, were so ignorant of the French and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a People only denominated from one City, wherein they inhabited; whereas the whole World now knoweth them to inhabit a vast Country, and a great part of the Western World. Likewise the said Greek Writers relate the manners of the foresaid People to be such, as neither are, nor were ever used among them. And the only cause why they were ignorant of the Truth, was the distance of place; and these Writers would seem to tell something, which others of former time had not spoken of. No marvel therefore though our Nation was unknown, and none of them in their Writings made any mention of us, being both so far from the Sea, and living after a different manner. M

Suppose therefore I should deny the Greeks to be of any antiquity; and to prove my assertion should conclude their Nation to be modern, because our Histories make no mention of them; would they not laugh at this reason, and use the Testimony of their neighbour Nations to prove their Antiquity? I therefore may argue in like manner, and use the Testimony of the Egyptians and Phenicians, whose Record the Greeks cannot deny. For all the Egyptians in general are our Enemies; and among the Phenicians they especially of Tyre; which I cannot justly say of the Chaldees, who having been Princes over our Nation, and because of their affinity and alliance with our Countrymen, have in their Chronicles made mention of the Jews. When I have proved what I now aver, and refuted the slanderous reports against us, I will then also shew who amongst the Greeks have spoken of us, that so the Greeks may also be deprived of this shift and refuge, to excuse their malicious lies falsely forged against our Nation. And first of all I will begin with the Writings of the Egyptians, who, as they well know, do nothing at all favour us. Manethon, an Egyptian born, skilful in the Greek tongue, as by his Works appears (for he writ in Greek) compiling a History of the Customs and Religion of his fore-Fathers, collected (as himself reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy Writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus of falsehood, through ignorance in the affairs of the Egyptians. This Manethon, in his second Book of the Egyptian Customs, saith thus (I will set down his own Words, because I use them as a witness.) We have a King (saith he) named Timæus, in whose Reign God being angry with us, contrary to all expectation, an obscure People took courage, came from the East, and pitching their Tents

A in our Country, over-ran it, and no man resisted them; and committing our Princes to bonds, they burnt our Cities, and destroyed the Temples of our gods, and behaved themselves most cruelly against the Inhabitants, killing many of them, and making Slaves of the rest, with their Wives and Children: Finally, they chose a King of their own, and gave him the Government of our Country; his Name was Saltis, who coming to Memphis made the higher and lower Provinces Tributaries, leaving Garrisons in the strong holds, and fortifying certain places in the East: And weighing with himself that the Assyrians were more potent than he, and would in probability invade his Country, he found out in this Province an ancient City called Saite fit for his purpose, as being situate on the East side of the River Babylus, which by an ancient Divine was called Avaris; he repaired this City, compassed it B with vast Walls, and put a Garrison in it of two hundred thousand armed men. Saltis made this incursion in harvest time, to the intent that he might both pay his Soldiers, and be a terror unto other people, and after he had reigned nineteen years, he died.

After him succeeded another King called Bion, who reigned four and forty years: next to him Apinus, who reigned thirty six years and seven months: then Apobosis, who reigned threecore and one years: and then Landas, who reigned fifty years and one month: after them also reigned Alfis nine and forty years and two months; and these six were the first Kings amongst them, ever destroying and warring upon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguish their race. This Nation was called Hiefos, which signifieth Kings shepherds: For Hie in the sacred Tongue, signifieth a King, and Sos C a Shepherd or shepherds, according to the common speech, and Hiefos is a compound word. Some say these People were Arabians: but in other Copies I find that Hiefos is not interpreted Kings shepherds, but shepherds that were Captives: For Hie, and Hac also when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue signify a Captive; and this latter exposition seemeth to me to be the truest, for it is more agreeable with the History. Wherefore Manethon reporteth these foresaid Kings and Shepherds to have ruled Egypt five hundred and eleven years: and after these the King of Thebes, and the King of the Refuge of Egypt, uniting their forces, invaded the said Shepherds, had great and long Wars with them, and that the said Shepherds were overcome by the King Alisragumthosis; that then they lost all Egypt which had been in their power, & that they D were thut up in a place called Avaris containing ten thousand acres of ground, which, as Manethon reporteth, these Shepherds environed round about with a huge Wall, to the end that their whole Provision might be within their Fortifications, and the prey, which they got, in a condition to be defended. That Themosis Son of the said Alisragumthosis endeavoured by force to subdue them, and for this cause besieged them with four hundred and 80000 men: That at last despairing to take them by force, he capitulated with them that they should safely depart out of Egypt whither they would; and that they upon these Conditions together with all their Families and Goods, and Cattel, departed out of Egypt into the Wilderness, and so into Syria, being in number two hundred and forty thousand, and that fearing the puissance of the Assyrians, E who at that time reigned in Asia, they builded a City in the Country now called Judea, which they made so large, that it might receive them all, and this City they called Jerusalem. Further, the said Manethon in another Book of the Egyptian Affairs saith, That in the holy Writings, he findeth the foresaid Shepherds called Captives, wherein he saith true. For our Ancestors were wont to feed cattel, and so leading a pastoral life, were called Shepherds, neither are they unjustly called Captives: For our fore-Father Joseph told the King of Egypt that he was a Captive; and long time after called his Brethren into Egypt by the Kings Command; but we will hereafter examin this point more strictly: I will now cite the Testimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befel, who saith F as followeth.

After that the Nation of Shepherds were departed out of Egypt unto Jerusalem, King Themosis who drave them out of the Land, reigned twenty five years and four months; and then died: And his Son Ghebron succeeded him, who reigned thirtie years, and after him Amenophis twenty years and seven months, next, his Sister Amesses one and twenty years and nine months, then reigned Mephios twelve years and nine months, and Mephianuthis twenty five years and ten months, Themosis nine years and eight months, Amenophis thirty years and ten months, Oras thirty six years and five months, after him his Daughter Achemcheres, twelve years and one month, and the Brother of Rabotis nine years, Achemcheres twelve years and five months, another Achemcheres G twelve years and three months, Armais four years and one month, Armessis one year and four months, Armesejmanus threecore and six years and two months, Amenophis nineteen nineteen years and six months. Moreover, that Sethosis having prepar'd a huge Army H both of foot and horse, and a Navy at Sea, left the Government of Egypt unto his Brother Armais, investing him with sovereign Authority, only he forbade him to wear the Crown, and to oppress the Queen who was Mother to his Children, commanding him also to abstain from his Concubines. After which Sethosis himself went to Cyprus and Phœnicia against the Affrians and Medes, and subdued them, partly by the sword, partly by the fear of his power and greatness: and being transported with his success, he advanced against the Eastern Country, and destroyed with fire and sword the Cities and Provinces of that place: and spending much time in these Wars, his brother Armais whom he left in Egypt, did without fear commit all that he forbade him to do: for he oppressed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the rest of the Kings Concubines, and I being counselled by his friends he put a Crown upon his head, and rebelled against his Brother: of which he who was then Chief of the Egyptians holy Customs, sent Letters unto Sethosis, containing all that had happened, and how Armais had rebelled against him: That Sethosis returning to Pelusia, recovered his own Kingdom, and by his name it was called Egypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethosis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais, Danauus.

Thus far Manethon; from whom it is evident by computation of the forefaid times, that our Nation was delivered out of Egypt three hundred ninety and three years before Danauus, and inhabited this Country of Judea so long before Danauus came unto Argos: notwithstanding the Inhabitants of Argos boast their City is most ancient. K Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for us out of the Egyptian letters: first, That we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their Country again; and that so long ago, as it was almost a thousand years before the Trojan Wars. Touching those things which Manethon professeth himself to have gathered elsewhere than out of the Writings of the Egyptians, who wrote down whatever was reported, I will shew, with how little reason they are alleaged. For I will once again leave these, and refer to the testimony of the Phœnicians concerning our Nation. The Tyrians therefore have Chronicles of very great Antiquity, which they have kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath been done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory.

Jerusalem and Solomon.

Amongst these Records it is written, That King Solomon built a Temple at Jerusalem, a hundred forty three years and eight months before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they have requir'd the building of our Temple; for Hircanus King of the Tyrians was our King Solomon's friend, obliged to him for his fathers sake, who for this cause also of his own liberality gave Solomon a hundred and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, cut down the noble Wood called Libanus, and bestowed upon him, to make the roof of the Temple: for which bounty Solomon returned him many great Presents, and among the rest a Country of Galilee named Zabulon: But Solomon's Widow was the chief cause of this Kings Friendship towards him. For they sent Problems one to the other to be answered, and Solomon in his Answers appeared most witty, M as also he did in many things else; and even until this day, many of the Epistles sent one to another are kept among the Tyrians. But not depending wholly upon the Authority of the Tyrians, I will prove by the Testimony of Dius (a man who by common consent hath faithfully written the Phœnician History) who writeth as followeth.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his son reigned in his stead, who encreased the number of his Eastern Cities, and enlarged Jerusalem; he also joyned the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, situate in an Island, unto it (filling up the water with Earth) and adorned it with gold.

After this ascending into Libanus, he cut down the Wood to build Temples; and the N King of Jerusalem named Solomon sent unto him certain Riddles to be expounded, and he again the like unto him, covenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers Riddles, should pay unto the other a sum of money, and that Hircanus, confessing he could not expound Solomon's Riddles, did pay unto him much money.

Lastly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the said Riddles, and writ more unto Solomon, which if Solomon could not interpret, he should pay unto Hircanus a sum of money; and this testimony Dius beareth us concerning the forefaid matter.

The testimony of Abdemonus
the Egyptian.

But I will now recount the words of Menander an Ephesian, who requir'd the Aets of all Kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true History out of the O Writings of every Country. This man writing of the Tyrian Kings, and coming to

Hircanus,

A Hircanus, faith thus of him; Abibalus dying there succeeded in the Kingdom his Son Hircanus, who lived 34 years: and this King with a Rampire conveyed Euricholus, and erected there a Pillar of Gold in Jupiter's Temple, and went into the Woods, and cut down the Cedars of Libanus to make coverings for the Temples; with which (pulling down the old) he erected new, and dedicated Temples to Hercules and Astartus; But that to Hercules in the Month of Peritius, and the other to Astartus, when he with an Army went against the Tyrians, who paid him no tribute, and when he had subdued them, he returned again.

The Genealogy
of King
Hircanus.

At this time lived Abdemonus a servant unto the King, whose business it was to expound the parables, which King Solomon of Jerusalem sent unto King Hircanus: and how long it was from this Kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hircanus, his Son Belesartus succeeded him, lived forty and three years, and reigned seven: after him his Son Abdastartus, who lived twenty years, and reigned nine: but this King was treacherously slain by the four Sons of his Nurse, the eldest of which reigned twelve years. Next succeeded Astartus the Son of Belesartus, who lived fifty and four years, and reigned twelve: after him his Brother Astartus, who lived fifty and four years, and Governed nine: then he was slain of his brother Phellates, who reigned eight months, and lived fifty years, and was slain by a Priest of Astarta named Abibalus, who lived three score and eight, and reigned thirty two years: he was succeeded by his Son Badazorus, who lived forty five years, and reigned six years: to him succeeded his Son Mettinus, who lived thirty two years, and reigned nine: After him Pigmation who lived fifty six years, and reigned forty: in the seventh year of whose reign, his Sister Dido built a City in Africa, and named it Carthage: so that from the time of King Hircanus unto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred fifty five years, and two Months: and for as much as the Temple of Jerusalem was built in the twelfth year of Hircanus his reign, the computation of the time since that year until the building of Carthage, is a hundred forty three years and eight Months. What need we more besides this testimony of the Phœnicians? The truth is now sufficiently made manifest: for our Ancestors must needs have come into this Country we inhabit before such time as they built a Temple in it, as I have also prov'd in my Books of Antiquity, collected out of our Holy Scripture.

I will now speak of that which the Chaldees writ of us in their Histories, which do much agree in all other Matters with those of our Nation. And first let Berosus be my witness, who was a Chaldean born, a man famous and known unto all that love learning; for he in the Greek tongue writ Astronomy, and the Philosophy of the Chaldeans, Berosus imitating the most ancient Histories writeth of the Deluge, & how mankind was therein extinguished, and he in all things imitateth Moses. He also speaketh of the Ark wherein our forefather was preserved, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the Mountains in Armenia: after this he professeth the Genealogy of all that reigned from Noe, until Nabulassar King of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He likewise setteth down how long every one reigned, and in prosecuting the deeds of this King, he recounteth how he sent his Son Nabuchodonosor into Egypt, & our Country with great power, who finding them in rebellion subdued them, and burnt the Temple at Jerusalem, and so departed, carrying with him all our Nation into Babylon: whereupon our City was desolate seventy years, until the reign of Cyrus King of the Persians. Moreover he affirmeth, that this Babylonian kept in subjection Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, exacting more of them than ever any King of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Berosus must needs be to this effect: Nabulassar his Father hearing that his Substitute in Egypt, Calafyria, and Phœnicia had rebelled, he himself not being able to take such pains, committed his Affairs unto his Son Nabuchodonosor, gave him a part of his Army (for that he was in the flower of his age) and sent him against him: Nabuchodonosor fighting with the said Substitute, overthrew him, and subdued the Country which of old belonged unto them, and at the same time his Father Nabulassar fell sick in Babylon, and died, having Reigned twenty nine years. But Nabuchodonosor long after understanding his Fathers death, disposed of Egypt and other Provinces as he thought good, and taking the Captives of Judea, Phœnicia, and the Syrians that lived in Egypt, he committed them to certain of his friends, to be brought after with his Carriages and Army to Babylon: and so he himself, accompanied with a very few took his journey to Babylon, through the Desert: being arriv'd he found the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobility reserved the Kingdom for him: he was made King, and commanded Houfes to be built for the Captives that were coming in the moft convenient places of Babylon, and with the fpoil he beautified the Temple of Belus and other places moft richly, and built a new City without the Wall of the old: and providing left hereafter the Enemies might turn the River, and to have access unto the City, he invironed the inner City with three feveral Walls, and the outmoft City likewife, the Walls whereof were made of Brick, but the Walls of the inner City were of Brick and Bitumen: this done, he builded moft fumptuous Gates which might have become Temples: and moreover, near unto his Fathers Palace he builded another far greater and more costly than they; the beauty and coflinefs whereof were hard, and perhaps tedious, to exprefs: Yet this we will fay, and it is confiderable, that this rich and incredibly beautiful Palace was builded in fifteen days: in it he erected Rocks of Stone like Mountains beset with all forts of Treasures: he made a famous Mount, and fupported it with Pillars: for his Wife, having been brought up in the Country of the Medes, defired to have a profpect into the fields and Mountains according to their way.

Nabuchodonosor for builded a Palace.

Semiramis did not build Babylon.

This he relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his Book of the affairs of the Chaldeans, wherein he reproveth the Greek Writers, who fallily affirm that Semiramis the Assyrian Queen built Babylon, and that they fallily report those wonderful works about Babylon to have been by her made and finished. We must needs think, that the Chaldean History is true, seeing it agreeth with that of the Phoenicians, which Berosus writ of the King of Babylon, who fubverted both Phenicia and K all Syria: with them also accordeth Philoftratus in his History of the siege of Tyria; and Megasthenes also in his fourth Book of the affairs of India; where he laboureth to prove, that the said King excelled Hercules in strength and valour, affirming that he fubdued the greateft part of Africa and Spain, and that the Temple of Jerusalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again re-edified by Cyrus; and we may prove it out of Berosus, who in his third book faith as followeth: Nabuchodonosor, having begun the third Wall, fell sick and died, when he had reigned forty three years, and his Son Evelmerodachus fucceeded him, who for his iniquity and licentiousness was treacherously slain by his Sisters Husband, named Nirgiffiffor, after he had reigned two years. He being dead, the Traytor Nirgiffiffor usurped the Kingdom, and reigned four years, L whose Son then a child was made King, called by name Laborefardachus, and he reigned nine months: who for corruptness of his manners was slain by his own Friends: after whose death they who flew him consulting together made one Nabonidus, a Babylonian, King. At this time the Walls of Brick and Bitumen about the River of Babylon were built. In the eighth year of this Kings reign Cyrus, coming with an Army out of Persia, conquered all Asia, and came with his Forces against Babylon; but the King of Babylon having notice of his coming, levied an Army, advanc'd against him, and gave him Battel: but being overcome, he with a very few of his men was forced to flye into Borsippa. Cyrus now befieged Babylon, and purposed to destroy the outward Walls thereof: but finding them too strong and impenetrable, he returned to Borsippa to besiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon, who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the event of War, yielded himself unto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him, and gave him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: so Nabonidus led the rest of his life in that Province. This History agreeth with ours: for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonosor in the eighteenth year of his reign destroyed our Temple, and that it so remained threecore and ten years: also that in the second year of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid again, and was finished and re-edified in the second year of King Darius's reign. This done, I will also relate the Histories of the Phoenicians, to re-inforce what we say: for they make their computation after this manner. In the reign of King Ithobalus Nabuchodonosor befieged Tyre thirteen years, after whom Baal reigned ten years, next him Judges were appointed, towit, they that follow Enbalus the Son of Balachus judged two Months, Chelbi the Son of Abdus ten Months: Abarus the High-Priest three Months: Mytoma and Gerasus Sons of Abdulus judged fix years: after whom Balatorus reigned one year: and after his death the Tyrians called Marbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he reigned four years: and he then dying, they sent also to Babylon for his Brother Iromus, who reigned twenty years, in whose reign Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire: so that this whole time is fifty four years and three Months: for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and in the fourteenth year of King Iromus his reign Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia.

The King of Babylon excelled Hercules in strength and noble valourous deeds.

The Walls of Babylon built of brick and bitumen.

Cyrus expelled Nabonidus from Babylon.

The testimony of the Phoenicians touching the Jews Antiquity.

Where-

A Wherefore both the Chaldean and Tyrian Historiographers agree with us concerning our Temple: So that the Antiquity of our Nation above mentioned is now made manifest, and without all controverfie. And that which is already alledged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not purpously contentious: To fatisfie, therefore, such as believe the Writings of other Nations of little or no Authority, and will give credit to nothing but what is transmitted from the Greeks, I shall produce Testimony from such of them as have been acquainted, and writ of our Laws.

Pythagoras, a Samian born (a person of great Antiquity and Reputation above the rest of the Philosophers for Wisdom and Holiness of Life) was not only conversant in our Laws, but observed them in many things, as is testified particularly by Hermippus B an eminent and exact Historian, who in his first Book of Pythagoras gives us an account, That a Crotonian called Galkipon (a great friend of Pythagoras) being dead, his Soul accompanied Pythagoras night and day, inculcating and pursuing him with Instructions, and among the rest, That he would be careful how he passed by a place where his Afs had stumbled: That he would drink none but pure Water, and that he would be cautious of speaking ill of any Body, following therein the Customes of the Greeks and Thracians: and what that Author said is most true, for it is certain, a great part of his Philosophy was deduc'd from the Laws of the Jews.

Our Nation in times past was well known to divers Cities, so that many of them do now observe our Customs, and others esteem them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus C doth witness in his Book intituled De Legibus: for he faith that the Tyrian Laws forbid to swear by any strange God, and amongst these prohibited Oaths, he reckoneth the Oath called Corban, which is used only amongst the Jews, and in our Language significth the Gift of God.

Herodotus of Halicarnassus knew our Nation also, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, he faith thus in his second Book: The Colchians, Egyptians and *Ethiopi*ans only amongst all other Nations did use Circumcision of old: for Jews Circumcise. Herodotus touching the Phoenicians and Syrians living in Palestina do confesse themselves to have learned this Custom from the Egyptians; and the Syrians living near unto Thermodontes and the River Parthenius, and their Neighbours the Macronians, are reported to have learnt it of the Colchians: and these are they only that use Circumcision, and they do like unto the Egyptians; but I am not able to say whether the Egyptians or *Ethiopi*ans learnt it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina did use Circumcision, and it is manifest, that of all the Inhabitants of Palestina the Jews only use it, which he knowing writeth so of them.

Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our Nation, and affirmeth that our Country-men warred under Xerxes against the Greeks, and enumerating the Nations which followed him, at last he speakes thus of ours,

E A People strange followed this Royal throng,
Their Language was th unknown Phoenician tongue:
In th' hills of Solymus their dwelling was,
Near to a Lake for greatness which did pass:
Their heads were shav'd, and for their heads attire,
They wore an Horse-skin dried at the fire.

It is evident (as I think) that he speaketh of the Jews: for the Mountains of Solymus are in our Country, and that Lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greateft and vastest of all Lakes that are in Syria; And that the Jews were not known only of the Greeks, F but also admired of them is easie to prove not out of the obscurest Writers, but by the Testimony of their wisest Philosophers: For Clearchus, disciple unto Aristotle, and the best amongst all the Peripatetics, in his first Book De somno, brings in a certain Dialogue his Master Aristotle discoursing of a Jew that he knew, in this manner.

It would be too long to entertain you about the whole Nation, I shall content my self to give you a hint only of this mans admirable wisdom. Hyperclides told him, He could not do them a greater favour. I will begin then (said Aristotle) according to the Rules of Rhetorick with what relates to his Nation. He was born a Jew in the lower Syria, whose present Inhabitants are descended from the Philosophers of the Indians, who among them are called Calani, but among the Syrians, Jews, as living in Jewry, whose principal City is called Jerusalem, and very hard to be pronounced. This man entertained many strangers, who came from the higher Country down unto the Sea-Coast, was very eloquent and courageous.

As

As I was travelling one time with some of my Disciples in Asia, this person made us a visit, and in his Conference with us we found that much was to be learned by his Conversation.

Thus far Ariftole, Glearchus, recounting moreover at large his admirable abstinence and chastity: Of whom they that are desirous to know more, are recommended to Glearchus; for I am loth to write any thing superfluous. So now it is evident how Glearchus, by the way of digression speaking of another matter, maketh mention of us. But Hecateus Abderita a Philosopher, and one brought up with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomeus Lagus, did not only briefly make mention of us, but also writ a whole Book of our Nation the Jews, out of which I will briefly note some few points that occur; but first I will shew of what Antiquity he is: For he recordeth the time when Ptolomeus near unto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which happened the eleventh year after Alexanders death, in the hundred and seventeenth Olympiad, as Cassor writeth: who speaking of this Olympiad saith, That in this time Ptolomeus Lagus overcame Demetrius the son of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliorectes: and all men confess, that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad: So that it is evident that at the time wherein Alexander lived, our Nation flourished.

And Hecateus saith, That after that battel fought at Gaza, Ptolomeus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the Clemency of Ptolomeus, followed him into Egypt, and conversed with him: amongst the which one was called Ezekias, the Jews high Priest, a man about threescore and six years old, and of chief notice and dignity of all his Nation, and most prudent and eloquent, one also who in all affairs had more experience than any man else. He likewise reporteth, That the number of the Jews Priests, who received their tithes, and rule all in general, is a thousand and five hundred or thereabout.

And again making mention of the same Ezekias, he saith, This man being in reputation and honour, and conversing with us, by the help of some about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ, and shewed unto us the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his conversation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecateus sheweth what manner of People we are, and how religious in our Laws, and how that we will rather endure all torments and death it self, than violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing so to do: adding moreover, That being much hated of our neighbours, and having suffered all Contumelies both at the hands of the Persian Kings, and their Officers, yet we could not be forced to change our Opinions, but that we are continually exercised to give a reason thereof. He also recordeth an example of the constancy of our mindes: For Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purposing to re-edifie the Temple of Bell, commanded all his Souldiers to carry Timber to the building thereof; and the Jews only disobeying his command, endured many stripes and torments, till such time as the King freed them from it: And they (saith he) returning to their own Country, destroyed all the Temples and Altars that they found there, and of some of them were by the Officers therefore punished, others escaped free: Adding, That we may justly be admired for these things, and that our Nation is exceeding populous. He sheweth likewise that many of us were carried Captives into Babylon, and there served the Persians. And that many more were dispersed into Egypt after Alexanders death for a tumult began in Syria.

He also recordeth the greatness of our Country, and the fertility thereof. They inhabit (saith he) a Country that hath almost thirty hundred thousand acres of most fertile ground; (for Syria is of this largeness) and that in times past we inhabited a large and very great City, which was very populous; He speaketh also of the building of our Temple in this manner: The Jews have many other Towns and Villages in every Province; but they have N one most strong City, the compass of whose Walls is fifty furlongs, and in it inhabit a hundred and fifty thousand men; and this City they called Jerusalem; in the midst thereof is a building of stone with four Porches a hundred cubits about, it hath also double Gates, wherein is a four-squared Altar made of unburnt stones joyned together; and it is twenty cubits square every way, and ten cubits high; and about it is a most huge Building, wherein is an Altar and a Candlestick both of gold, weighing two Talents; and there is kept a continual Light night and day which never goeth forth: But in it there is no Image, nor Grove about it, as about other Temples. It is inhabited by the Priests, who spend their time there in great continence both night and day, abstaining from all manner of Wine.

The same Author gives an account of an action performed by one of our Nation, who O was a Souldier under some of Alexanders successors; and the Authors words are these,

As

A As I went (saith he) to the Red Sea, a certain Jew, one of the Horsemen that conducted us, named Mosollamus, a courageous man, and one who excelled all Archers else, both Greeks and other Nations: This Jew (every one hastening on forward of his journey, and being willed by a Soothsayer to stand) asked, for what cause the multitude stayed and went not forward: Presently the Soothsayer shewed him a Bird, which he diligently viewed, and told the Jew that if that Bird did stand still in the place, then it was expedient for them to stand, and if the Bird did mount up and flie, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wisdom to retire. The Jew hereat was silent, yet drawing his Bow he shot an arrow and killed the Bird; whereas the Soothsayer and certain others were offended, and cursed him. But he taking the unhappy Bird in his hand B said unto them; Are ye so mad as to think that this Bird, not having the foresight to preserve her self from this death, is able to direct us in the success of our journey? Had this Bird fore-known future events, she would have eschewed this place for dread that Mosollamus a Jew should have stricken her with an arrow. But we will now leave the testimony of Hecateus, for every one that list may read his Book, and there understand it more at large.

I will not omit the Testimony of Agatarchides, a man of no evil in his own opinion, yet indeed one who hath used detraction to our Nation. This man speaking of Syria, of the Jews, now leaving her husband Demetrius, she came into Syria, and how Selucus would not marry her as he hoped (who having an Army at Babylon, warred against Antioch, and had taken the City) and that she fled into Selucia, whereas she might have made a C self easier escape by water (but was forewarned to the contrary in a sleep) and that she was there taken and died, &c. Agatarchides, having used this Preface, and inveighed against Syrian superstition, useth an Example of our Nation on this manner: The People that are called Jews, inhabit a most strong City, which they call Jerusalem; these People are wont to rest upon the seventh day, and do neither bear Arms, nor till their Grounds, nor any other business on that day, but their custom is to remain in their Temple, and there with stretched out armes continue in prayer till night. And upon a time, they persevering in this foolery, whilst they should have defended their City, Ptolomeus Lagus entered it with a great Army, and greatly tyrannized over them, intrusting them by experience, that the solemnity appointed by their Law, was prejudicial unto them. Such like Churches as this did teach D them and all Nations else to sit unto dreams, which their Law teacheth, neither considering that human policy cannot prevail against that which must necessarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of us to be ridiculous; but they that weigh it with indifference, shall perceive that it is greater commendation to our Nation, who rather suffer their Country and safety to be lost and endangered, than to violate the Laws of God.

I think I am thus able to shew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew us not, but for envy. For Jerom writ a Book of the Successors in the same time that Hecateus lived, and being a friend to King Antigonus, and President of Syria, never mentioneth us in all his History; notwithstanding he was brought up almost in our Country; whereas Hecateus writ an entire Book of us; so E different are the minds of men: for one of them thought our Nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindered from speaking the truth: yet the Histories of the Chaldeans, Egyptians and Phenicians, may suffice to prove our Antiquity, together with the Greek Writers: for besides those before mentioned, Theophrastus also, Theodorus, Manasseus, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemenes, Conon, Egyption, and many others no doubt (for I have not perused all mens Books) have manifestly testified of us. For many of the fore said men were blinded with errors, as not having read our holy Scriptures; yet they all joyntly testify our Antiquity, for which I now alledge them. Truly Demetrius Phalerus, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reason it is they should be born wial: for they were not so skilful F as to teach our Writings with so much curiosity.

Being come thus far, it resteth that I now present one point more, whereof I made mention in the beginning of this Book, to wit, that I declare the detractions and slanderous reports of divers concerning our Nation to be false and void of truth; and I will use the Testimony of those Writers who record, that the lying Historiographers, at such time as they committed to writing the fore said detractions, did also even against themselves register such like slanders, as they did against us. And I doubt not but that all those, who are conversant in Histories, can testify, that the like hath been done by most Writers upon private hatred, or such like respects: For some of the Gentiles have attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the most renowned Cities, and to defame G the manners of their Inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Poliocrates to Lacedaemon; and the Author that writ Tripolitimum (for it was not Theopompus as some suppose) suppose) used the City Thebes very hardly. And Timeus in his Histories of the fore-said places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the most excellent that are, in something or other; some for envy and malice, others, that their fond babling may make them famous, and so indeed it doth among fools, that are known to have no sound judgment, but wise men will condemn their malice.

The cause of malice between the Egyptians and Jews.

To be short, this is the cause of so many slanderous reports forged against our Nation:
 to gratify the Egyptians: have attempted to deprave the truth, and so have neither reported the Circumstances concerning our Ancestors coming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they have had many causes of malice and envy urging them hereto: And chiefly for that our Progenitors in their Country waxed mighty, I and so departing to their own Country were made happy and fortunate.

The Egyptians Idolatry.

Secondly, the diversity of our two Religions made great discord and variance amongst us, our Religion so far excelling theirs in piety, as the divine Essence GOD excelleth unreasonable Creatures: (for they commonly worship such brut beasts for gods, and every one worshippeth divers kinds.) vain and foolish men, who from the beginning have been accustomed to such foolish opinions, as would not permit them to imitate us in our divine Religion, and conformable to Reason: and yet seeing many favour and follow our Religion, they were hereby incited to such hatred, that to derogate from us, they feared not to falsify their own ancient Records, not considering that in so doing they were led through a blind passion, to write against themselves. Moreover, I will prove K I have spoken to be true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Historiographer) we have produced as a witness of our Antiquity.

Manethon an Egyptian His-
 toriographer.

Manethon therefore (who confesseth himself to have gathered the Egyptian History out of their holy Writings) having by way of Preface recounted how our Predecessors came into Egypt with many thousands, and there conquered the Inhabitants, afterward confesseth, that losing all their Possessions in Egypt, they got the Country which is now called Jury, and in it builded a City named Jerusalem, and a Temple; and thus far he followeth ancient Writers. And then usurping to himself authority to lye, pro-veyeth that he will insert into his History certain reports divulged amongst the common People, he reports things of the Jews altogether incredible, intending to mix with our Nation the Lepers of the Egyptians, and other sick people of other Countries, who (as he saith) being abominable to the Egyptians, fled to us; affirming also that they had a King named Amenophis, which being a feigned name, he durst not presume to speak determinately of the time of his Reign; though he speaketh exactly of the Reign of all other Kings. Hereupon also he adds certain Fables, forgetting himself that he reported the Shepherds departure out of Egypt to Jerusalem, to have been almost five hundred and eighteen years before his time: For it was in the fourth year of the reign of Thermosis, when they departed out of Egypt, and his Successors continued in the Government three hundred and ninety three years, till the time of the two Brethren Seshon and Hermens, the first of which was called Egyptian, the other Danais, who succeeded Sethon, and reigned alone fifty nine years, after whom his eldest Son Ramfies reigned three score and six years. Having therefore confessed our Ancestors to have departed out of Egypt so many years before; at length he addeth Amenophis to the number of their Kings. He tells us that the said Prince (as Orus one of his Predecessors had done before) had an ardent desire to have a sight of the Gods, and that a Priest of their Law named Amenophis (as he was) and Son of Papius, whose wisdom in prediction was so admirable, that he seem'd to be inspir'd, told him his desire should be accomplished, if he would drive out of his Kingdom all such as were Leprous, and any other way infected. The King according to his directions assembled N of them to the number of Eighty thousand, and sent them with other Egyptians to work in the Quarries on the East-side of the Nile, among whom there were certain Priests who were likewise infected.

Manethon adds, That the Priest Amenophis apprehending lest the Gods should punish him for having given the King that counsel, & the King for having followed it so strictly, and finding by divination that to recompence the sufferings of those poor People, they would conquer and govern in Egypt for the space of thirteen years, he was afraid to tell it to the King himself, but having committed his Revelation to writing, he kill'd himself to the great terror of the King.

This done, he speaks as followeth: So the King being requested for their quietness and defence to assign them a City to inhabit, appointed unto them a desolate place called Avaris, which had been the Shepherds City (this City the ancient Divines call Triphon)

A Triphon) but they, having got the possession of this place fit for Rebellion, made choice of one of the Priests of Helipolis to be their Captain, whose name was Osarphis, and bound themselves with an Oath to obey him in all things: and he presently made a Law, That they should neither worship the Gods of the Egyptians, nor abstain from those Beasts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they should marry with none but such as they judged to be their Friends, and of their own persuasion.

Osarphis
 Captain of Avaris.

Having ordained this and many things else contrary to the Religion of the Egyptians, he commanded them to build a Wall about the City, to fortify it well, and prepare to make War upon King Amenophis. Having taken some others of the Priesthood into his Cabal, they sent Ambassadors to Jerusalem to the Shepherds, which were driven out of Egypt by King Themuis, to inform them of what had passed, and request them to a Confederacy, and that uniting their forces, they might jointly make War upon Egypt. He promised to receive them into Avaris (which had been of old the possession of their Ancestors) and supply them with what ever was necessary, and assured them their opportunity was such, that without great difficulty they might conquer that Kingdom. That the Inhabitants of Jerusalem embracing the motion, rais'd an Army, and advanced to Avaris with 200000 men.

The war of the banished Against the Egyptians.

That Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their invasion, and remembering what Amenophis the Son of the Priest Papius had left in writing, was in great fear, and presently assembling together the people of Egypt, and consulting with the Princes of his Country, he sent away all the holy Beasts, and all that the Priests esteem'd, giving them especial charge to hide their Idols: He put his Son Sethon (who also by his Father Ramfies was called Rhamesses) and but five years old, into the custody of a Friend of his; and then with three hundred thousand fighting men, he marched against his Enemies, but would not fight with them, lest he should fight against the pleasure of the Gods; and so he retired himself to Memphis, and taking Apis and the rest of the Egyptian Gods along with him, he, and his Troops of Egyptians took Ship, and fled into Ethiopia. That the King of Ethiopia having a great honour for him, received him very nobly, assigning his People Towns and Villages for their residence and subsistence during their thirteen years exile, keeping constant Guards upon his Frontiers, for the security of Amenophis. That in the mean time the Auxiliaries from Jerusalem did much more mischief, than those who had invited them. That there was nothing of cruelty or impiety that they scrupled or omitted. That not contenting themselves with the demolishment and burning of Towns, they added sacrileg to their sins, brake their Idols in pieces, slew their consecrated Cattel, forced the Priests and Prophets to kill their own Beasts, and drave them naked out of their Country when they had done
 To which he adds, That they had for their Law-giver a Priest of Helipolis call'd Osar phis, from Oqiris, which was the God that was worshipped in that City, and that that Priest having chang'd his Religion, chang'd likewise his Name, and called himself
Moses.

The Egyptian
 King fled into Ethiopia, and was by the Egyptian king courteously entertained.

Osarphis was afterwards
 call'd Moses.

E Thus the Egyptians report of the Jews, and many things else, which for brevity sake I omit. Manethon further writeth, that afterward Amenophis the King came with a great power out of Ethiopia, and his Son Ramfies with him accompanied with a great Army; and that joyning Barrel with the Shepherds and polluted persons, he gave them an overthrow, and pursued them unto the Borders of Syria. And this is Manethon's report; but so far as he writeth old wives tales, dotages, and lies, I will by manifest reason convince him, First distinguishing that whereof I am to speak hereafter. He of his own accord granteth and confesseth, that our Ancestors at first were not Egyptians, but Strangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the Country, and again departed from thence. I will now out of his own writings endeavour to shew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with us, and that Moses, who indeed was our Conductor out of Egypt, and lived many ages before, was no Leper.

Manethon's
 lies are con-
 futed.

He therefore first of all setteth down a ridiculous cause of this forementioned fiction, which was, that King Amenophis was desirous to see the Gods: What Gods do you think? He could already see the Ox, the Goat, the Crocodile, and the Munky, but the God of Heaven how could he see? And why had Amenophis this desire? Forsooth because a certain King one of his Predecessors had seen them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the sight of them, need no new device to accomplish his desire: But perhaps the foresaid Prophet was a Man of great wisdom, by whom the King had confidence to attain his desire; if so he had been, how chance it that he was so unwise not to perceive, that it was an impossible thing to fatisfy

tisfie the Kings desire? for that which he promised was not bought to pass. Or what reason moved him to think that the Gods were invincible, because of the Leprosie and infirmity of the people? The Gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it possible that at one instant so many thousand Lepers and infirm persons should be gathered together? or wherein did not the King obey the Prophet? He commanded that the Lepers and infirm persons should be exiled the Country, and the King did not banish them the Country, but sent them to hew Stones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purposed to cleanse the Country from Lepers. Lastly, he saith, that the Prophet foreseeing that Egypt was to suffer, and fearing the wrath of the Gods, killed himself, and left his mind in a Book written unto the King. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at first foresee his own death, and so oppose himself to the Kings desire to see the Gods? Or wherefore did he fear such calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great misery hanged over his head, which might worthily cause him to kill himself to prevent it? But let us hear that which followeth, more forthly than all the rest.

Manethon's words repeated.

The King (saith he) hearing this, and stricken with fear, did not however expel those Lepers he ought to have exiled, but at their request gave them (as he saith) a City, wherein before time the Shepherds did inhabit, called Avaris; whereinto being come, they made a Priest of Helioptis their Prince, who devised Laws for them: commanding them neither to adore the Gods, nor to abstain from offering violence to such beasts as amongst the Egyptians are sacred, but that they should kill and spoil all things, that they should marry with none but such as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep those Laws, and that they fortified Avaris to fight against the King. Adding moreover, that he sent to Jerusalem for help, promising to yield Avaris unto them, being a place sometime possessed by their Ancestors, and that they from that place leading their Forces, might easily subdue all Egypt: he then saith, that the Egyptian King Amenophis came against them with 300000; and yet, for that he would not strive against the decree of the Gods, he fled into Ethiopia, and carried with him Apis and other Holy Beasts, and that the inhabitants of Jerusalem coming down invaded the Land, fired the Towns and Cities, slew their Nobles, used all sorts of cruelty possible, and that the Priests name, who made Laws and Statutes for them to live under, was one of Helioptis, Oparissus by name, deriving the same from Osiris, the God of Helioptis: and that this man, changing his name, was afterward called Moses.

Moreover, that Amenophis, having lived in banishment thirty years, came with a strong power out of Ethiopia, and fighting with the shepherds and polluted, he slew many of them, and put the rest to flight, pursuing them unto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that here again he telleth a very unlikely tale: for although the Lepers and impotent persons were offended with the King for appointing them to hew Stones; yet it is to be thought that receiving their own desire at the Kings hands afterwards, to wit, a City to dwell in, that then they again became the Kings well-willers. Supposing also their hatred still continued towards him, they rather should have attempted revenge by treason against him, than towards all their Nation, wherein they had many dear friends and alliance. And although they had purposed to War against these men, yet would they not have been so impious as to have rebelled against the Gods, and to have violated the Laws where in they were brought up.

A confusion of Manethon's words altogether.

We have therefore cause to thank Manethon, in that he cleareth us, and affirmeth his own country-men (yea a Priest) to be authors of this impiety, and that by oath they bound themselves so to do. What can be more extravagant than to say that neither any of their country-men nor kinsmen rebelled with them, but that the poor distressed people were glad to send to Jerusalem for succour? But what society or friendship had they with the people of Jerusalem, of whom they came to demand help? Why, they were more their Enemies than the rest of their Country-men, and were all of quite different manners from us. They of Jerusalem (as he saith) presently did as they were willed to do, in hope that, according as they were promised, they might subdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that Country out of which they had been driven by force? had they lived in poverty or misery, perhaps they might have been induced to have done it: but seeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich City, and possessed a goodly fertile soil far better than Egypt, what might move them thereto? What reason had they, at the request of their ancient Enemies (and they also diseased, as they of Jerusalem could not abide their own friends among them that had the like diseases) to thrust themselves into danger? they could not fore-know the Kings intent

A intent to fly: as for Manethon himself he saith, he met them at Helioptis with 300000 men. And this they that went to War well knew. But what reason had they to conjecture that the Kings mind would change, and he flye? As to what he charge: upon the Auxiliaries from Jerusalem, that they seized upon the stores, and leav'd all the Corn that was in Egypt, which brought great distress and exigence upon the people, hath he forgot, that considering they entred as Enemies, they are not thereby to be reproached, Rapacity being unavoidable among Souldiers, especially if Strangers and Conquerours? Hath he forgot he said before that the Lepers had done the same formerly, and had to that purpose obliged themselves by oath? and that he assured us, that some years after Amenophis repelled the Jerusalem-Confederats, and Lepers, slew many of them, drove them out of those parts, and pursued them to the very borders of Syria: as if Egypt was a Country so easily conquer'd, or that those who were then in possession merely by conquest, would not (upon the first alarme of Amenophis's march have block'd up the passages, and secured the Avenues on that side towards Ethiopia, which they might easily have done, and drawn together what forces they had pleased to defend them? And is it not as improbable when he says, that that Prince made not only a great slaughter among them, but pursued them with his whole Army (cross the Desert) to the very frontiers of Syria? whereas it is notoriously known that Desert is so dry, that there being no Water to be found in the whole tract, it is almost impossible for an entire Army to march through it, though there was no Enemy to give them impediment. To conclude therefore, our Nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confesseth, neither was mingled with the diseased of that Country: for it is probable, that many of those sick people perished in the Stone-works, many in the great fight and batell, and the rest of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I reure that which he speaks of Moses.

The Epilogue came not of the Egyptians.

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a divine person, and one to be admired, and they commit great impiety in Labouring to challenge him for their Country-man, saying, that he was a Priest of Helioptis, banished with the rest for leprosie. For he is recorded to have lived five hundred and eighteen years before this time, and to have guided our Ancestors out of Egypt, into that Country wherein we now inhabit: Moses was not and his own words testify his body to have been clean from that Disease of Leprosie: for he commandeth all Lepers to be expelled out of the Towns and Villages, and to live apart by themselves; To be clothed in different Garments, and declared that whosoever touched them, or came under the same roof with them, should be accounted unclean. And if a Leper happened to be cured of that disease, he appointed certain purifications, cleanings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his hair should be shaved off: and that then after many and sundry Sacrifices, he should be admitted into the holy City. Certainly, had he been visited with that infection and calamity himself, he would surely have been more gentle, and merciful to such as should have been afflicted with that Disease.

He did not only make these severe Laws against Lepers, but he also interdicted all that wanted any joynt or parcel of the body, from being Priests, or exercising any office at the Alter: yea he also appointed, that if any Priest should have any of these defects beside him after he was a Priest, that then he should be deprived of the dignity. How can it then be probable, that to his own prejudice and discredit he would have enacted such Laws? And as to what he says about changing his name Oparissus into Moses, it is as incredible as the rest, there being no analogy between them, the name of Moses importing preservation from the Waters: for Moy among the Egyptians signifies Water: and now I suppose I have made it apparent, that Manethon, whilst he kept himself to the writings of the ancients, did not err much: but when he left them, he forsook the truth, and fell upon ridiculous stories, which he either invented himself, or believed out of prejudice to our nation. I now think it not amiss to examine a little the words of Cheremon, who professing himself to write the Egyptian History, maketh mention of the same King Amenophis his Son Rhamser, as Manethon doth, and reporteth that the Goddess Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleep, charging him for that her Temple was destroyed, and that Phritiphanter, a holy Scribe, told the King, that if he would expel all polluted and unclean persons out of Egypt, that then he should not be any more terrified with these night-visions. Moreover, that hereupon making search for all sick and diseased persons, he banished them out of his Land, to the number of 200000. And that their Captains were called Moses and Joseph, holy Scribes, also that these Egyptians names were so, that Moses was named Isisiber: and Joseph, Petephebus: and that they came to Pelufium, where they found 380000 left there by Amenophis.

Moses took his name of Moy, which in the Egyptian tongue signifies Water.

Against Cheremon's Historie.

Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt: also they all entering into H a league together, suddenly invaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Ethiopia, leaving his wife great with child, who hiding her self in caves and dens, did bring forth a child whom they called Messene, who afterward drove the Jews into Syria, being in number 200000, and this done, he recalled his Father Amenophis out of Ethiopia. And thus Charemon saith.

Messene's Son of Amenophis.

Manethon's
& Charemon's
History compared together.

The difference between Manethon's and Charemon's
History.

Lyfismachus is proved for lying.

According to Lyfismachus, the scabbed
and Leprous Jews were to be conveyed into the Wilderness, and cast into the Sea.

But I imagine, that which I have already said, to be sufficient to declare the vanity of both these Writers. For if that which they report were true, it were impossible that they should so much differ: but they labour to devise lies, and write nothing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon feigneth, that the cause of the banishment of the Lepers was the Kings desire to see the Gods; and Charemon saith, that it was for I that Isis after appeared unto him in his sleep. Manethon also saith, that Amenophis gave the King that counsel so to cleanse the Country; and Charemon saith, that he that counselled the King was called Phiritriphanter. Nor do they agree better in their numbers: Manethon reports them 80000 the other 250000. Manethon says these Lepers were sent directly to the Quarries to work there in the Squaring of Stone, and that afterwards Ataris was given them for a Quarter, where having begun their War, they sent Embassadors to Jerusalem to get that City into Confederacy. Charemon tells us on the other side that when they were forced out of Egypt, they found at Pelufium 380000 men whom Amenophis had repulsed; that joining with them they returned againe into Egypt, and compelled Amenophis to fly into Ethiopia. But that which is most observable is, that an Author, that was so exact in the Story of the apparition of Isis, should for- get to let us know from whence this great Army of 380000 did come, whether they were Egyptians, or Strangers, and for what reason Amenophis refused to admit them. Moreover, Charemon feigneth a dream of the Lepers and Isis, and reporteth that Joseph together with Moses was expelled, whereas Joseph lived four ages before Moses, every age containing at least a hundred and seventy years. Ramesses also, Amenophis Son, according to Manethon's History, being a young man fled into Ethiopia, and was banished with his Father, and afterwards assisted him in the Wars: whereas Charemon reporteth that he was born in a Cave after his Fathers departure; and that he getting the victory, did drive the Jews into Syria, who were in number two hundred thousand. L O felicity in lying! for he neither told what Nation those three hundred and fourscore thousand were: nor yet how a hundred and fourscore thousand of them perished, neither were they slain in the fight, or fled unto Ramesses: and which is most to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Jews, or whether he attribute this name unto the two hundred and fifty thousand Lepers, or unto the three hundred and fourscore thousand which were at Pelufium.

But it is folly to oppose my self against them, who have sufficiently contradicted themselves: for had other men controlled their Writings, they had been the more to be born withal. Lyfismachus was another of the same Stamp, and one that not only sec- ounds but surpasses them in their Lyes, in so much that we need no more than the M reigned of Boechor King of Egypt, the Jews that were Leprous or otherwise infected, re- ported in such numbers to the Temples to beg the charity of the people, that they communicated their distempers to the Egyptians. Boechor consulted the Oracle of Am- mon, and received this answer, that he should purifie the Temples, and send into the de- sert all those sick and infectious people, upon whom the Sun could shine no longer without regret, and that by so doing the Earth should recover its primitive fertility. That hereupon the said Prince by advice of his Priests assembled all those diseased per- sons, delivered them into the hands of certain Souldiers, who lap'd some of them in lead, and tirow them into the Sea, conducting the rest into the wilderness, and leaving N them there to be destroyed by Famine. That in that distress the poor people con- sulted together, made great fires, kept strong Guards all night, and fasted very solemnly thereby to make their Gods more propitious; and that a certain person called Moses advised them to remove the next day, and march on till they found better quarters; to trust no man; to give no man good Counsel that ask'd them; to ruin the Tem- ples and Altars where ever they came; and that this Counsel having been approved, they passed the Wilderness, and after much trouble and frequent distresses, arrived in a Country that was inhabited, where they gave the first instances of their cruelty by abusing the Natives, and robbing their Temples; in which course they continued, till they came at length to Judea, where they built a City, and called it Jerusalem (which is O as much as to say the spoil of holy things): but that growing afterwards more Potent, they

A they changed that name (as too infamous) and called it Jerusalem, and themselves in- habitants of Jerusalem.

This fellow found not that King, which the two former speak of, but he joyned a more new name, and leaving the Dream and the Prophet, goeth to Ammon for an answer touching the scabbed and Lepers; he saith, that a multitude was gathered to- gether at the Temples; but he leaveth it uncertain, whether the Jews only were infected with this Disease; for he saith the people of the Jews; or whether they were stran- gers and such as were born in that Country. If they were Jews, why dost thou call them Egyptians? If they were strangers, why dost thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to pass, the King having drowned so many of them in the Sea, and left B the rest in the Wilderness, that still so many should be left? how did they pals the Wilderness, and get the Country we now inhabit, and build a City and a Temple fa- mous through all parts of the World? Thou shouldest not only have told the name of our Law-maker, but also what Country-man he was, and of what Parents, and what moved him in his journey to make such laws against the gods, and against men. For if they were Egyptians, they would not so easily have forgotten the Religion, wherein they were brought up: or of what place else soever they were, they had some laws or other, which they had been accustomed to keep. If they had vowed to have born no good will unto them by whom they were driven out of their Country, they had some just occasion so to do: But to undertake War against all the World, and deprive them- selves of all friendship and help of moral men, doth not shew their foolishness so much, as the foolishness of him who belies them, who most impudently affirmeth, that their City took the name of Church-spoiling, and afterward changed it. For what cause forsooth did they change the name thereof? marry for that the former name was ignominious to their posterity. But the Gentleman understood not, that Jerusalem sig- nifieth otherwise in Hebrew, than in Greek: And therefore what should I stand to in- veigh against a lie so impudently told? But this book having been long enough, I will begin another, in which I shall endeavour to acquaint my self of what I have undertaken,

Lyfism in his opinion con-
futed.

Nothing is to an impudent

lye.

The SECOND BOOK
OF THE
ANTIQUITY of the JEVVS;

Written by
FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS
Against APPION of ALEXANDRIA,
And dedicated to EPAPHRODITUS.

THrice honoured and beloved Epaphroditus, I have in my former Books, so far forth as I was warranted by truth, proved the Antiquity of our Nation out of the Writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees, and Egyptians: And for the further confirmation thereof, I have produced the Testimony of divers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I have opposed my self against Manethon, and Cheremon, and divers others.

It remains now that I convince those who defied me more particularly, and give an answer to Appion, though indeed I am scarce satisfied that he deserves it. For as touching part of what he hath written, it seemeth to be one & the same with that which the rest have written; And as touching the rest, it is very cold and barren. The greatest part thereof is stuffed with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, shewing him to be a Man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life. And forasmuch as divers men are so weak in their judgments, that they rather suffer themselves to be won by these follies, than to be wrought upon by that which is written with better consideration, vainly doting on detractions, and growing discontent to give ear to other mens well deserved praises: I have thought it necessary to examine his Labours, the rather, for that he hath written against us, as if he intended to accuse us before a Tribunal, and convict us by publick trial. For I see that it is an ordinary course for the most part of men, to hug and take pleasure, though perhaps he that beginneth to blame another man, is himself convicted and found guilty of those defaults, which he imputeth and objecteth against his Adversary.

The Discourse of this Appion is so difficult and perplexed, that 'tis no easy matter to understand what he means: For troubled and confus'd with the incoherencies of his stories, sometimes he relates the departure of our Ancestors out of Egypt according to the description of those, whom I have confuted before. Sometimes he calumniate the Jews of Alexandria, and sometimes condemns the ceremonies of our Temple, and our whole Doctrine and Religion.

Now that our Predecessors have not taken their original out of Egypt, neither have been driven from thence for any infirmity, or deformity of their Bodies, or for any Wound, Ulcer, or Pollution, I suppose that I have not only sufficiently proved, but also produced far more Arguments than was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Appion alledgeth: For in the third Book of his Egyptian History, he writes thus: Moses, as I have heard it from most ancient Egyptians, was born at Heliopolis, and being instructed in the fashions of his Country, such Prayers as were wont to be said in open places and abroad, he caused to be said in private within the City, and ordained that in praying they should turn themselves towards the rising Sun, (for such is the situation of the City Heliopolis) and instead of Obelisks or Pyramids, which he erected certain Pillars, under which there were certain ingraven Basons, on which the

A the shadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they stood being uncovered and in open air) they observed the same course that the Sun doth in the Firmament. See here what eloquence this learned Man used.

Now this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, seeing it is clearly refell'd by the effects. For when Moses first built that Tabernacle in honour of God, he had no such intent, nor fashioned any such form, neither ordained his Successors to do the like: And after this when as Solomon builded the Temple in Jerusalem, he never thought of any such curiosity as Appion forgeth. He saith that he hath been informed by those of Antiquity, that Moses was a Heliopolitan: for you must understand that Appion himself was young, and believed the relation of the aged sort of his acquaintance, which conversed familiarly with him; yet cannot this learned Grammarian justify life, where Hommer was born, neither from what Country Pythagoras came, although in respects they lived but yesterday: And as touching Moses, who lived so many ages, and so great a number of years before them, he decideth the matter so easily, and giveth credit to the reports of Antiquity so lightly, that it appeareth most manifest, that he is but a lyar. As touching the time wherein he saith that Moses led away the Blind, Leprous, and Lame, this diligent Author accordeth very willingly with that which he himself hath said. For Manethon saith, that the Jews departed out of Egypt about the Reign of Themistis, three hundred ninety six years before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lyfima- The computation of the time is difficult among the Historiographers.

chus saith, that this thing happened during King Bocchorus time, that is to say, one thousand and seven hundred years before that time. Molon also and some others have alledged their Opinions. But Appion, who pretendeth to be a Man of more credit than the rest, hath precisely and exactly set down the time, averring that our departure was about the seventieth Olympiad: Nay more, in the first year thereof, wherein, as he saith, Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he purposefully made mention of Carthage in this place, as an infallible argument of the truth of his Allegation, not considering that he draweth an argument against himself, by which himself may be convinced. For if we may give credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colony, it appeareth by them, that King Hyram lived more than one hundred and fifty years before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I have heretofore proved out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hyram was in amity with Solomon, who builded the Temple of Jerusalem; and that he furnished him with much Timber and other matter toward the finishing of that building. Now Solomon builded the Temple six hundred and twelve years after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconsiderately reckoned the number of those which were driven out of Egypt, in like manner as Lyfimaachus had done, namely, of one hundred and ten thousand men, he yielded a most admirable reason, and such as may be easily believed: From whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was derived. For (saith he) after they had travelled for the space of six days, there grew certain inflammations in their Groins, by reason whereof they rested on the seventh day, being finally arrived in the Country which at this day is called Judea, because the Egyptians call Sabbatois an Ulcer that groweth about the Groin.

Can any man read these stories without laughter, or indeed indignation, to see a grave Author aver such trifles with that impudence and Authority? How improbable is it, that 110000 men should at one time be infected with the same disease? and if they were made up of blind, and lame, and other infirmities (as he affirms in another place) how could they have been able to have marched one day in a desert? or how could they have been able to have fought, much less subdued the Nations that opposed them? Can it be naturally believed of so great a multitude? or can it without great absurdity be imputed to accident? Yet Appion affirms, that these 110000 men arrived all of them in Judea; and that Moses being yet upon the Mount Sinai (which in those parts parts Egypt and Arabia) he continued there privately forty days; and when he came down, he delivered those Laws to the Jews which are still observ'd: Upon which I would be resolv'd in two things. How it was possible for so great a number of men to cross so vast a desert in six days? and how he could subsist forty days in a place so wild and barren, that there was not so much as water to be found for his refreshment?

His Etymologie of the word Sabbath is so idle and impertinent, it can proceed from nothing but ignorance and folly: for these words Sabbu and Sabbatum do greatly differ: Sabbatum in the Jews language, signifieth rest from work: but Sabbu in the Egyptian tongue, betokeneth a Disease about the privy parts, as Appion saith. See here what cavilling fictions this Egyptian Appion useth concerning Moses, and our departure out of Egypt: wherein he counterfeith and coineth absurdities unthought of by any others.

Shall

Appion denies his Country and Origin.

Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himself? for being born at Oasis, a Town in Egypt, he forswearth his Country and Nation, and counterfeiting himself to be an Alexandrian, ratifieth his Nations wickedness. No marvel then, though he team them Egyptians, whom he hated and railed against; for if he had not been persuaded that the Egyptians were wicked base people, he would never have denied himself to be their Country-man: for such as proudly boast of their famous Country, esteem it a credit to bear the denomination thereof, and reprehend such, as without just cause make themselves of their Nation. Wherefore the Egyptians are one of these two ways affected towards us Jews; either they claim us to be their Country-men, as glorying in us and their Country; or else they and their Country being infamous, they desire that we should be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed I this worthy Appion seemeth so to inveigh against us, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for bestowing their Cities upon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Jews at Alexandria, he as it were casteth a bone between them, raileth not only on the Jews of that City, but on all whereforever: and belieth both of them most impudently.

Appion raileth against the Jews, as thoroughly revailing the Alexandrian
doctrines.
The Sea-coast
of Alexandria.

But let us examine those heinous and enormous matters (and as he saith) such as are not to be suffered, of which he accuseth the Alexandrian Jews. Coming (quoth he) out of Syria, they seated themselves near the Sea coast in a place where, though the Sea came up, there was no Harbour.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Jews own Country was so also: yea herein Appion raileth against Alexandria, which K he maketh his own Country: For the Sea-coast is part of Alexandria, and, as all men judge, the best place to dwell in: Now if the Jews by force of Arms so vanquished this place, that they could never since be driven out of it; it is no discredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gave them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great Privileges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Appion would have said, if the Jews had dwelt about Necropolis, their Tribes being even at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Appion have read the Epistles of King Alexander, and Ptolomus Lagus, or others their Successors Kings of Egypt, or seen the Pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the privileges that Cæsar the Great granted unto the Jews: if (I say) he knew of these, and yet did presume to write the contrary, then he was partial and not to be believed, and if he was ignorant hereof, he was then unlearned and as incredible on the other side.

The Liberties and privileges granted to the Jews.

The like ignorance also discovereth he, where he wondereth that the Jews in Alexandria were called Alexandrians: For an entire Colony, though of different Nations, do all bear the name of their founder; and that I may shun prolixity, the Jews of Antioch are called Antiochians; Selucus the Founder having made them also Citizens: the like may be said of the Jews of Ephesus, and of the other of Ionia, who by the Kings Gifts enjoy the same privileges with the rest of the Citizens.

The Romans also of their Clemency have granted the name of their Nation, which is no small gift, not only to private persons, but to great Nations in general.

To be short, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes and Sabines are called Romans; or if Appion will take away this denomination of the City wherein men inhabit, let him cease to call himself an Alexandrian; for he being born in the heart of Egypt, can in no wise be an Alexandrian if the privilege of the City be taken away from him, as he would have it from us.

And the Lords of the whole World, the Romans, have amongst all other Nations only prohibited the Egyptians from having the privileges of any City: and so this Gentleman being himself incapable of dignity, endeavoureth likewise to hinder them from it who have true right unto it.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that City, did not make choice N of us for want of People to furnish the same withal; but for that he bestowed the liberty thereof upon us as a reward and testimony of our virtue and fidelity, endeavouring indeed to honour and credit our Nation thereby: For Hecateus reporteth that Alexander, for the Jews good-service and fidelity, bestowed upon them the Country of Samaritis, and freed them from paying tribute for it.

3 Ptolomus
Lagus.

The same good affection towards the Jews of Alexandria, Ptolomus Lagus continued after him, for he delivered into their hands the strong holds of Egypt (judging that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himself Lord of Cyrene and other places in Lybia, he sent certain Jews to inhabit the same.

3 Ptolomus
Philadelphus.

After him Ptolomus Philadelphus did not only release and set free all Captives of our Nation in his Country, but also did many times remit their payments of money, and (which

A (which was the principal point of all) he desired to be instructed in our Laws and holy Scriptures, and for this cause sent unto us, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them unto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof to Demetrius Phalereus, Andreas and Ariflenus, Demetrius being the only mirror of learning in his Age, and the other two Equires of his own Body: neither would he ever have desired to have been instructed in our Laws and Customs, if he had despised us, and not rather admired us. But Appion know that almost all the Macedonian Kings, his Successors in order, did peculiarly affect our Nation.

The favour interpreted.

For Ptolomus the third, which was also called Evergetes, conquering Syria by force B of no sacrifice unto the gods of Egypt for his Victory, but came to Jerusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed unto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a Victory.

3 Ptolomus
Evergetes.

Ptolomus also, surnamed Philometor, and his Wife Cleopatra committed the Rule of A his whole Kingdom unto the Jews, and Onias and Dositheus, both Jews, were Generals of his Army, from whose credit Appion detracts; whereas he rather ought to have admired them, and have thanked them for delivering Alexandria, whereof he maketh himself a Citizen.

3 Ptolomus
Philometor.

For when there was a Rebellion in Cleopatra's Kingdom, and all was in peril to be destroyed, these two men delivered Alexandria from Civil War: But Appion faith, that C after this Onias came and brought a little Army into the City, at such time as Ternus the Roman Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that Fact of his was most just.

For Ptolomus Physcon after the death of his Father Ptolomus Philometor, coming out of Cyrene, endeavoured to expel Queen Cleopatra and the Kings Sons, to the end that he (contrary to all justice) might possess the Kingdom: and this was the cause why Onias took Arms against him in Cleopatra's behalf; not forsaking his fidelity unto Kings in the time of necessity: yet God himself did manifestly witness his justice in this action: For when Ptolomus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his Army, and took all the Jews, their Wives and Children that were in the City, and bound them, D and stripping them naked cast them before Elephants to be destroyed (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread upon them, made the said Beasts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Jews which were cast before them, fell upon Ptolomus's friends that stood by, and slew many of them: which done, there appeared unto Ptolomus a most horrible Vision forbidding him to harm the Jews; and his chieftest and best beloved Concubine also (whom some call Ithaca, others Herene) came unto him, and besought him to abstain from such impiety: whereupon he being sorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit: So that the Jews of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance, that upon it God did manifestly deliver them;

3 Ptolomus
Physcon sent to persecute
the Jews.

E yet Appion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Jews of impiety for bearing Arms against Physcon, whereas indeed he ought rather to have commended them for it.

But Appion extollet Cleopatra the last Queen of Alexandria, only for that she was of Cyrene unjust and ingratul unto us; when he rather ought to have reproved her, in whom all Impiety and wickedness reigned, both concerning her own kindred and her husbands who loved her, and also generally against all the Romans, and the Emperours his Benefactors. She kill'd her own sister Arfene in the Temple, who had not any ways offended her; she also treacherously slew her own Brother, and destroyed her Ancestors gods and sepulchres; and receiving the Kingdom from the first Cæsars gift, the ingratul F rebelled against his Son and Successor; and infecting Antony with her poisoned drinks and amorous enchantments, she made him rebel against his Country, and to be unconstant unto his own friends, depriving some of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be Instruments of her impiety.

Of Cleopatra
the last Queen
of Alexandria.

What else shall we say of her, who in the Battel by Sea forced Antony her own husband (who also had many children by her) to yield himself, the Empire and Army unto her, and become one of her followers? Lastly, when Alexandria was taken by Cæsar, she was so cruelly minded, that not remembering her own estate, she accounted it her safety with her own hand to kill the Jews, that she might be cruel and perfidious to every body.

G Is it not a glory, think you, to us, that (as Appion reporteth) in time of dearth and famine what was so plentiful in Jerry, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopa- tra was punished as the deserved. And we call great Cæsar himself to witness of our fidelity, and the service we did him against the Egyptians, the Senate also and their Decrees, and the Writings of Augustus Cæsar, wherein our deserts are testified. These Letters Appion ought to have read, and to have examined all Testimonies of us, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomies, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. And if so be Germanicus could not get corn to suffice all the Inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of scarcity and dearth, and not the Jews fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Jews it is manifest enough: for the Jews want of Corn was not only left unsupplied, but also the want of other Alexandrians. But they have always kept that wherewith the ancient Princes did put them in trust, to wit, the keeping of the River and whole Country, as I not being thought unfit for their purposes.

But Appion thus urgeth us; If (saith he) the Jews be Citizens, how hap they worship not the same God, nor have the same Religion with the rest of the Alexandrians? To whom I thus answer; How hapneth that you Egyptians do so contend and war one against another only for diversity of Religion? Shall we herupon conclude, that you are all Egyptians, or not all men, because you worship and with great diligence nourish Beasts against nature? Yet our Nation seemeth one and the same. If therefore amongst you Egyptians such difference of Opinions be; why dost thou so marvel at this, that we in a strange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do constantly persevere in our first Religion? But he saith that we are the cause of all Sedition; which suppose he speak true of the Jews of Alexandria, yet are not all Jews in all places the cause of Sedition; for we are known to be peaceable amongst ourselves. But indeed as every one may perceive, the People, like Appion himself, are Authors of Sedition in Alexandria. For whilst the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we lived peaceably together, and they permitted us quietly to use our own Solemnities: but when the number of Egyptians increased, by confusion of time, Sedition also by their means encreased: But our Nation remained unmixed. They therefore were Authors of those troubles, not having the Government of the Macedonians, nor the wisdom of the Greeks; but using their Egyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred against us, and that wherewithal they hit us in the teeth, beset them: for most of them not having the privileges of the City themselves, call us strangers that have them. For none of the ancient Kings bestowed the liberty of the City upon the Egyptians, neither have any of the Emperors of Rome bestowed the privilege. But Alexander himself brought us into the City; the Kings after him encreased more privileges; and it hath pleased the Roman Emperour to ratify and confirm them.

But Appion upbraids us for not erecting Statues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not hereof, or that they needed Appion to speak for them: whereas he should rather admire the Roman magnanimity, and modesty, who compel not their Subjects to violate their ancient Laws and Religion, but content themselves with such honours as the giver may with piety and equity give them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulsion.

The Greeks and divers others think it not amiss to erect Statues; for they delight to have the Pictures of their Ancestors, Wives, and Children, and some of their beloved Servants also: what marvel then if they accord to yield the like honour to Princes and Emperours?

But our excellent Law-maker forbid all kind of Images, as well of inanimate as animate Creatures (not having at that time the least thought or prospect of the Roman Empire) because our God being incorporeal and spiritual, could not be reduced to humane representation, without great inconvenience; nevertheless he did not forbid us from paying honour and respect to such great persons, as being next in their places, may deserve the next honour to what is due to the Gods: and such is the reverence that we pay to the Emperours and People of Rome; and as a testimony of it, a day doth not pass in which we do not offer up Sacrifice (at our own expence) for their safety and prosperity; which is more than we do for any other Prince or Nation in the World.

And let this suffice to answer that which Appion alledgeth against the Jews of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gave him this occasion, namely Poiphanus and Apollonius Molon, who accuse us for not worshipping the same gods that others do, although they lye all alike, flandering our Temple most absurdly: and yet for all this they do not believe that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a most ignominious thing for any free-man to lye upon any occasion: much more of a Temple famous over

all

A all the world for sanctity. For Appion affirmeth that the Jews in that sacred Temple placed the head of an Ass, and worshipped it most religiously. And this (quoth he) was manifestly known at such time as Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled that Temple, who found that Asses head being of massie gold, and of great value.

To this first slander I answer, That were that true which he reporteth, yet an Egyptian ought not to have spoken against us for it, seeing that an Ass is of no less worth than a Goat, and other brut beasts that they honour for Gods.

Is it possible he should be so blind as not to perceive, that never any fable was more evidently absurd: every body could tell him that we have constantly used the same Laws without the least change or alteration. Nevertheless though Jerusalem has had her misfortunes as well as other Cities, and has been taken by Antiochus, Pompey, Craesus, and at length by Titus, and our Temple been in the possession of all of them: yet what is it they ever found there but great piety and devotion? Upon which subject I do not think it necessary to enlarge in this place.

And as touching Antiochus, many Writers of good credit report that he never had any just cause to spoil our Temple, but that he was drawn unto this fact for want of money; Nor that he was our Enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellows he sought supply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of derision: and thus do Polibius, *Megeopolis*anus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damascene, Timagene Cæsar the Chioniciensis, and Apollodorus avow, who all do witness, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the League he had with the Jews, and rob'd and spoil'd their Temple being full of gold and silver.

Appion ought to have considered this, had he not had an Asses heart, and a Dogs impudence, which he and his Country-men worship for gods. As for us, we do neither honour nor reverence Asses, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Apes, esteeming them that are bitten by Apes, and devoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God: For Asses are employed among us (as they are in all places, where a rational life is made of them) only in carrying burthens and doing such things as are necessary about Agriculture, and when they are lazy, or trespass upon their neighbours Corn, we do not scruple to give them correction.

But Appion was either the greatest Ass that ever was, in telling a lye; or else having begun to do it, he could not compass his enterprizes, in that he found not any just cause of detraction against us.

He addeth another Fable of the Greeks to our detraction; to the which I will make only this reply, That it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and less uncleanness, to pass through the Temple, than for Priests to come and feign impious words and speeches; which they not respecting, laboured rather to excuse the sacrilegious Kings, than to write the truth of us and our Temple, endeavouring to curry favour with Antiochus, and to cover and hide his Sacrilege, used against our Nation, for that he wanted money.

Appion with reflection upon the rest, saith, That Antiochus found a Bed in our Temple, and in it a Man lying, and a Table set before him, furnished with all fowles belonging either to the Sea or Land; that the Man was accustomed to see him: And that so soon as Antiochus came into the Temple, the man adored him as though he hoped for great help from the King, falling down at his feet, and with a stretched out arm craving licence to speak: which the King granting, willed him to declare what he was, why he dwelt in the Temple, and the cause of his meats before him, the man with sighs and tears unto Antiochus bewailed his Calamity, saying, He was a Grecian; and that traveling in the Country to get his living, he was suddenly seized upon by certain Outlandish men, and brought unto the Temple, and shut up therein, and that no man might see him, and that he was there fed or fasted with all dainties that could be provided; and that at first this daintiness made him joyful, but afterward he began to suspect it, and lastly he was heretaken amazed, and then demanding of a Jew that administered unto him, for what cause he was there kept, he understood the Jews purpose, and Law not to be revealed, for the fulfilling whereof he was there nourished, and that the Jews were wont to do the like every year upon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian stranger, and feed him a year, and then to carry him to a Wood, and there to kill him, and sacrifice him according to their Rites and Ceremonies, and to cast and cut his entrails: and in the sacrificing of the Grecian, to swear to be Enemies to the Greeks; and the remainder of the murdered man they cast into a certain pit. And that then this Greek reported unto Antiochus, That the time allotted unto him by the Jews to live was now almost expired, and therefore requested, for the reverence he bore to the Grecian gods, to save his blood from being spilt by the Jews, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

The Jews have been always true to their Prince.

The Egyptians do worship Beasts not agreeable to man's nature.

The cause of their discord.

Appion's railing on touching the Jews being Authors of sedition still continued.

The Jews may have no more.

The effect of Poiphanus and Apollonius concerning the Jews contracted.

Certain Historians endeavour to cover and hide Antiochus his perjury and sacrilege.

That the Jews ought once a year to sacrifice a Grecian.

This Fable is not only full of all tragical cruelty, but also mingled with cruel Impudency: yet for all this, the first devillers hereof do not free Antiochus from sacrilege, as they hoped hereby to do, who write it purposely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not move him to come and sack our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it so (as they say.) Antiochus therefore was most impious, and not afflicted by Gods favour in that enterprise, (whatsoever those lyes mutter) as it is easy to learn by the fact he committed. For we do not only differ from the Greeks in Religion, but a great deal more from the Egyptians, and other Nations; and what Nation in the World is there, that sometime doth not travel through our Country? Is it then probable that we only renew that Conspiracy against the Greeks? Or how is it possible that so many thousand people as are of our own Nation, should all eat of the entrails of one man, as Appion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man, whosoever he was? Or why did not the King carry him with Trumpets before him into his Country? seeing that in so doing he might have been esteemed full of piety, and a great favourer of the Greeks, and greatly strengthen himself against the hatred of the Jews by their aid? But I omit to speak more of this: for in sensible people void of all reason, in it not to be reprehended in words, but by deeds: for all men that have seen the building of the Temple, can testify what it was, and the undefiled purity thereof. For it consisted of four Portico's, or appartements, each of which by our Laws belonged to several persons: into the first Strangers, and all people were admitted. Women only excepted that have their monthly courses. Into the second it was lawful for the Jews only: all which might go into it, with their Wives also if free from pollution of their flowers. Into the third Porch, they only of our Nation that were purified and sanctified might come. Into the fourth might only the Priests enter, in their Sacerdotal habits, & into the secret part of the Temple might only the high Priest come, attired with a Stole proper to him only: yea we are in all things so careful of piety, that our Priests are appointed their certain hours when to enter into the Temple.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Priests that were to sacrifice entered into the Temple: and at noon again when it was shut: yea it was not lawful to carry any vessel into the Temple, but there was only there an Altar, a Table, a Censer, and a Candlestick, as is in our Law mentioned, and there is no other secret or hidden mystery done, neither is there in that place any eating; and all the people can testify this which I have here set down, and our Writings do the like. For notwithstanding that there are four Ranks of Priests, and every Priests Tribe containeth above five thousand men: yet every one waiteth on certain appointed days in their turn, and their time of waiting being expired, others succeed them in Sacrificing; and the day before they are to finish their waiting, they deliver up unto their successors the keys of the Temple, and all vessels belonging thereto, in the full number that they received them: and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meat or drink, which are forbidden to be offered at our Altars: those things only excepted whereof we make our Sacrifice. What then shall we say of Appion, who examining nothing of all these, hath raised such incredible reports of us? How ignominious a thing is it for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliver the truth of a History? Well, he knew the piety used in our Temple, but he purposely omitted it: yet could he remember a fained tale of the Sacrificing of the Greek, his dainty fare, and hidden food, that all men that would passed through our Temple: whereas the most noble among our whole Nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Priests.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lye, to seduce them that will not search into the truth. For they have attempted to slander us by those impieties before mentioned. And again, like one full of all piety, he derideth the vanity of these fables, and reporteth that at such time as the Jews for a long time together warred against the Idumeans, Zabidus departing out of a City of Idumaea where Apollus was worshipped, came unto the Jews, promising to deliver unto them Apollus the gods, and bring him unto their Temple, if so be that all of them would there assemble themselves together: and that afterwards Zabidus making a wooden Engine, and putting himself into it, he caused three rows of Candles to be stuck about it, which made it at a distance appear like a Comet to the great amazement of the Jews, who being terrified and astonished at the vision, gave Zabidus opportunity to pass into the Temple, to possess himself of the Asses Golden head, and convey it to Dora. Wherefore we may say that Appion leadeth an Ass, to wit, himself with fooleries and lyes: for he nameth places that are not, and setteth down Cities to himself unknown: for Idumaea is a Province near unto us, and bordering upon Gara, and there is no City in it called

Dora,

A Dora, but in Phanicia near unto the Hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, doing us nothing consonant to Appions slanders, for it is four days journey from Judaea.

Why therefore doth he so rashly accuse us for not worshipping the gods of others Nations, seeing (as he saith) our Predecessors did so easily believe that Apollus would come unto them, and that he walked upon the earth with Stars about his back? Perhaps indeed they had never before seen a Candle or lamp, themselves having to many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our Country, where so many thousand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in the time of War find the Towns and Villages, by which he past, without any Watch men? Well, to pass the rest: The gates of our Temple were threefold Cubits high, twenty Cubits broad, all covered with Gold, yea, almost all of clean Gold, and these Gates every day were shut by two hundred men: and it was too impious a thing to leave them open. Is it then credible that this Candle-bearer could easily open them, who alone was judged to have the Asses head? So that now it remaineth doubtful whether Zabidus did bring back again the Asses head, or else Appion took it of him, and brought it again to our Temple, that there Antiochus might find it, and so Appion might have another occasion of lying. He also beliet us concerning the oath which he saith we Jews do take, swearing by the God of Heaven and Earth, and Sea, never to favour any stranger, and especially the Greeks. This lye might better have said, not to favour any stranger, and especially the Egyptians, and so his former lyes and these should have better corresponded, if our Ancestors had been expelled (by their Predecessors) out of Egypt, not for their wickedness, but for their calamity. But we are so far from the Greeks that we scarcely ever think of them: so that no man can say that there is any enmity between us and the Greeks. But contrariwise, many of them have embraced our Religion, and some of them therein persevered: others again have forsaken it: yet none of them will say that he heard this oath spoken of among us: but it should seem that only Appion heard of it, in that he himself forged it. Truly his wisdom and great providence is worthy to be admired (as shall hereafter appear:) for he, to prove these his lyes to be true, saith, that it is a certain testimony, that the Laws we observe are most unjust, and that we worship not God as we ought to do, in that we are subject to divers Nations, and our City endured many calamities: whereas touching themselves they are of a City that flourisheth in absolute Authority, accustomed to govern from the foundation thereof, and not to serve the Romans. In effect, who can resist their valour? Truly no man but Appion would ever have flouted us herewith, seeing that few Cities so flourish and reign over other, that they again at no one time have been brought into subjection: for many Nations are subject to others: only the Egyptians are freed from the Captivity of such as rule Europe and Asia, for that (as they say) the gods fleeing into their Country, were saved by entering into the bodies of Beasts. Yet have they not indeed had one days liberty since the beginning of the World, neither under the Government of their own Princes, nor under Strangers.

I will not stand to reckon how often the Persians have wasted their City, destroyed their Temples, and slain their supposed Gods. For it is not decent that I should imitate herein Appions foolishness: neither am I calling to memory what befel the Athenians and Lacedemonians, the last of which are recorded to have been most valiant, and the first to have been most devout and Religious: neither will I reckon up those most godly Kings, amongst whom Cresus was one, who notwithstanding fell into great calamities. Moreover, I will not recount how the Castle of Athen was let on fire, and the Temples of Ephefus and Delphos likewise, and many others. There is now one Appion, a new accuser of the Jews, who upbraident them with their calamities, forgetting the misery that hath befallen his Country-men the Egyptians: but he was blinded with the fable of Sesestris (whom he saith to have been King of Egypt.) We could report and boast of our Kings, David and Solomon, who subdued many Nations unto them: but it is not fit here to speak of them. But Appion was ignorant of that which all the World knoweth, to wit, that the Egyptians have served first the Persians, and afterwards the Macedonians, and that as bond-slaves: whereas we remaining in free liberty, reigned over all the Cities about us 120 years, even unto the time of Pompey the Great: and when all the other Kings were subdued by the Romans, only our Kings for their fidelity and friendship towards them were dear unto them. O but G this smiteth upon Appions Stomach! that we have not had any famous men of our Nation, who have invented Arts and Sciences, and been excellent in wisdom, such as So-

The description of the Temple and Porticoes.

What was in the Temple

From Tribes of Priests, and of every Tribe more than five thousand men.

Another tale raised up by Appion's Slander.

Dora is a City of Phenicia and not of Judaea.

The gates of the Temple.

Appions lye concerning the oath is confuted.

Appion upbraident the Jews with captivity

Dora's and Solomon's power.

Appion craves, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others whom he fettereth down : and which is most to be H admir'd, Appion puts himself into the number of these famous men : and faith, that Alexandria is blessed and happy, that hath deserved to have such a Citizen as he is :
and great reason that he should testify that of himself, which all men else perceive in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitful fellow, both of corrupt life and manners.
So that the Alexandrians had just cause to be sorry that they ever had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equal at least unto those whom he mentio-neth, all men know that please to read the Book of our Antiquity. The rest that his accusation containeth, it is not amiss to let pass without answer, for that it rather impeacheth the Egyptians, his own Country-men, than us : for he doth complain of us for Sacrificing ordinary Beasts, and abstaining from Swines flesh and laugh- I ed at our Circumcision. Touching the Sacrificing of Beasts, we do as all Nations else do : and Appion, inveighing against our sacrificing, sheweth himself to be an Egyptian ; for were he either a Grecian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended ; for both Greeks and Macedonians do vow to Sacrifice Hecatombs to their gods, and use Priests in their banquets : and yet for all this, the World is not desolate of living creatures, as Appion teacheth.

But were all men so mad as the Egyptians, it would indeed be desolate of men, and filled with cruel Beasts, which they (supposing them to be gods) do diligently nourish.
If any man shall ask of Appion, whom of all the Egyptians he judged to be a wife man, and most religious towards their gods, no doubt he would answer the Priests, For K they say, that their first Kings in the beginning gave them these two commandments in charge : first to seek wisdom ; and next, to worship the gods : they also are all them circumcised, and abstain from Swines flesh, and no other Egyptian Sacrificeth with them unto their gods. Appion therefore was surely blind, when, instead of detracting us, he speaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom he took all this pains. For the Egyptians do not only use those customs which Appion in us disalloweth, but also do teach others to circumcise themselves, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verily think, that Appion was justly punished for blaspheming his Country-Laws and Religion, For being forced to circumcise himself to avoid a great disease, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his privy member rotting, he in extreme grief and misery L gave up the Ghost. For wife men ought to perlevere in their Country-Laws in all piety, and not to deride and detract others : but Appion forsook his own Religion, and slandered and belied ours. And this was Appion's end : and here also should end this Book, but that Appollonius, Molon and Lyfimaachus, and certain others, partly for ignorance, partly for madness, have most injuriously belied our Law-maker Moses, and the Laws he made, detracting him as a deceitful Magician, and Author of all the malice and impiety amongst us ; and for such as teacheth no virtue nor goodness at all.

I will therefore, as far as in me lieth, declare both our Conversation in general, and in particular : For if my Judgment be any thing, our Laws are most forcible M both to piety, and to all humanity in general, as also to Justice, pains-taking, and contempt of death. I only request this favour of the Reader, that he will not with a prejudicate or malicious opinion, peruse these Writings : for I do not write this as a praise and vain ostentation of our Nation, but as a just Apology, refusing the slanderous reports that some have used against us.

Appollonius doth not continually inveigh against us as Appion doth, but only here and there : sometimes affirming us to be hated both of God and man, sometimes to be Cowards, sometimes contrariwise complaining of our Nations Boldness. Saying moreover, that we are more foolish than any barbarous Nation ; and that therefore we only have had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which are profitable for mans life ; all which objections are easily refused, if we shew N the contrary to all these by him reported ; both that we have obeyed our Laws, and lived in all integrity.

If therefore I be forced to shew that other Nations have made contrary Laws, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other Nations, affirm ours to be the worse : neither of which can charge us, either that these Laws, which I will briefly set down, are not ours, or else that we have not perfit in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirm, that they who have framed themselves to live together under certain Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inviolate, and were the first founders of them, were more to be com- O mended for humanity and virtue, than they who live under no Rule nor Ordinance

A nance at all : and every Law-maker endeavoureth to so attribute Antiquity to their own Ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themselves the first Authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens lives. Which being so, it is the duty of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is best, and most convenient for them, who are to obey their Laws, and to satisfie them as much as may be, in proving their Laws to be good and right, and both in wealth and wo, calamity and felicity, to remain in them, neuer changing nor altering them.
I therefore aver, that our Law-maker is more ancient than any Law maker mentioned,
For Lycurgus, and Salon, and Seleuchus of Laeris, and those the Greeks admire, Moses were more ancient than all other Lawmakers.
This word,
Law, is not in Hebrew.
B themselves confels, that in times past they wanted the name of Law. This Homer can witness, who in his whole Works never mentioneth this word, Law, for the people of those times were not governed by Laws, but by indefinite sentences, and the Princes pleasure, using customs but not written, and altering and changing them also as occasion served.

But our Law-maker being very ancient (for this is every way manifest, even by our adversaries own confessions) shewed himself both a good Prince and Counsellor unto his people : for making Laws to direct and govern mens lives, he perswaded them voluntarily to embrace them, and firmly to persist in them with all wisdom.

C And first of all, let us consider the works of his greatness. For he undertaking the conduct of many thousand of our fore-Fathers out of Egypt into our own Country, delivered them from many calamities almost impossible to be avoided : for they being to pass through a place wherein was no Water, and a very sandy ground, being also to War, and preserve their Wives and Children, and goods from the variable event of Wars, he in all these shewed himself a most wise and prudent Counsellor, and a true Patron and Guide unto them all.
For he made all the multitude so to depend upon him, that he might perswade them to what he pleased, and yet in none of all these did he usurp any Authority over them : and in that time and place wherein all men of Authority ascribe power unto themselves, and exercise tyranny, at such time as the people do oftentimes offend, and live in all manner of impiety ; at the same time he being in Authority did contrariwise use all lenity and mildness, to the intent that he might be a pattern of virtue and justice to all the rest, giving all those that willingly followed him most assured safety, using in all accidents most strange works. For which cause he rightly deemed God to be his Captain and Counsellor : and first examining himself, and finding all the Laws he had set down were agreeable to the will and pleasure of God, the chiefest care he had was, how to perswade his people to the same, which he himself now knew : for they who direct their Lives according to the will of God, avoid all sins as our Law-maker did, being neither magician nor deceiver, as his Enemies injuriously report, but such a one as the Greeks do boast Minas and others after him to have been : for some of them affirmed their Laws to be made by Jupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle : either so believing themselves, or else thinking that the people would be easily so perswaded.
Now who of all the Law-makers made the best Law, and who did most rightly think of God, he that compareth all their Laws together may easily know : for now occasion is offered to speak of them : there are therefore an infinite company of Nations and Laws amongst men, and some Nations are ruled by Monarchs, others by the common consent of the people. But our Law-maker doing neither of these, did, as one should say, therein declare his Common-wealth to be Divine, chiefly affigging all power and principality over us to God, causing all men to fix F their minds and cogitations on him, as the only Giver and Author of all goodness, giving them to understand, that whatsoever in their necessity they intend him for, He heareth their prayers, and understandeth what every man doth in private, yea, his very cogitations : and that he is One, Unbegotten, and in all times Immutabile and Eternal, differing in a most excellent shape from all mortal creatures : and this we knew, but we are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his Substante and Essence.

And thus the wisest Greeks that ever were, judged of God, who how learned they were (he giving the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearse : and that these things afore rehearsed are best and most agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many do witness, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Philolaus.

to and after them the Stoicks, and almost all other Philosophers have so thought H of the Divine nature. But they delivering this their Philosophy in short speech do not publish the truth of their doctrine among the people already seized upon by superstitious opinions. But our Law-maker's works and words so agreed that he satisfied at large all his people, and they that were to be born of them, and their successors, inspiring as it were a certain constancy into them to persevere in the same, still referring the cause of his Laws to their own profit and commodity. For he did not affirm the worship of God only to be part of vertue, but he assigned other part thereof, to wit, fortitude, justice, and mutual concord of all his Citizens. For all our actions, speeches, and what else forever, are all refered to divine piety. Which he left not touched without any I more discourse of it. For these two are the methods of all discipline and morality, whereof one frameth and directeth the speech, the other the manners and actions; which being so, other Law-makers were indeed wise in advice and counsel, and yet they made choice of one of these Methods, and left the other; for the Lacedemonians were instructed in manners and not in words; as also they of Crete were: but the Athenians, and almost all the Greeks, were directed and trained up by Laws in every thing they were to do, yet never could they put their written Laws in practice. But our Law-maker very industriously did conjoin both these together: for he neither omitted the training them up in manners and good exercises, neither did he surcease to leave them written K Laws.

And first of all, making his entrance from the very meats, and prescribing to every one a convenient diet, he left no man liberty amongst us to direct himself in the least matter concerning his meat, but he by Laws defined, both from what meats we were to abstain, and what to eat, and what ought to be our ordinary diet, as also when we ought to labour, and when to cease from work; so that we, as it were under the government of a Father or Master, might neither sit willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not appoint punishment for them that were ignorant of it, but by Law enacted a most necessary and mild chastisement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cause he did not only will, that L we should once or twice or oftener hear the Laws, but that once every week we all, omitting other business, should come to hear the Laws, and so learn them perfectly; which things all other Law-makers have neglected, and the most part of men are so far from living according to their own laws, that they are altogether ignorant of them; and having offended their laws through ignorance, they then learn by other mens means, that they have made breach of their laws; yea, the chiefest and most eminent men amongst them do profess herein, that they are ignorant, causing those that are learned and skilful in their Laws to sit as they are in commission with them to direct them. M

Whereas every one of our Nation being demanded of our Laws can answer as readily, as he can tell his own name: for every one of us learning them, as it were, so soon as we come to the use of reason, we have them, as it were, written and printed in our minds, and by this means both we offend more seldom, and when we offend, we are sure to be punished.

And this especially is that, which hath caused such an unity and concord amongst us. For to worship one God after the same manner without any difference in manners and conversation is the only way to establish amity and concord in a Commonwealth. N

Amongst us no man shall hear any different speeches and opinions concerning God, whereas amongst all other Nations it is most frequent and ordinary: for amongst them not only every one of the common people doth speak his pleasure in this point, but divers Philosophers also presume to do it, some of them with their blasphemous speeches altogether destroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to have any care of men; neither is there any difference amongst us of affairs pertaining to mans life, but all men with us follow one common express labour, and we all joyntly affirm the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affairs, and all our actions and exercises; yea, any one may learn of our Women and Children, that all things whatsoever are to be reduced to piety.

A Hence it groweth that some detract our Nation; for that amongst us were no men Inventors of new matters and Arts. To whom we will thus answer; That other Nations account it a glory not to perish in any thing that their forefathers used, and hold them of most account who can best transgress their forefathers wisdom. But we contrariwise do account it the chiefest point of wisdom and virtue, neither to do nor think any thing contrary to that which our Ancestors have decreed; which is a token that our Law was established by as good advice as was possible. For those Laws that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongst us who believe, that our Law was first established by the will and pleasure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and virtuous which may any wife impugn the same. For who can take away any title thereof, or add better in their stead? Or who is he that can transfer and carry us from the observance of them, and ordain for us better Laws to govern our Common-wealth? Or what Law can be more just and better, than that which the Wisdom of God (who is Lord of all things) hath established? He first of all permitted the disposing of all principal affairs to the Priests in general, and most wisely constituted a high Priest at their head: neither were they chosen to this dignity by our Law-maker, who either excelled in nobility of birth, or riches; but he appointed such to sacrifice unto God, who were known to excel others in wisdom and sanctity; these do both keep our Laws and observe all other things belonging to their Office with all integrity; for our Priests are appointed Overseers of all things, and to judge all strifes and controversies, and to punish offenders.

C What Monarchy then or Kingdom can be more holy than this? Or how can God be better honoured than amongst us, where all people are prepared to piety, and the Priests commanded so to rule and govern the Common-wealth, as if they were celebrating some festivity? What sort of People are to be made Priests

And whereas other Nations are weary of celebrating their Mysteries (which they term Sacrifices) in a few days; we with joy, pleasure, and immutable wills, do celebrate our Sacrifices continually without intermission. It resteth now that I set down our Precepts and Laws, as Arguments of that which I have said.

The first is of God: of whom our Law saith, God comprehendeth all things, he is most D perfect, most blessed, he is sufficient both for himself and all things else, he is the beginning, midst, and ending, famous amongst all things for his works and benefits, more manifest than any thing else; but his shape and greatness is to us unspeakable, all matters (how precious soever) being compared with his excellent beauty, are nothing worth; and all Art, compared with his Invention, is un-artificial; we can neither see, conceive, nor imagine any thing like him. Of God, and of the divine Providence.

He is holy, for we see his Works; the Light, the Heaven, and the Earth, the Sun, the Moon, Rivers, and Sea, so many different shapes of living Creatures, and increase of Fruits: All these God himself made, not with hands or labour, nor as one needing any to help him, but he seeing them to be good, they were presently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worship him by the exercising of Virtue; for this is the most holy way to please him.

E We have one Temple, as also one God, which Temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men. Our Conformity is pleasing to him, and with that our Priests do constantly adore him, and he amongst them hath the first place, who by birth is the chiefest: He it is who first sacrificeth to God, seeth the Laws observed, judgeth Controversies, and punisheth those that are convicted by the Law: whosoever disobeyeth him shall be punished as one that rebels against God himself: He offereth sacrifices not of gluttony or drunkenness, for God is not pleased with such sacrifices, but rather of injured, and superfluous expences are thereby made.

F But God loveth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behaviour, and especially requireth in us that sacrifice, and inviolable chastity. In our sacrifices offered for our common good, we first of all pray in common, and then every one for himself, because we are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more than in his own life, is most acceptable to God.

We pray and vow unto God, not requesting riches of him, for he of his own accord bestoweth them upon every one; and lest them amongst us: but we pray that we may have part of them, and having gotten them may keep them.

Our Law hath also appointed purifications and abstinence from carnal copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearse: And this is our speech and opinion of God, who himself is our Law. Purifications used in sacrifices.

And as concerning Marriage; Our Law only alloweth natural copulation between Man

Of marriage.

The punishment for one that ravish a Virgin.

The purification for the body.

Of the funerals of the dead.

The honour due to Parents.

Against theft and usury.

How we ought to use our Beasts.

Man and Wife, done to the intent to get Children. But that men should abuse one another against nature, it altogether disalloweth, and punisheth such offenders with death. It commandeth us to marry, not respecting the dowry, neither must we take Women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitful persuasions; but that we rather obtain the good will of the Parent, and use ordinary means to persuade. It also appointeth that the Woman shall be in all things inferior to the Man, neither is it to obey in committing wickedness, but as one under Government: For it is God that gave man this authority. With her the Husband only may lawfully accompany, and it is abomination for her to make trial of another man: and who so attempteth this, can no ways avoid death: the like penalty attendeth him if he offer violence to a Virgin espoused unto another man, or if by persuasions he overcome a married Woman or other that hath Children; and all this our Law commandeth: It hath also interdicted all Women from concealing their Children being born, or otherwise to destroy them, for so should be a Child-killer, destroy Souls, and mankind: Who so therefore usefeth carnal copulation and corruption is unclean by our Laws, and Women after lawful copulation must wash themselves, judging that a part of their Soul was by this act defiled, and the being puffed up was wounded in her body, and therefore our Law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawful for them to feast and banquet at their Child birth, whereby an occasion of drunkenness may grow, but that their beginning should be temperate: they are likewise commanded to train up their Children in learning, that they may learn the Law, and actions of their fore-fathers, and imitate them; that so being trained up in the Law, they may not sin nor transgress them by ignorance.

Our Law hath also provided for the burial of the dead, that our Funerals should neither be pompous, nor our Sepulchres gorgeous, commanding every Household to perform all necessities touching the burial of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to assemble themselves together, and bewail the dead: It also commandeth every one (yea even the dead mans own family) to purify themselves after the burial, and to go afar off, as seeming to be unclean.

It also appointeth punishment for them that have committed murder, either willfully or against their will.

It bindeth every man to obey his parents next after God, and commandeth that those Children that do not shew themselves grateful unto them, or in any thing do grieve them, that they should be stoned to death: It also commandeth all young men to reverence old Men, because God is Elder to us all.

It permitteeth not friends to conceal any impiety; for God is not their friend who doth not disclose them: And if friends fall out that do know one anothers secrets; yet they are commanded not to bewray them.

If any Judge take a bribe, he is to be punished with death for omitting Justice, and assisting the guilty. No man must take any thing away that he himself placed not, and no man must take that which is not his own. No man for lending must take usury; and many such like things our Law commandeth, concerning cause of Communion between us and others.

It is also not amiss to recount how our Law-maker provided for the entertaining of strangers amongst us: For he seemeth so to have provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our own Laws, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally, that will come and live under our Laws, judging the community of mans life, not so much to consist in the Nation whereof we come, as in the unity of our minds and conversation. He forbiddeth others that are strangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our solemnities: yet he commanded us to exhibit unto them all other things necessary: and that we should give unto all men fire, water, meat, and bury them being dead. He hath also most mildly determined how we ought to deal with our Enemies, that we neither destroy their Country with fire, nor cut down their Fruit-trees.

We are also forbidden to rob and spoil those that are slain in fight, and deal injuriously with our Captives; and especially, if they be Women: yea, he so endeavoured to reach us humanity and mildness, that he provided, that we use even unreasonable beasts courteously, and only employ them to serve our lawful need, and no further: for he forbiddeth us to kill any tame thing bred in houses, and that we should not kill the old birds and their young together; and because many wild Beasts, enemies to mankind, do assist us in our labours, he commanded to spare them also. And in every point he established humanity and mildness amongst us, using (as is before said) Laws to direct

As therein, enacting also other, how they who infringe the foresaid Laws, may be with all severity punished: For the punishment allotted to the violators hereof is for the most part death. As if any man commit Alultery, ravish a Virgin, use the sin against nature with another, or suffer himself to be so abused.

We also have Laws concerning our Se vants, and our Measures, and Weights, and unlawful bargains and sales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his own; all these are to be punished, not as other Nations punish them, but much more grievously. But whosoever either injureth his Parents, or committeeth impiety against God, he shall presently be destroyed. But they that observe this Law are rewarded, not with gold or silver, nor with a Crown befit with precious stone; but every one having his Conscience to witness, doth greatly profit, and gain Eternity; as both our Law-maker prophesieth, and God himself doth most assuredly promise to them that observe them. And if it chance that we be forced to suffer death for them, yea do we joyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we shall so exchange this Life for a better.

I should be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifest; for many of our forefathers, only for that they refused to speak against our Laws, or otherwise than our Laws permitted, have most manfully and constantly endured all torments and death it self.

If our Nation were unknown to all the world, and that this our voluntary observation of our Laws were not manifest to all the people, if any man should report unto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I have declared, or else that he had found People in a strange Land, such as we be, having so pious and honest opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages persevered therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, considering the great mutability amongst themselves.

To be short, there are some, who flicke not to deride them, who have lately written of the Government of Common-wealths and Laws, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impossible. And (to speak nothing of other Philosophers, who have written of this Argument) that divine Plato amongst the Greeks, a man who in honest life, virtuous speech, and sound Philosophy excelled all others, this man is almost continually scoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are skilful in civil affairs, and brought in to their Comedies. Whereas, whosoever considereth his Writings with diligence, shall often and easily find matter agreeable with most mens manners: yea this Plato himself confesseth, that he dare not by reason of the common peoples ignorance set down the true opinion of God.

But many think Plato's words full of vanity, and licentiousness, and admire Lycurgus the Law-maker of the City of Sparta, for that it so long time persevered in his Laws. It is therefore an evident demonstration of Virtue to remain in their Laws. But if those who so admire the Lacedaemonians do compare them with us, and the time during the which their Laws were in force, with the time of our Common-wealth; they shall find that ours hath continued more than two thousand years. They shall also find that the Lacedaemonians did only perfectly observe their Laws, during such time as they were in prosperity and liberty, and that when their Fortune changed, they then became unmindful of their Laws.

But we, who have felt many thousand mis-haps, by reason of the often change of Princes in Asia, have not in these our last miseries and evils forsaken our Law. Neither can any man say, that liberty and licentious Life is the cause why we so diligently observe them, seeing that whoso please may see sufficient proof, that they trye us to more strict Life and laborious, than those of the Lacedaemonians did them. For they neither till'd the Earth, nor used any handy-craft, but ceasing from all labours and pains-taking, lived in their City, fat and in fair liking, having both their meat and all other necessities provided and prepared for them by others, and esteemed that only their felicity to do and endure any thing, so that they might prevail against those against whom they enterprized Wars: And that they failed also herein, I omit to rehearse. For not only one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole Companies of them, forgetting their own Laws, yielded themselves to their Enemies. And can any one tell of (I say not many) but of one or two of us that ever was treacherous to his own Laws, or that feared to dye for them? I mean not a common death, such as Souldiers are subject unto, but such a death as is effected by all torments and tortures that can be devised. Which I think those that prevail against us, imposed upon us not for hatred, but that they desired to see so admirable a matter; and to see we being but men, and such who esteemed it the greatest impiety possible to do it, could be compelled by them to speak or do

The Holy Laws any thing contrary to our Laws. Yet it is no wonder that we for our Law do dye with H
of the Jews such constancy, rather than any other Nation : For other Nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and fimple fare, abstinence from our Wives, and observacion of our days of rest, and we are always careful that when we fight against our Enemies, we observe our Laws concerning our Meats. And thus we take pleasure to observe and keep our Laws, and to exercise fortitude in obeying them.

Let now Tyfmachus or Malonus pafs, and all fuch as they be, wicked lying Writers, and Sophifters, deceivers of young men, and detractors of our Nation, as though we were the wickedft People living. As for me, I will not examine the Laws of other Nations : for it is our Custom to keep and obferve our own, not to detract others ; yea, and our Law-maker openly prohibited us from blaſpheming fuch, as other Nations hold for gods, only for the Name of God attributed unto them : yet may we not leave the Objections of our accuſers unanſwered, ſeing that which we are to ſpeak againſt them is not our own device, but many before us have ſpoken it. Who then of all the wife Greeks will not condemn the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially the Law-makers,

Who at first brought and fetted such vain opinions of the gods among the common People : affirming the number of them to be as many as they thought good, and that they were born at divers times, allotting to every one his proper place, as unto other living Creatures : some to be under the Earth, others in the Sea, and the ancientest amongst them in Hell, fettered and bound : and those whom they place in Heaven, in words they do term him a Father, but in deeds they shew him to be a Tyrant ; and for this cause they report that his Wife, his Brother, and his Daughter, whom they affirm to have been born of his Brain, conspired against him to bind him and hang him, as they report him also

Jupiter and Callisto.

Furzer.

This is all good stuff, as also is that which followeth, to wit, Adulteries committed in Heaven openly and impudently among the gods, that some professe themselves to envy their fellow gods and goddesses tied together in such filchiness. And what should the rest of them do, when as their King, the most ancient amongst them, could not refrain M his lustful licentiousness and debauchery? Moreover, Some of them became servants unto men, some built houses for money, and others became Shepherds, others like manufacturers were chained in Hell. What man then, that ever was accounted wise, would not blush at these follies, and reprove the inventors hereof, and the foolish believers also? Others made them subject to terror and fear, and madness, and such simplicity, as that they might be deceived, and all other naughty passions to be found in the nature of their gods, and have perwaded whole Cities to offer sacrifice to the most noble amongst them. And they are in great perplexity, thinking that some of the gods are the givers of all good things, others again to be their enemies, and so seek to please them with gifts as they would do wicked men; and they are verily perwaded, that they shall N sustain great damage by their means, except they do daily pacify their wrath by frequent gifts.

What is the cause of such error concern ing God.

What is the cause of this shameful ignorance, and erroneous iniquity concerning God? Truly I am perfwaded, For that their first Law-makers were themselves herein to fecke, and ignorant of the nature of God, or else that they did not faithfully deliver unto their Common-wealth, so much as themselves knew concerning this point; but as though it had been a thing of least moment, did wilfully let it pass, giving licence to Poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleased, and that the Orators should write of the Common-wealths affairs, and tell what them liked of strange gods.

Moreover, the Painters and Image-makers amongst the Greeks had a great hand in making

A making of gods, it being lawful for them every one to frame what shap he list, and how he list, some of Earth, others of Colours, and the chiefest god-makers amongst them used Ivory and Gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mutable nature.

And then the ancient gods, whom at first they honoured and revered, as much as they could possibly devise, being now withered with Age, are out of credit, and other youngsters possess their places and honours : their Temples also, some are desolate, others newly erected, as men please. Whereas contrariwise, they ought most constantly to keep their opinion of God, and his Religion.

B Apollonius Molon was one of these proud Fools; but those Grecians that followed the true Philosophy were not ignorant of what I have said of the Nature and Essence of God, but agreed with us in our Opinions, and laughed at their ridiculous Fictions. Which Plato well seeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a Commonwealth, and sendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, lest that he with his Fables should destroy or deprave the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others especially imitated our Law-maker, as he did herein also, commanding his Citizens; that all of them should perfectly learn his Laws, and that for no casualty any strange foreign Custom should be admitted into their City, but that their Commonwealth should be pure, and they persist in the observation of their Laws. But Apollonius Molon not respecting this, inveigheth against us, for not receiving into our society men of strange opinions in Religion, whereas not only we do so, but commonly all C Greeks, yea and the most prudent amongst them.

The Lacedæmonians expelled all strangers, and did not permit their Citizens to travel into other Countries, fearing that both ways their Laws might be corrupted. They therefore are to be spoken against rather than we, seeing they neither admit strangers to converse with them, nor to inhabit amongst them, nor impart their Religion unto them; but we, though not desirous to learn the Religion of other Nations, yet do not deny to impart ours to strangers, who desire to embrace it: which, if I be not deceived, is a token of magnanimity, and clemency in us: but this shall suffice concerning the Lacedæmonians.

Apollonius was ignorant how many matters flood with the Athenians, who boast that their City was free to all Nations : But they did most severely and without all mercy punish those that did but speak any word against their God. For what was the cause of Isocrates's death ? he neither betrayed the City to Enemies, nor destroyed their Temples, but only swore by a strange Oath, which as he said ( whether in jeit or in earnest ) a Devil taught him, and for this offence he was purto death by drinking Hemlock : his Accusers alleging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the Laws and Religion of his Country. And this Socrates sustained being a Citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia : and for that he affirmed the Sun, which the Athenians worshipped for God, to be a fiery stone, he was by the sentence of some few condemned to dye. They also proclaimed that whosoever would kill Diogenes of Melinus, should be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diogenes was faine to deride their mysteries : Protagoras also had been by them taken and put to death, had he not escaped, only for that they supposed him to have written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they used their men at this rate, when they practised the same cruelty upon their Women, one of their Priests being put to death for worshipping a strange God ; their Laws appointing that who ever brought a strange God into their City should be punished with death ? It is therefore evident, that they who enacted such strait Laws, believed not the gods of other Nations ; for had they believed in them, they would not have deprived themselves of the benefit of many gods.

The very Sythians who delighted in man laughter so much, that they very little differed from brute Beasts; yet did they think themselves bound to maintain their own Laws, as best, so that they slew Anacharsis a famous Greek, that came unto them, only for that he seemed to attribute too much unto the Grecian gods; yea, thou mayest find man among the Perfians, who for this cause have been tortured. And it is evident that Apollonius approved the Perfian Laws: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I mean the fortitude they shewed at the burning of their Temples; this Apollonius in all things imitated the Perfians, violating other mens Wives, and putting out their Childrens Eyes; whereas our Laws adjudg him to death, that so useth unreasonable beafts: And neither the fear and terror of Potentates, nor the favour of them whom all men reverence, could ever cause us to forsake or abandon these Laws : neither do we exercise fortitude, to deprive other men of their goods and fortunes by War, but to keep our own Laws : and we who patiently put up all other injury, yet if any man do in our Religion provoke us, we presently seek revenge, not respecting our own ability ; yea though thereby we work our own utter ruine and calamity. What therefore should move us to imitate the Laws of other Nations, when they that made those Laws ( yea even the Law-makers themselves ) did transgress them ? or how can the Lacedemonians avoid reproach for their inhospitality, and neglecting marriage ? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men contrary to the Law of Nature, which fact most shameful they deemed good and necessary ? Yea not content to do so themselves, they also ascribed the like unto their gods to be done by them ( which the Greeks also now of late have done ) and for this cause they I refused to marry with their own Women, judging their satisfaction to be contrary to the precept of Nature : But I will speak no more of punishment, neither how great malefactors those first Law-makers freed from punishment, being bribed with money, and how unjust they were in the Laws appertaining to Wedlock. It is long to examine what great occasions of Impiety they gave. For many have already long ago forsaken their Laws : which cannot be said of us, who for our Laws have suffered loss of our Cities, Fortunes, and Lives, we keeping and persisting in our Laws even unto death ; and if any Jew be in a strange Country, where there is a Tyrant King, yet doth not he so fear him, that he would for his command in any jot transgress our Laws. If therefore we do valorously endure thus much for our Laws, all men must needs K grant our Laws to be very good. But if they say we suffer all these Calamities to maintain wicked or naughty Laws, what punishment are they not worthy of, who having ( as they say ) better Laws than we, do so easily forsake them, whereas we do maintain ours even with our Lives ? But seeing the Antiquity of Laws is the greatest Argument to prove their goodness, I will set down of what Antiquity our Laws are, together with our Law-makers opinion of the Deity ; if therefore any one compare our Laws with the Laws of all Nations, he shall find that ours are of more Antiquity than theirs by many Ages. For our Laws established amongst us have been imitated of all other Nations : For though the first Greeks did pretendedly observe their own Laws, yet all their Philosophers did imitate ours, and our Opinions of God, and taught others L the same manners and conversation : yea, the common people did long since imitate our Piety. Neither is there any Nation, either Greek or Barbarian, who have not after some manner observed a Sabbath as we do, and fasting days, and Lamps, all which they learned of us ; yea many do also observe our Customs concerning their meats, and our unity and concord, wherein we excel all other Nations, our community also and industry in Arts and Labours, and sufferance for our Laws. And which is most to be admired, our Law, not having any to force us to observe it, hath so obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulsion, so are our Laws amongst us without any violence or force : And whosoever doth diligently consider his own Nation and Family, shall find that which I have reported to be true. I will now generally M reprehend the voluntary malice of all men : for either they mean, that we having these good Laws do yet little esteem them, and follow worse, or if they do not so mean, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further Calumny. For I do not take upon me the defence of this cause, for that I bear any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Jews do honour and reverence our Law-maker, and believe that whatsoever he prophesied, proceeded from God : yea, although our selves did not know the goodness of our Laws, yet the multitude of them that imitate them were a sufficient motive to induce us thereunto. But I have at large, and with all sincerity discoursed of our Laws and Common-wealth in my Books of our Antiquity. And now again I have made mention of them neither in contumely of other Nations, nor in praise of our own, but N only to reprove such as have most maliciously and impudently belied us contrary to the known truth : And I think I have already fully performed that which I have promised. For I have shewed our Nation ( contrary to their affirmations ) to be most ancient, which I have proved by the testimony of many ancient Writers, who in their Works have mentioned us.

Our Adversaries affirm us to have come of Egyptians : I have shewed that our fore-fathers came into Egypt out of some other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt, for that we were infected with diseases ; I have proved that our Predecessors came from thence to their own Country by means of their own prowess and force of their own accord. Others labour to defame our Law-maker as a wicked O person, whose virtue many of ancient times, and so long time as hath been since him, do witness.

A It is not needful to speak more largely of our Laws : for they by themselves appear pious and good, and such as do not invite or incite us to the hatred of other Nations, but rather to communion and friendship, being both enemies to Iniquity, and commanders of Justice, banishers of Luxurioufness, and teachers of Frugality and Labour, forbidding all Wars enterprized for Avarice, and preparing the people to shew Fortitude in them, and for them, inflicting inevitable punishment upon their transgressors, not easily to be deceived by glozing speeches, and executing in action all that they in word command : yet amongst us the execution of them and observation is more ready than the words of them.

I therefore confidently affirm, that we do teach more pious and virtuous manners, than B other Nations do. For what can be better than inviolate Piety ? What more just than to obey the Law ? What more profitable and commodious, than to be at Unity and Peace amongst our selves ? and neither to forsake one another in calamity, nor injure one another in prosperity, to contemn and despise death in time of War, and in Peace to labour and till our Grounds, and to use other Arts and Works, and always to think and believe, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and disposeth all things ? If this be either written or observed by any one before this time, we are then to thank them as being their Scholars ; but if they were never extant before, then we are known to be the first Authors, & Inventors of it, Let therefore Appion and Molon perish, and all others that with them are convicted of lying and slandering us. This Book is written to thee C Epaphroditus who lovest the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are desirous to know the same.

DESIDERIUS ERASMUS ROTTERODAMUS,

To the most Virtuous and Learned Father, HELIAS MARCEUS, The Maccabietan Ruler of the Renowned Colledge of the MAGGABEES.

I Have not grudged, vertuous Father, to Dedicate unto thee a days labour; wherein I have perused, and what in me lieth, amended the Book which Ioseph writ of the seven Maccabees brethren: and would it had been in my power more abundantly to have answered your expectation: I have now (for that I counted the Greek Coppy) by the Latine conjectured the Greek, and altered some things, yet but very few. Ioseph doth not falsely boast himself to have attained to the excellency of the Greek tongue, and this Book will sufficiently witness the same, wherein he shewed great variety and emphasis, in so much as he esteemed to have handled that famous work with eloquent stile, and the Ornament of discourse. Saint Jerome for this cause entituleth this Book, Great Eloquence; Suidas εὐαρετον νόον, out of them both we amend the corrupted Stile, and call it ἡ ἀντομαρτυρία λόγιον, that is, The Rule of Reason: For the scope of this Book tendeth all to prove, that Reason is of no force in man, except it bear Sovereignty over all inordinate appetites. This is most evidently proved by the Books of the Maccabees in the Scripture: which Books the Jews did not receive as Canonical, yet do they account it among their sacred Writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledge (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happy) for that it is so blessed as to enjoy so worthy and unspeakable a Treasure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy and fortunate City: yet in nothing more happy, than for that it alone doth in her bosom shroud so many, so sacred, and excellent Pledges of Piety: yet should it be more happy, if it could express their Virtues, whose sacred Reliques it so Religiously keepeth, and imitate their Manners whose Bodies it possesseth; to wit, if in sincerity of Religion, it imitated the Piety of three Kings, and the sacred purity of the seven Virgins, if it resembled the most Valiant young Men, the Maccabees, and the invincible Courage of that Woman, whose valorous Constancy no misery could conquer. And this best portion and part of her felicity, this worthy City might bestow upon her self, yea and double the same. Do thou go forward in that which thou hast in hand, to wit, in spreading the praise of those Martyrs, making that virtuous example more commendable, and your City more famous.

OF THE

RULE of REASON:

A most Eloquent Book, corrected by

DESIDERIUS ERASMUS,

Most lively setting down the Martyrdom of the MAGGABEES.

I Am at the instant request of Polibius of Megalopolis to put in writing the constant Sufferings of the Maccabees worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetorical and pleasing stile, but rather after our own country fashion, thereby to exhort our Nation to patience in their Calamities. But first of all, it is necessary to speak something of Reason, and assign unto it the power and virtue to deliberate. For he who hath once fully determined to suffer all misery for Gods sake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: It is therefore great merit to have so determined; and therefore (as above-said) Reason governeth our inferior passions; and though destiny deny us opportunity to suffer, yet have we suffered all in purposing to suffer all.

Whofo therefore will renounce the World, and aspire only to Coelestial things, must exercise Sobriety, banish Gluttony, Lasciviousness, and all other such Vices as may possess and captivate the mind: He must likewise mount up to the top of Virtues Tower, that from thence he may resist and impugn the Vices of his Body, Grief and Fear.

There are many examples of the Valiant Souldiers of God, which I could produce, but the brave persons descended from one single Woman (not at one, but several births) may suffice.

And first I will speak of Elezar and seven Brethren, and relate what Tortures and Torments their Mother endured: yet cannot man, but only God determine, who amongst them was first, and who last in this noble agony. They therefore, being all of one opinion, resembling one another more in mind than in body, duly considered the frailty of this Life, and neither delighted in the flatteries of the World, nor the alluring enchantments thereof. They valued not torments, fetters, nor any other sort of tortures imposed upon them: To return, they resolved upon patience, and to endure whatsoever the Judges cruelty could devise. I will therefore praise the fortitude of these Brethren, or rather with all truth rehearse the noble conflicts of these holy men; and setting all adulation apart, prosecute with a bare Historical narration, the manner of their Martyrdom.

But before I begin to declare the death of these brave men, I will a little treat of Reason, which, as I have affirmed, is no small motive to Martyrdom. Reason it is that maketh us observe Fasts, and Abstinence; Reason makes us despise Money, by it we are taught not to account of Dignities and Honours, which all men generally aim at, yea Reasons gift it is, that we do resist the heat of lustful desires. Hence cometh it, that having once overcome such things as the flesh delights in, we find our selves a little able to resist, we also learn to despise pains and torments, and by degrees resolve to suffer all things that shall be imposed upon us.

Which that it may more plainly appear, let us search out the cause of this order, and

wee shall find wisdom to be the cause hereof. For no man can determine and distinguish good from evil, that is not endued with wisdom; this wisdom is always accompanied with justice, and justice is still joyed with virtue, and virtue and temperance cannot be separated; so that this wisdom consisteth upon four parts.

Besides these, there are two things that either do cause or hinder passion, to wit pain and pleasure; one of which we do always refuse, and the other we do always desire; yet where pleasure ariseth, and is presently by reasons rule put away, the mind is there strengthened; and pain compared with glory, is through hope of a greater reward countenanced before it come; and being come, our mind is ashamed not to suffer that which before it was resolved to do.

Reason therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we despise torments, and I detest vice; like a skilful Husbandman it pruneth and cutteth away superfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtful humours, only leaving that which may some way be profitable to us.

Thus reason corrects our passion, encourages us to suffer, and supports us in our sufferings. Who is not desirous to eat the flesh of wild Beasts and Fishes? And who is flesh not to eat of feathered Fowls? nay, do not the dainty dishes either from Sea or Land invite us to eat them? What then causeth us to abstain from them? what makes us all define them, and yet none of us eat them? even reason, by which the mind is taught to overcome it self in delightful objects and pleasure, that when occasion of Martyrdom is offered, setting aside all vanities we will not for a little pleasure forget our accustomed virtue.

By reason it was that Joseph (to his great praise) master'd his concupiscence, and resisted not himself to be overcome by his lust, which was but too incident to his age: Reason for worketh with sound advice and mature counsel, that it again recovereth lost friendship, gaineth new, and suffereth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we have also the example of Moses, who had he not had just occasion to be angry against Dathan and Abiram, reason (no doubt) would have caused him to have smothered his passion. Did not our father Jacob with great vehemency reprove his Sons Simeon and Levi, who without reason had used such cruelty, saying, Cursed be your anger? Which anger had it been bridled with reason, neither had they been cursed, nor the other L had perished. For this cause, God the maker of mankind, when he fashioned us and our manners, having finished the lineaments of our body, he placed the mind in it, to rule it with certain concomitant precepts, to wit, temperance, pursuance of that which is good, cleaving to justice, by which rules we might be able to bridle our passions, and observe the precepts of God.

But some will ask me, why we commit wickedness, seeing that reason ruleth our passion? But it is ridiculous to think that reason hath so perfect a dominion: for reasons rule cannot hinder the appetite from desire, but only correct it so far, that it suffer with patience the loss or abstinence from such things as it desired. For example sake, Reason cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can so work, that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from desiring filthy M pleasure, yet can it cause thee not to yield unto it.

Reason therefore cannot eradicate vice, but only bridle it. Witness in this the example of holy David, who fighting against Strangers with great success, and being at Evening weary and faint, retiring into his Tent, that was guarded by Soldiers, he found them all at meat: yet himself being thirsty would not drink, notwithstanding 2 Sam. 2. 18. Water was hard by, because his Religion diswived him, for he had vowed not to drink but from a Fountain in the Camp of the Enemy.

Whilst thus his thirst encreased, three lusty young men armed themselves, and taking with them a vessel, they went unto their Enemies Camp, and assaulted the watchmen, who for fear of death fled, and so they pass through the Camp, till such time as they came where the Water was, and filling their pot, they brought it to the King. But holy David forbiddeth his appetite, that his reason quenched his desire, and shewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the fear of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the Water he had so much wished for, and which had been gotten with such danger, he presently poured it on the ground, as a sacrifice to God, chusing rather to die for thirst, than to offend the divine Majesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due consideration to repress the inordinate notions of the mind, and mitigate the grief of the body. But it is now time to come to our History, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that it is somewhat previous to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisdom and fidelity of

A of our forefathers, that Seleucus King of Asia enriched our Priests, and being a man of another Religion, ascribed all his actions and worthy deeds to the Religion and Faith of our Ancestors. But wicked men madnes could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon, having the High-Priest Onias, and finding no ways or means to be revenged of him in his own Country, went unto Apollonius, Governor of Syria, Phanicia, and Cilicia, and before him in a publick assembly declared, that he could help the King to an infinite treasure, for (saith he) there is hidden in Jerusalem an infinite deale of Gold and Silver, which by right belongeth unto King Seleucus.

Apollonius hearing this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the Gold and Silver to the Treasure-house of Seleucus; and having authority from the King to get it, he levied an Army; and to accompany with Simon, came unto our Country, purposing if any violence were offered, to use the defence of his Soldiers.

When the Treasure-house of our Temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heavy fight to them, to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Apollonius, neither respecting the Tears and intreaties of the old Men, Women, nor Children, pressed into the Temple, they all praying God to punish him, and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Temple, there appeared certain Angels on Horseback with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fiery flame about them, and they daunted the courage of this infidel Apollonius, who presently fell down flat upon his face, and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himself: and rising up, he leaned upon his shoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to stand alone, he was so terrified with the vision he had seen. When by degrees he recollected and found some little hope of recovery, he stretched both his hands towards Heaven, and despairing to obtain pardon by his own prayers for his offence committed, he sought the Hebrews (whose Temple he came to spoil) to make intercession for him, himself with Tears craving pardon for his offence, and not only acknowledging his fault, but confessing himself to have deserved death, and all punishment possible. Holy Onias seeing this, and fearing also, that if Apollonius should then dye, the Hebrews would be suspected to have made him away, made prayers to God for him, and obtained his Enemies life.

Apollonius presently hastened to Seleucus to let him understand what had happened: but when he came he found Seleucus dead; and Antiochus reigning in his stead, a man of Tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Priest: and therefore made Jafon his Brother high-Priest in his stead, Jafon promising Antiochus in recompence to pay him 3600 Talents of Silver every year. Jafon being made high-Priest, and chief amongst all the Nation of the Jews, presently forced all the people to impiety, and to forsake their Religion; so that to build baths, he hindered the defence and completing of the Temple, and many of our Nation conspired with him in this iniquity. But heretofore God was presently wroth: and being displeased, it was not needfull to seek foreign Enemies, for Antiochus himself was incited against them, who warring against Ptolemus King of Egypt, had heard it reported, that the Jews esteem'd him to be dead, yet was he very nobly entertained by the inhabitants of Jerusalem: and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that who fo amongst the Jews refused to offer Sacrifice to the Gods, should presently dye upon the wheel. But the godly-minded of our Nation did little esteem this edict; yea the Women circumcising their infants (as our Law requireth) did afterwards cast themselves down headlong, to the end that they might so obtain a present death without longer delay.

Antiochus perceiving that the severity of his edict could not compel the Hebrews to forsake their Religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; he sitting in an eminent place from whence all the Jews might behold him, calling all of them together, caused Swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the Altar, and to be offered to every Hebrew to eat.

Amongst this whole multitude assembled from all places was one Eleazar a Priest, well instructed in learning and the fear of God, a man aged in respect of his years, of a very reverend countenance, one that was known to all men, & famous for his vertue. To this man Antiochus said thus:

Be advised by me, holy old man, eschew those torments prepared for such as are obstinate, preserve thy reverend age, and cast not away your life, sake the Sacrifice, and eat of the Swines flesh: for it is contrary to all wisdom and discretion to follow the Jews opinion, and refuse that meat, which Nature hath as well ordained for Mankind as any other. full for Gods benefits, when we condemn his graces, and make difference where Nature bath H made none; or what reason is there to show that this beast is more abominable than others? Either all beasts are to be eaten, or else all to be eschewed: it is superstition and folly to bar our selves from any thing by a Law, when we have no other for it, but our will. Set apart those vain and foolish opinions, and at least in this venerable age change thy opinion. And though your Laws are strictly to be observed, yet will they excuse thee, seeing thou dost not sin voluntarily but by compulsion.

Eleazar's answer to Antiochus.

Eleazar was permitted to speak, and replied to Antiochus, who exhorted and pressed him to the breach of his Laws. We, Antiochus, do not follow vain report, but observe the verity of Religion which our Fathers kept, and fear of torments cannot make us embrace another Religion, and forsake our own: yea, suppose our Religion delivered to us by our Fathers had no firm grounds, yet would I not be compelled by torments to forsake it. Do not esteem it a small matter to eat impure meat, and taste of that which is sacrificed to Idols, for it is profane to touch things that are profane. Our Law condemneth your Philosophy, wherein he is most ignorant that thinketh himself most wise.

We are taught to embrace sobriety, to subdue our inordinate appetites, to keep our bodies chaste, to suffer with patience whatsoever for Gods sake is inflicted upon us, and not to deny the Truth, Justice, Piety, or God, who alone is true: and therefore I refuse thee profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eat, as warranted therein by the precept of the Almighty God, whose Laws I have learned to obey, and eschew all meats sacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all vigour that which is expedient for the Soul: and it is no less than Tyranny to compel a Man to that which his Religion forbids, and to command that which is contrary to Justice.

Do what thou wilt, despise us as you please, it shall be returned upon your own head, and you shall be as despicable your self, as others are to you, I will persist in the holy steps of my forefathers, though with Tyrannous hands you pluck out mine Eyes, and rip up my bowels with a knife, thou shalt never conquer me. I will dye secure and patient in the love of God: neither flatter thy self for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: If need be, that I must be sacrificed for Gods sake, thou shalt find me in the vigour and resolution of a young man. Prepare then your fire, and get ready your racks: thou shalt find me more constant in my torments, than before I come to them.

Eleazar's second story.

O sacred Religion! I will never violate thee, the foundation of my salvation, the defence of the believer, the grounds of faith; never will I lift up my hands contrary to thy precepts: never will I believe any thing to be just, which is repugnant to that which thou hast taught me: I will not lose the merit of so many years, nor relinquish the faith I have hitherto embraced. The chaste, pure, and devout Company of Fathers shall receive me into their number, where I shall not fear (O impious King) thy threats. But thou hast changed the name of King to Tyrant, yet thou shalt never alledge against me my deed, my consent, my word.

Eleazar cruelly whipped

Whilst Eleazar, full of constancy and liberty, spake thus, the Souldiers that stood thereabout hailed him to be tortured: stripping him naked, they hang'd him up, & whipped him, and whilst on either side he was beaten, a Crier with an impious voice still cried unto him, Obey the Kings pleasure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not overcome by torment, but suffered all with great patience, and lifting up his venerable Eyes to Heaven, he knew in whom he believed, and to whom he sacrificed his Soul; after which observing his flesh to be wounded and cut on each side of his body, and the blood gushing out in great abundance, he admired his own patience, and thanked God, who was the Author thereof. At last his body being unable to hang longer upon the rack, he fell down flat upon his face, still glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the Souldiers, to gratifie the King, like a mad man spurned and trod upon him to increase his torments. But Eleazar, strong in body and mind, like a right Champion of the true GOD, never shrunk at those pains, but the good old man by patience overcame the cruelty of his torturers, and put his very torturers into admiration of his constancy. Then the Kings Officers coming unto him said;

How long, Eleazar, wilt thou neglect the Kings commands, and refuse to free thy self from torments? eat Swines flesh, and thou shalt redeem thy self from all thou endurest. Eleazar, although in the height of his torments he had been silent, could not without answering endure to hear so profane counsel, but as tormented with this speech, he cried out; We Sons of the Hebrews are not so effeminate as to forsake the way of our Salvation, wherein we have walked even until our old Age, neither are we taught for the avoiding of torment, which will not long continue, to give others example and occasion to sin. It is but a while that this life can last: so that we lose but a small moment for that which is eternal. Far then be it from me to prolong the small remainder of my life by so pusillanimous an action: or expose my self by my Cowardice

A dice to the contempt of the World, you your self would despise me, and upbraid my inconsistency: let us dy therefore courageously, and our Souls take their flight into Abrahams bosome.

The Souldiers seeing his constancy, by the Kings command cast him into the fire, and poured stinking and loathsome liquors into his nostrils. Which the reverend old man most patiently suffered till at length he was consumed with the flame: when he himself departing and giving up the Ghost, he spake after this manner, lifting up his dazzled Eyes to Heaven:

Thou art He O God: from whom life and Salvation proceedeth: behold, I dye for observing thy Laws, be merciful to this thy Nation, and do not forsake them whom thou hast blessed: B therefore direct us in thy bosom, and under the shadow of thy Wings: let my death put an end to all our misery and pacify thy wrath against our whole Nation for their offences: receive me for them all, and bestow them all upon me. And amidst these Speeches he joyfully expired.

It is most true therefore, which we at first affirmed, that Reason regulates our passions, and disposeth us to suffer cheerfully: which once we having determined and resolved the anguish of our suffering is abated, and our resolution and constancy confirmed.

If therefore reason and the inferior powers be at variance, we must subject them to Reason if we will make a perfect Victory. With this guide our Father Eleazar was most faithfully directed: neither to yield or sink under his pains, nor give place to unlawful Reasons victory.

C inticements and allurements: he saved the Ship of his body from the shipwreck that might arise by the tempestuous storms of vanity, and suffered not himself by contrary Winds to be driven from the right course: yea, though it was tossed upon the Waves of Tyranny, yet did it remain found and unbroken, and keeping a direct course, arrived in the haven of Salvation. Never any man did seek so valiantly to defend his City from an Enemy, as this holy old man did his Soul, who amongst stripes, crosses, and flames was still the same man. For as the top of a high Rock standeth safe, and resisteth the Wave without any damage unto it self: even so did the Rock of Reason in this man beat back the rage of those tempestuous Waves that dashed against his body, nor permitting them to break in, and pierce the Celestial and Divine power of the Soul.

D O happy old man, more blessed than all of thy Age! O Priest more sacred than all other Priests! who didst not pollute thy sacred lips with profane meats: impiety found no entrance that way, from whence so many prayers to God had proceeded. The Tyrants cruelty could not prevail against thee: Thou therefore art made an example for all Priests of God to imitate. Such a one behoved it a Priest to be, more strong than torments, more able to suffer than the torturers to inflict punishment, more forcible than Princes commands, yea, and more potent than the fire, wherein thou didst perish: and finally, thou wast ordained to be crowned with the Laurel of Martyrdom for thy sufferance. Thou hast surpassed all Antiquity, thou shalt be an example to all posterity.

Eleazar's praise.

E If then feeble old Age, wherein all strength and heat of body was extinguished, grow unfit for torments (as being already broken with Age) could by the strength of Reason endure so many miseries, who dare deny Reason to be the chief cause of our sufferance? We have seen the highest cruelty hath been overcome by a firme determination to persist in the Service and fear of God: yet many affirm, that every man, who hath the use of Reason, is not able to undergo such Agonies: but their assertion is vain and of no force: for most evident it is, that he only is overcome by pain, whom wisdom hath not armed with patience. And no marvel if he who rashly enterprieth to weighty matters, and without due consideration, do at last forsake and repent himself of that which he so unadvisedly undertook. But if we with due advice and deliberation arm our selves, it is not an easie matter to remove us by any misfortune from our determination: when we foresee and preconsider the distresses that may befall us, when they do happen we are not so much surprized or dismayed, because we expected them before.

He therefore that is wise is resolute and able to conquer his passions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he cometh to tryall, can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wisdom of this old man so much to be admired, seeing Children, and as it were Infants, have deserved the same commendations, and wrought also, and finished in their torturers: for the indignation and cruelty of Antiochus (though overcome by the wisdom of this old man) was but the more increased, and therefore G by wicked counsel he caused seven young Gentlemen of the Hebrews to be brought unto Antioch out of their Castle Seleucidum, who being tender in years, and as he thought

Antiochus caught I saw him, you 5 men of the Hebrews, and their Mother to be brought to Antioch. Marc. 7

though weak and unable to suffer torments, his hope was that either by perswasions, H or tortours, or tortures, he might force them to renounce their Religion. He therefore commanded these seven together, with their Mother Salomana, who now grew ancient, to be brought before him : so they according to his command were brought being very graceful in their persons and every way worthy of so virtuous a Mother ; yea, they resembled Angels, their Faces shining like the clear light of the Sun ; their Eyes sparkled in most comely and decent manner, as testifying, that they surpassed in virtue all other of humane race and condition. The Mother was descended of most virtuous and noble parentage, and so she herself had continued and lived ; but that excellent feature of body and nobility of blood was much dignified by her virtue and fortitude, in which she passed all that could be said in her commendation. I The Tyrant beholding them and their mother together, with a counterfeit smile he accosted the Children in this manner.

The Kings exhortation to the seven brethren.
I wish your good ( O admirable young men : for so both your beauty of body and noble Parentage persuade me ) : do not therefore like mad men resist my command : avoid not only torments but death also. For I desire not only to exalt you unto honour, but also to increase your riches and possessions ; condemn the superstitious and superfluous belief of your own Country-men, and embrace our Religion : Which if you refuse to do ( as I hope you will not ) I will devise such torments, as that I may by a lingering and painful death be able to consume you.

And to terrify them the more, he commanded the instruments of their torments to be presented unto their view. And accordingly Wheels, Rods, Hooks, Rakes, Racks, Cauldrons, Cages, Gridirons were brought forth ; and Engines to torment the fingers and hands, Gauntlets, Aules, Bellows, brazen Pots, and Frying-pans : for these are the names which we find. That which I term Bellows, was a thin plate of Iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a Fan ; and far more horrible devices of torments were shewed unto them, too long to rehearse : whereof they having had a sight, Antiochus said :

Consent unto me, O prudent young men : for if that I command you to commit a sin ; ye do not you offend in doing it, seeing you commit it only upon compulsion. But the young Youshs inflamed with a divine Spirit and Sense, contemned so many kinds of torments, and despised the Tyrants threats and flatteries ; and their constancy ( for they gave him no just occasion ) put the Tyrant into a great rage.

By this it is evident, how much Reason is master over Passion : for if any slothful man not before trained up to it should of a sudden come to such a push, at the very sight of such torments his mind would be troubled, & his countenance appalled, his Legs under him would have trembled, and he with fear have been confounded : so that he would presently have retracted, and professed himself unable to bear up against so many and so grievous torments, laying :

The seven brethren reply to Antiochus.
My self being unwise, what should I have made choice of ? Whether to endure these torments, or accept of their promised benefits ? Whether I should have been moved to pity mine own age, or to compassionate my mother ; God would not have denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereto : and by doing it though against my will, I shall get the Kings favour.

But where Reason and advice taketh place, and hath well trained the mind to perfection, the other consequently followeth : As by the example of these brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eat the sacrificed Swines flesh, as they were commanded. Wherefore ( said they ) O Tyrant dost thou persecute us that are innocent ? We both die and wish to die, and will, until such time as death expelleth life, firmly keep that which God commanded, and Moles taught us. And thou, Tyrant, do not seek to seduce us by pretending love towards us : thou lover of injustice, master of cruelty, deviser of iniquity, the pardon which thou dost offer is to us more painful than punishment : we condemn death, and esteem not thy words, as being by our late master Eleazar taught to despise them. Why then dost thou suppose such pusillanimity to be in us young men, seeing of late thou findest such courage in an old man ? We follow him : thou canst not try and know our minds, except by tearing our bodies thou search them out : We will safely and securely suffer for our God any thing, and leaving this Earth, we shall be entertained into Heaven : and thou for so tyrannizing most cruelly upon innocent Souls, shalt be reserved to eternal fire.

The Tyrant enraged, that he could neither prevail by fair promises, nor by threatenings, caused them to be beaten with Bulls pizelles : and first of all he commanded Maccabeus, the eldest of the seven brethren, to be stripped, and stretched out upon a Rack, and his hands to be bound behind him, and then to be most cruelly beaten, who

A who wearied his tormentors by his suffering ( so great the force of virtue is ) in such manner, that they desired more to leave beating him, than he requested they should leave. This done, he was put upon a wheel, and a weight hanged at his feet, and so threatened round about it, that his sinews and entrails brake, and his pains increased : yet being overcome with pain, his mouth was not for all this stopp'd, or hinder'd from calling upon God, who beheld all ; and repoving the Tyrant for devising those torments for the Innocent, he took strength, and is said to have cried out after this manner.

Bloudy Tyrant, who persecutest the Majesty of God : I whom thou thus torrest, am as Witch, nor one who have murdered and killed another man, but one who dies for justice, observing the Law, and for Charity.

Then when the torturers ( overcome with compassion ) perswaded him to submit to the Kings pleasure, he answered :

O ye wicked ministers of Tyranny ! your wheels are not so sharp and cruel, that I thereby will be forced to forsake Heaven, wherein my mind is fixed : tear my flesh ; yea, if you so please, roast it at the fire : torture and torment each parcel of my body with several cruelties ; you shall for all this find your selves unable to force us young men to impiety.

As thus he spake, a fire was kindled, and he, as he was upon the Wheel racked, was so thrown into the fire : and thus he was by flames and torments so burned, that his bowels appeared ; his mind nothing moved, when his flesh yielded to the tortures, who amidst his pangs cried thus unto his brethren, O beloved brethren, learn of me an example of virtue : consider the strength of an invincible courage : condemn and despise the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God than this Tyrant, who can if he please humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and despoiled.

As thus he spake, he was taken out of the flame, and flaid alive : his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying pan ; and so he departed out of this life, to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the joy of his brethren and mother ; and went before them to Heaven, there to prepare a Kingdom for himself and them.

D After him the second brother, called Aber, was haled by the Souldiers : and before the Tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he caused all those torments to be shewed him, thereby to terrify him : but he nothing thereat moved, and desiring to eat of that foresaid Sacrifice, his hands were bound with Iron chains, and he being hanged up by them, the skin of his body was flain off from the Crowns of his head unto his knees : so that the entrails in his breast appeared naked ; yet in such manner as he might abide greater torments. For he was cast before a cruel Libard, twisting most extremely after blood, to the intent that he might devour with his teeth the meat of his body ; but the beast smelling of him ( no doubt by the great handy work of Almighty God ) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, did no hurt to the

But hereat the Tyrants rage increased ; and the Martyr by suffering such torments, was made more constant, crying aloud :

O how pleasant is that death unto me, which is caused by all sorts of torments for Gods sake ! yea, so much the more pleasant, for that I assuredly hope to find reward for it in heaven. Let these torments inflicted upon me ( O Tyrant ) satisfy thy cruelty ; for my pain is not by thy tortures increased, but rather my pleasure, as thou shalt find by my patience in this Agony. More willing am I to suffer than thou to punish ; yet my pain in suffering is less than thine by inflicting the same upon me. I am tormented for virtue and observing the Law ; and the justice of God shall banish thee from thy Regal seat : Thou by tormenting art tormented, and almost condemned : thy wrath and fury being almost spent upon me in vain, thou shalt not escape the day of judgment : eternal torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profane mind is able to endure, nor thy great power to decline, thy sinful Soul being condemned to eternal punishments. Thus, remaining constant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to Heaven.

Then Machir, the third son, was brought, whom all men now pined for the death of his two brethren, and many exhorted him by his Brothers examples to desist from his brother's Opinion, and so avoid punishment : but he being angry heretofore, replied ; One Father begot us, one Mother bare us, one Master instructed us, we are all of one mind, and all like affected ; do therefore no longer prolong the time in vain. I came hither to suffer, and not to speak : use all your tyranny possible against this body : for you have no power at all over my Soul.

The Tyrant heret moved to see this third nothing relent by his brothers death, devifed more cruelly than humane wit alone could invent. Wherefore he commanded a Globe to be brought, and tyed the holy Martyr about in fuch fort, that all his bones were fet out of joynt and difplaced : whereat the holy Martyr was nothing difmaid.
The skin alfo of his head and face was pulled off, and then he was put on the Wheel : but he could not be rackt any worfe, for that his bones were all difplaced, and did hang one feparated from another in moft painful manner : and when the blood iffued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the ufe of his hands and feet ; but perceiving his life to be fhort, he fpake thus and dyed : We, O Tyrant, endure this Torment for the love of God, and thou the Author of fuch unjuft cruelty fhalt fuffer everlasting pain.

Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth, he was put into a frying pan, and fo I an idit thofe torments yielded up the Ghoft.

Next after followed Judas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perfwaded and entreated to obey the King : but he contemning their prayers and exhortations, fied this with all conftancy: Your fire fhall neither feparate nor fever me from the Law of God;
nor from my brethren, who inftead of this mortal life, enjoy life everlasting. I denounce unto thee, O Tyrant, defolation and overthrow; but to fuch as believe, falvacion: make tryal
of me therefore, thou cruel wretch, and fee if God will forfake me, who both with open and fhedded out Armes received my three brethren which are gone before me, and whom the womb of Joſeph a Mother at feveral times brought forth unto glory.

The cruel Tyrant hearing this, was much moved, and from his Chair leapt down to K torment this Martyr himfelf, and in his Fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth : but he heret not terrified, faid to Antiochus :

*This cruelly will nothing avail thee, neither fhalt thou hereby, Tyrant, as thou fuppoft conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by fecret cogitation to be prayed unto to help his fervants: he provideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth
the prayers of fuch as do call upon him, if they deferve to be heard, and only requereft purity of Soul. For our God knoweth all things before we afk, and before we our felves enter into cogitation thereof, he underftandeth our neceffity: cut out my tongue, thou canft not cut out my mind while my life remaineth. Thofe prayers, which by it I have uttered to Almighty God, have taughte it to fuffer: would God thou wouldeft fo fanctifie all parts of my body by punifhing them. L for thou therein inftituteft punifhment on thy felf, and reward upon me; and thinke not that thou fhalt thus efcape long unpunifhed.*

When he had thus fpoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a ftake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends, and he did patiently endure this, notwithftanding the colour of his face became dead and wan. Being looked from thence, he was put upon the wheel : and then praying for his Country-men, he by death went unto the reft of his brethren.

The death of the 4. brother
fired the 5.
brother himfelf to torments before he was called.

Then Ahas, the fifth brother, before he was haled to torments, fpake in this manner: Behold (thou Tyrant) I come to be punifhed before thou command me, hope not therefore any jot to alter his mind, who as thou felf defireft to be tormented. The blood of my M four innocent brethren, which thou haft fhed, hath condemned thee to Hell-fire: I am to make thee up the number of five, that by it thy pains may be encreafed. Tell me (bloody wretch)
for what offence by us committed doeft thou thus punifh us? for what impiety doeft thou fo persecute us? what villany have we committed? what wickednefs? what naughtinefs have we attempted? This is all that thou canft alledge againft us, that we honour God our Creator, and live juftly in obedience of his Law, and therefore do not efteem thy punifhments: but they are to us honour and Salvation, and not punifhment: we fhall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of us be left free from torment.

Whileft thus he fpake, his executioners by the Kings command took him, and caft him into a brazen pot, and he was pieft down in it, his head to his feet : and afterwa d he fuffered all other torments, which his brethren had endured; yet not amazed, a heret, he fuddenly ftarted up, and thus bitterly inveighed againft the Tyrant: Cruel Tyrant, how great benefits doft thou againft thy will beftow upon us! yea, the more thou art angry againft us, the more acceptable to God fhalt thou make us: yea, I fhould be joyr if thou fhewdeft mercy upon me. This fhort affliction gaineth us life everlasting: if this temporal death fhould not beftide me, everlasting life could not beftide me. And thus he finifht his Agony, and dyed.

Then the tormenters laid hands upon the fixth brother, who was called Areth, to whom the Tyrant made offer either of honour or punifhment: but he difclaiming his offer, faid : Altogether (Tyrant) I be younger in years than my martyred brethren, yet my conftancy of mind to theirs is not inferiour: for we were all nourifht up together, all together in

fructified

A fructified, and we will all dy together in the fear of God. Haften therefore your torments, and that time which thou wouldeft fpend in exhorting me, fpend it in devising tortures for me.

Antiochus heret confounded commanded him to be bound to a Pillar with his head hanging down, in fuch wife as the defluxion of humours might caufe ach: and this done, he caufed a fire to be made fo far off him, that it could not burn him, but ruft him.
He alfo commanded him, as he hung, to be pricked with awils, that fo the heat might pierce into the holes they made in his flefh. Whileft thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered about his head and face, and he then fpake in this manner. O noble fight! O valiant War! O strife between piety and impiety! Thefe men have paff their Agonies, whose Crown of Martyrdom is the punifhment of their persecutors: I do moft willingly follow my brethren, that as by blood I am conjoynted unto them: fo by death I may not be fe-parated from them. Devife, O Tyrant, fome new Torment, for thefe I have already overcome.
O mafter of cruelty, Enemy of piety, persecutor of juftice! we fix Brethren have conquered the Kings power, and what his Kingdom or the whole world could afford. Thy fire is cold and heateth not, and the Kings weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies: our God giveth us more courage to fuffer, than thou haft to punifh: and fo the precept of God remaineth firm in us.

And as he thus fpake, one took hold of his tongue with a hot pair of tongs, and fo with the fame torments, that his brethren had fuffered, being fryed in a pan, he gave up the Ghoft.

C Six of the Brethren being now dead by diverfity of torments, only one of the feven remained alive with his mother, named Jacob, younger in years (but not in conftancy of mind) than the reft of his brethren. He prefenting himfelf before the Tyrant, moved him to compaffion, both for that he was left alone, and the laft of his brethren, and alfo that he was to perifh : wherefore he called the child unto him, and into a place where no inftruments of torments were, and taking him by the hand, he faid thus unto him, hoping to win him by fair fpeeches: By thy brethrens calamity thou now well haft learned, what is prepared for thee, if thou difobey me: deliver thy felf therefore from thefe torments, and I will give thee what honour my kingdom can afford: thou fhalt be a Magiftrate, and General of my Army, and one of my Counfellors.

Thy death fired the youngest brother to comit.

D But perceiving himfelf not to prevail, he caufed the young man's Mother to be called unto him : who coming and ftanding near her Son, the Tyrant faid thus unto her,
Where are now, O worthy woman, all thy Children? Behold of fuch a number, if thou please, the deftiny affords thee one: advife therefore thy Child, and mollifie his obftinate mind by abolifing counfel.

The Mother having heard what the King faid, made her reverence to the King :
which done, that the King might not underftand her, fhe fpake in Hebrew to her Child as followeth :

Pity thy Mother, O fon, and comfort thy forrowfull Mother, who bare thee nine months in my womb, and gave thee fuck three years, and with great induftry have brought thee up to this age. I pray thee, dear fon, confider the Heaven and Earth, and all that in them is, and know, that God created them all of nothing, who alfo of nothing created Mankind. Fear not this Ethnic's pains and torments, but imitate thy brethren, and contemn death, that in the day of mercy I may receive thee and thy brethren again in Heaven.

As his mother thus admonifhed him, he in the Hebrew tongue requested to be unbound, for that he had a fecret to difclose to the King: who being unfettered he prefent-ly ran to the torments prepared : for there was a Frying-pan red hot, that was preparaed for fuch as were to fuffer : unto the which the Child coming, remembering his brethren, and beholding alfo the King, he faid unto him : Cruel tyrant, I now know thee not only to have been cruel againft my brethren, but even cruelty it felf. Wretch that thou art, who gave thee this purple? and who exalted thee to this Kingdom and dignity? even he,
whom thou in us doft persecute, whose fervants and worfhippers thou killeft and tormenteft, for which thy wickednefs thy felf fhalt fuffer eternal fire and torments which fhall have no end.

Thou art of higher dignity and authority in this world than other men, yet be that made other men, made thee alfo of the fame nature that they are : for all men are born and muft die alike. He that kills another, fheweth that he himfelf may be killed: thou tearft and torment-eft thy own picture and image in vain : thou in thy fury killeft him, whom not long fince God created like thy felf, and according to the fame law thou thinkeft all lawful, which thy Kingly power can command : thou pulleft out our tongues, and tearft our bodies with flefs-hooks, and confumeft with fire : but they, who have already fuffered, this, have received everlafting joy for their reward : and thou fhalt answer for all the punifhments inflicted upon them.

Think not that I expect any favour at thy hands I will follow my brethren, and remain constant in our Law. The Tyrant hearing this was wroth, and caused him to be tormented: but his Mother in his torment comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood issued out of his mouth, nose and privy parts, the tormentors not ceasing till life in him was almost spent: but they (by Gods appointment) gave over, and so he took strength again to endure more, than any of his brethren had done; at last, his Hands and Arms being cut off, he lifted up his Eyes to Heaven, and cried, O Adonai, O Sabaor, be merciful unto me, and receive me into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now cease, and grant them mercy, who by us do make intercession to thee:

Having said thus, his tongue being pulled out, he of his own accord went into the fiery frying pan, and so to the great admiration of Antiochus died.

Behold how evident it is, that reason can rule our affections, seeing that Children here-by shewed more constancy, than the Tyrant could shew cruelty. For it was reason's force, that wrought in them that determination to suffer all torments, rather than to forsake the way of Salvation.

These constant young men do fitly resemble inextinguishable Towers, and them, who after a great tempest and shipwrack do safely enter the harbour of Salvation, who guiding their course amidst the boisterous waves, at last obtain the wished shore. For every one of them strengthened the other by advice and good counsel, and none of them was so effeminate as to decline his Martyrdom. None used delay herein, but one followed another example. Let us therefore dy for our Law, and imitate the three Children, whom the Assyrians fury condemned to the fiery Furnace, whose patience spread their fame even unto Heaven.

Whilist thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to pass, that none of them offended, but each one resolute in his Religion, took example of the virtue, courage and constancy of their fore-father Isaac, who understanding that it was God's will, that he should be Sacrificed, refused not to submit his body to his Fathers Sword. Let us (said they) yield our Souls to him, of whom we received both Soul and Body: It is a small matter for us to suffer loss of these members, seeing that we shall in lieu of them receive everlasting bliss. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob do joyfully expect us, as Co-heirs of their Kingdom: let us glorie that womb, wherein we were for ten months space: let none of us be more coward than the other, nor none of us degenerate from the other.

That were all begotten of one Father, and sucked of one milk, must in all things resemble one another: we had one teacher, and one law inviolate. And in this golden bond of concord were these brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to see the other tormented, but all rejoiced at the others death. O Children, whose dignity surpasseth the Royalty of Kings and Princes, whose glory and virtue is unspeakable! None of you were terrified with fear, but you so hastened to your deaths, as though you had been to go to bliss and felicity: you were truly brethren, who even by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our Nation, & in you manifested us all an example of fortitude: whom therefore I think he caused to be so many in number, as were the days, wherein he created the World, so that these seven brethren may resemble the seven days, wherein all things were made. And why should we so admire this fortitude in these young men, when a woman armed her self with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a Mother, but to be honoured with a higher title than humane frailty can afford, who bare into this World so many triumphs.

For the Mother seeing her Children dead, was with a kind and godly zeal inflamed also to suffer: and no marvel, seeing that the very brute beasts, if they perceive violence offered to their young, do expose themselves to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and talons; yea, and every one, that is any way able to make resistance, opposeth her self to the Enemy to defend her young. And not only brute Beasts do this, but even Bees do defend their young, and their honey, threatening their Stings to them that offer to tast thereof, and more esteeming the good of their young than their own lives. But this zealous mother directed by the Spirit of God, and the dictates of reason, encouraged her Children to dy, and being to dy after them chose rather to be a spectator of their death than otherwise.

When all her family had suffered, she as the last and glory of them all came to execution despising the Tyrants threats, offering her motherly breast to those torments, which her Children had suffered. O blessed flock, and blessed increase of the self same womb! Why should I not affirm, that in all lineaments and feature of the body you are like your mother? and if this be a commendation in them, that beside

A features of the body receive nothing of their Mother, I will say more of you, that you are like your mother in Fortitude, Verue, and Religion: and that you so in all things resemble her, that you are every way equal unto her, save only herein, that the with her Eyes beheld the immaturity of your torments, and was afterwards as constant in her own Martyrdom, as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that she suffered seven torments before she came to suffer in her own person, & feared in every one of them lest she should be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou barest these Children in thy womb, or createdst them, who couldst with dry Eyes look upon them, whilst they were torn in pieces: yea, I say little, affirming that thou patiently didst behold those fights; for even thou thyself didst exhort them thereunto; thou rejoicedst to see one of them torn in pieces with Eleth-hooks, the other to be racked upon the Wheel, the third to be bound and beaten: thou joyfully admiredst the others burning, and exhortedst the rest not to be terrified here with; and although, whilst thou beheldst their torments, thy grief was greater, than that which thou hadst in Child-birth, yet didst thou bear a lightome and chearful countenance, as though it had been one triumphing. While they were a killing, thou didst laugh, and seeing only one of all thy Children left hereat thou didst nothing relent. Can I describe how every one perished, seeing thou their mother didst laugh at their deaths, and when their sinews were cut in two, their heads flaid, their tongues pulled forth by the Roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and cast upon Iron plates red-hot, and upon Wheels, and their ribs pulled in sunder, and many other toments for which we want names? Never was any Swan, which (if you will believe antiquity) Sings sweetest before her death, comparable to the Funeral notes of thy dying Children.

And you, blessed offspring, were not overcome by that Syrens enchantments, but to honour God scrupled not to leave your Mother without Childen: And the being as pious & brave on her side, chose rather to want you for a time, than to incur eternal damnation, wishing rather that the bodies of her Children should be tormented, than their Souls. Well she knew, that nothing was more frail and infirm than our bodies, which, through persecution be wanting, are often killed with Ages, and other Maladies: Who is ignorant, that shipwrack is incident to Sailors, & disasters to them that travel, sudden death to those that live at ease? sudden casualty by fire, and by the hands of Thieves, and a thousand other ways to dispatch our lives? Seeing then that our mortal bodies are subject to so many miseries to bring us to our end, who would not make choice of a quick dispatch, whereby we lose goods of this World and gain life everlasting? O thou most reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our Religion, who, like the Ark of Noe, didst persist inviolate amongst such stormy Waves! for as the Ark withstood the force of the deluge, and being built strongly with firm boards, did not suffer any thing within it to perish: so thou sufferedst not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghost, which thou hadst received in thy heart.

Behold of what force and efficacy Reason is: which oftentimes maketh men inferior to women. For neither was Daniel so tortured at the sight of the Lions, nor the three Children with the fiery Furnace, as this woman was afflicted at the death of all her Children, before she came to her own Agony. What would another woman and Mother have done in this Case, but wept, and with pitiful lamentations have cried? Ah wretch that I am! most unhappy and miserable of all that breathe who therefore bare so many Children into this World, that their several deaths might be so many several occasions of my grief and sorrow: she would have commemorated her frequent labours, & the pains she endured in her ten Months bearing them, she would have bewailed her ill fortune, who brought forth her sons to so many deaths and dangers, she would have recounted the milk wherewith she fed them, and their meat she had prepared for them, the pains she had taken with them, how she had carried them in her Arms, and sung to them, and taught them to speak; her cares, her watchings, her fears, lest any mischance should betide them; and with weeping tears would have said, Shall I never be a Grandmother, and embrace your Children, who a while ago was a fruitful mother my self, but am now deprived of you all? If this day I dy, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all these complaints, that another mother would have made, and with an Adamantine fence more impeneable than the never-yielding Rocks, did neither forsake her Children in their torments, nor in their death, but rather compelled them to perish, and never forroved thereat. For being apprehended, together with her seven Sons, she considering Eleazar's Martyrdom, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew tongue.

The mothers freely exhorting her seven Sons to suffer.

O my most dear and loving Children, let us hasten to that Martyrdom which may make us a H credit to our Nation, and gain of God an everlasting reward; let us without fear present our selves unto those torments, which Eleazar's aged body endured, calling to mind our Father Abraham of worthy memory, who, having but one only Son, did sacrifice him, being brought by God so to do, and feared not to bring him to the Altar, though he was the fruit, and only comfort of his age. Isaac also was willing to be sacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be said of Daniel and the three Children: believe me, we are rather tried than tormented. For whatsoever this World affordeth is mortal and transient.

A Golden saying of the mother of her off-ven Children.

Thus did this mother arm her Childrens minds with fortitude, and though a woman insufed courage and constancy into men. And when her Children were all dead, the I a worthy mother of so many Champions, kneeling down in the place of torment, be sought God to put an end to her life, protesting, that she had not for love of life so long deferred to dye, but only for her Childrens sake, and that now she had seen them all seven triumphing. Whereupon the rage of Antiochus grew hot, and he commanded this noble person to be tormented, and accordingly (as the Tyrant willed) she was stripped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and most cruelly whipped: her dugs and paps were pulled off, and she put into the red-hot Frying-pan, being most willing to follow her Childrens steps in torment; and lifting up her Eyes and hands to Heaven, she prayed for all women with Child, and so yielded her chaste Soul to God. But Antiochus was stricken with fire from Heaven. O thou! mistress of justice who followed it K thy triumphing Children: O Conquerer of Tyrants, and a Looking-Glass for all Martyrs!
O example of patience! not only to women, but to all men that shall be after thee, reverenced of them that now are, and to be worshiped of them that are to come, and to be admired not only of our Nation, but of all other people. Thy light obscureth the bright shining Moon: and though she fill the World with her brightness, yet is she not comparable to thy shining light. Seven lights environ thee about, dazzling the brightness of the seven Planets. Could any Painter express, or any hand in writing declare the torments which you suffered? none could with dry eyes read or behold them.

The light of the just.
1. Cor. 15.

All people would flock about to see it. All people would praise, and esteem him to have offered a great gift, who to God's glory had painted so incomparable a picture, L And if any skillful workman should engrave this Tragedy upon a Sepulchre, or in his house, doubtless he should be freed from all plague and misfortune. But where could a stone be found able to contain so many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the Mother and her seven Sons are for their Nobility graced with a Sepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea, even by men that are not of our Religion; and there is a constellation of eight stars ordained as an argument of their justities: and Angels did execute their Funerals. The Tyrant himself was astonished to see the constancy of such godly minds. And thus have they found such favour in the sight of God, that they have obtained remission of the sins of our Nation:
For presently after the Tyrant was destroyed, and Israel was freed from his Tyranny.

Antiochus did

2. Mac. 9.

An Epitome of the life of the seven Sons and their mother.

But Antiochus, seeing the greatness of their Faith, and their contempt of death, gathered an Army of Foot out of the Hebrews, by whose help he terrified his Enemies, and got great Renown. O blessed seed of Abraham! behold what benefit the Sufferings of the Mother and her seven Sons brought to us their Country-men! let us persist in this piety, that so we may belike our Forefathers: behold! the death of a few did end all the miseries and sins of our whole Nation, and you by your Country-mens hands vanquished their persecutors Enemies, & after that victory our sins were remitted; & last of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrails devoured with Worms, he smelling like Carrion, gave up the Ghost, and was ever after death punished for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Jerusalem to forsake their Law, he made War against N
the Persians, and there received that which he deserved.

It now remaineth, that we briefly repeat all that is before said. For in her Agony, this sacred mother said thus unto the standers by: Whilst it was lawful for me, I kept my self a Virgin, and then I married and lived a Chaste Wife, and forsook not my own house. I brought forth such Sons, as I need not be ashamed of; and though damned with my Husbands death, yet I did not forsake my Faith. This, and many things else she recounted. And what more? She set before her Childrens Eyes the examples of the Prophets; how Abel by his brother was slain; Isaac to be offered in stead of a sacrifice; how Jacob was bannished, Joseph kept in prison, Daniel cast before the Lions, the three Children into the o-fery furnace: She rehearsed also unto them the Book of Jstah, where it is said: Although

A though thou do go through the fire, the flame shall not burn thee. That of David,
The just shall have much tribulation; and Solomon, who propoeth the tree of life to such as do the will of God; not omitting that of Ezekiel, These dry and withered bones shall live again: Also that of Moser Canticle, I will kill and restore to life, and the length of your days is in my hand. Unhappy Tyrant, what did thy Cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what availed thee to cut away their Eye-lids, and to pull out their tongues? thou thy self for so doing dost now endure far worse than all these. And they whom thou killedst (believe me) enjoy Everlasting comfort, and are now secure of bliss and revenge. For they, who suffer for Gods sake, shall have happy success, when God the Father of all things shall reward them with life everlasting that follow him. Thus have I consecrated these worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the sacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, who shall live in any age hereafter.

PHILO'S RELATION OF AN EMBASSY

(In which he was the Chief Person)

From the Jews of Alexandria to the Emperour CAIUS CALIGULA.

The PREFACE of Philo, upon the blindness of man, and the incomprehensible Grandeur and Majesty of God.

HOW long shall we confound old Age and Infancy, and be as imprudent as sixty, as at sixteen? For what greater imprudence can there be, than to look upon Fortune as a settled and certain thing, when there is nothing more inconstant, and to consider this Nature (which is inmutable) as subject to continual changes? Is it not to invert the order of things, and shuffle them together like Counters? to fix our Eyes upon uncertain things, as if they were more firm and durable than those which were certain? The reason of this Error proceeds from this, that present objects do more easily affect Men of ordinary understanding, than objects that are more remote, and most men do allow more credit to their Senses (though deceitful) than to the reflections of their mind: because nothing is more easy, than to suffer our selves to be taken with what is presented to our Eyes; whereas there must be Argumentation and Reason to comprehend things that are future and invisible. Not but that the Eye of the Soul is as quick and piercing, as the Eye of the Body, but some people dazzle it by their intemperance, and others by their stupidity, which is the greatest fault of all.

So many extraordinary events happening in our Age, enforce a belief that there is a providence, and that God Almighty takes particular care of virtuous Men, who have recourse to him in their necessities, and more especially of those who are consecrated to his service. M They are as it were the heritage and property of this Supreme Sovereign, whose Empire has no end. To these people the Chaldeans gave the name of Israelites, which is as much as to say, Secret of God, and certainly it is an happiness, preferable to all the Treasures of the Earth: For if the presence of those, whose age renders them venerable to us (as our Masters, Superiors, and Parents) imprints so great a respect in us, that it many times corrects our Errors, and disposes us to virtue; How great an advantage, and encouragement is it to us to elevate our minds above all created things, and accustom our selves to the contemplation of God, who is not only uncreated, but infinitely good, infinitely beautiful, infinitely happy, or (to speak more properly) whose goodness surpasses all goodness, whose beauty surpasses all beauty, and whose happiness surpasses all happiness, and yet this is but a weak and imperfect explication of his Grandeur: for how can words be able to describe him, who is so transcendently above every thing, that after our mind has advanced it self as high towards him, as is possible, by the attributes which it has given him, as by so many stairs, yet it is forced back again without being able to approach or understand him? for he is so vastly incomprehensible, that, if every Creature of the Creation was changed into so many Tongues, they could not express that sovereign power, by which he Created all things; that Royal conduct meriting an Eternal Monarch, and by which he preserves the World, and that just distribution of rewards and punishments, which are dispensed with so much equity and wisdom, that our chastisements may be put into the number of his Mercies and Blessings, not only as they are part of his justice, but as they are many times more capable to the conversion of sinners, or as least as they restrain and hinder them from continuing in their Crimes for fear of those pains, which they see inflicted upon others.

CHAP. I.

The incredible Felicity of the first seven Months of the Reign of the Emperour Caius Caligula.

The Emperour Caius Caligula is an Eminent example of what I have said: Never was there seen a greater tranquillity, than that which was enjoyed by all the Provinces both by Sea and Land, when he was advanced to the Empire after the death of Tiberius: The East, the West, the North and South were all in profound peace: The Greeks had no difference with the Barbarians: The Souldiers and Citizens lived quietly and in good intelligence together. So great a felicity seemed to be incredible: & it could not be sufficiently admired, that so young a Prince mounting the throne should be attended with so much prosperity, that his desires could not exceed his enjoyments: His Riches were immense, his Forces both by Land & Sea great and formidable, his Revenues prodigious flowing, into his Exchequer (as from an inexhaustible Stream) from all parts of the habitable World: For his Empire extended to the Rhine, and the Euphrates, the first separating it from Germany and other wild Nations, and the other bounding it from the Parthians, Sarmatians, Scythians and other people no less barbarous than the Germans. So that it might be said, from the rising to the setting of the Sun, not only upon the continent, but in the Isles, and even in the parts on the other side of the Sea, all was in peace and felicity: The people of Rome, all Italy, and all the Provinces both in Europe and Asia lived in a perpetual feast: For it was never seen before under the Reign of any of their Emperours, that every man by the blessing of God enjoyed his estate in that quietness, and bare so great a share in the public felicity, that there was nothing wanting to his desires. In all the Towns there was nothing to be seen but Altars, and Victims, and Sacrifices, and Priests in their white Robes, with Garlands of flowers upon their head. All places were full of Cheerfulness, Feasting, Playing, Musick, Running of Horses, Banqueting, Dancing to the Flute, and the Harp and all other Divertissements imaginable. No difference to be discerned in the contentment of either Rich or Poor, Common Persons, or Persons of Quality Masters and Servants, or Creditor and Debtor. The felicity of that time was equal to all conditions, and what was verified then, made it almost credible, what the Poets had said formerly in their fables of the age of Saturn. And in this manner they passed seven compleat Months.

CHAP. II.

E The Emperour Caius, having Reigned but seven Months, fell desperately ill: The great concernment which all the Provinces expressed for it, & their incredible joy at his recovery.

The next Month this happy Emperour fell into a great fit of sickness; for having left his old way of living soberly and temperately, which preserves people in health, and was the way he took, whilst Tiberius was alive, he plunged himself into Intemperance and Luxury: He drank much Wine, eat to excess, bath'd unseasonably, cram'd himself, till he could not keep what he had taken down, and when he had disgorged, crammed himself again: He gave himself up wholly to Women, and to pleasures more unnaturally criminal; in short he abandoned himself to all other disorders that were most likely to alter that Temperament and Harmony of body and mind, which Temperance maintains in health and vigour; whereas Intemperance weakens it, and exposes it to Distempers, that are most commonly mortal.

It was then about the beginning of Autumn, which is the last Season in the year that is proper for Navigation, and the time in which those, who traffick in foreign parts, return home. By this means the news of his sickness was in a moment carried all over the World, and changed their joy into sadness. The Towns, and the houses were generally full of mourning and affliction; and the Emperours sickness became the distemper of all the Provinces; and theirs was the greatest, because his infirmity was only in his body, but theirs in their minds, apprehending to loose with their peace the enjoyment of all those good things, which were concomitant with it, and having observed the

the death of their Emperors attended commonly with Famine and other calamities, that H are the consequents of War, they could not see any thing so likely to exempt them, as the health of their Prince.

His sickness beginning to abate, the news was immediately spread abroad, and carried joy to the very ends of the Earth; For nothing is more numble than fame; and every body expected the news of his recovery with incredible patience; and when it arrived every body believed himself recovered with him, and restored to his former felicity. It is not remembered, that any joy was ever so general, all people seeming to have passed, as it were in a Moment, from a savage and rustick, to a soft and a sociable life; from Desarts to Towns; from Disorder to Order; and all by their happiness in being under the conduct of a bountiful and legitimate Prince. I

CHAP. III.

The Emperor Caius abandons himself to all sorts of Debauchery, and with horrid ingratitude, and terrible cruelty obliges young Tiberius, the Emperor's Grand-son, to kill himself.

BUT it was quickly discernable, that the Spirit of man is blind in its imaginat-ions; that he is ignorant of what is most for his advantage, and that he takes the shadow many times for the substance. For this Prince, who was consider'd as an admirable Benefactor, and one whose Munificence and Favours were spread all over Europe and Asia, became a Monster for cruelty, or to speak more properly, he discovered that humour, which though born with him, he had dissembled till that time. The Emperour Tiberius had by his Son Drusus (who dyed before him) this young Tiberius; and by his Nephew Germanicus he had Caius Caligula, whom he preferred to Tiberius in the Succession of the Empire upon condition, that he should acknowledge the greatness of the benefit by the manner of his comportment with his Grand-Child: But Caius, instead of being concerned for having received that by Adoption, which belonged to young Tiberius by Succession, prov'd ingratfull, and carried it to that excess of Inhumanity, that I not contented to have defeated him of his Empire, he caused him to be put to death upon pretence of practices against him; as if a person of his age had been capable of so great a design; but many people are of opinion, that if young Tiberius had had some few years more over his head, his Grandfather would doubtless have made him his Successor, and laid aside Caius, of whom he began already to be jealous.

And this was the way which Caius took to execute his detestable Resolution upon a Person, with whom in justice he ought to have parted the Sovereignty. He caused the young Tiberius to appear before him, assembled his friends, and told them, I love Tiberius, not only as my Kinsman, but as my Brother, and I wish with all my heart, it was in my power to take him presently as a partner into the Government, that I might thereby fulfil the last will and Testament of his Grand Father: But you see the tenderness of his years, and that he is fitter to have a Governor, than to be a Governor himself. Were it not for that, what joy, what ease would it be to me to have discharged my self of part of so great a burden, as it is to manage and conduct so many several Nations: Seeing then the affection which I bear him obliges me to it, I think good to declare to you, that I am resolv'd to serve and take care of him, not only as a Governor, but as a Father; by which name I desire he may call me, and I shall call him Son for the future.

When Caius by this Artifice had deluded all that were present, and by his counterfeit Adoption rather rob'd, than confer'd upon the poor Prince that part of the Empire, to which he might lawfully have pretended, there was nothing left, that might obstruct his falling into that Snare, which he had laid for him: for the Laws of the Romans do give the Parents an absolute power over their Children, and then the Supreme degree of authority in which he was established, left no man in a Capacity to question any thing he did. So that looking upon this young Prince as an Enemy, he treated him accordingly without respect to his age, or any consideration, that he had been brought up by the Emperour with hopes of succeeding him in the Government: for after his Father Drusus was dead, the Emperour took him into his tuition, and used him rather like his Son than his Grand-Child.

O
It

A It is reported, that Caius commanded him to kill himself in the presence of several Tribunes and Captains, forbidding them strictly to give him any assistance, because (forsooth) it was not decent, that the dependents of an Emperour should die by any inferior hands: For he would needs pass for a strict observer of the Laws, at the very time when he broke them, and a Bigot in Religion, when he was committing so great a Crime, without the least compunction or remorse for making a Stalking-Horse of the truth by so strange an hypocrisy.

The poor Prince, who had never seen any murders before, nor been accustomed to those counterfeit Combats, in which young Princes are usually exercised in time of Peace, presented his Throat to the person who stood next him, but he and all the rest refusing to dispatch him, he took the Dagger himself, ask'd them where he was to strike, and they in their great Civility having instructed him, he stab'd himself immediately, and that with many blows, till by a lamentable and unmercifull compulsion he had murder'd himself.

CHAP. IIII.

Caius puts to death Macro Colonel of his Pretorian bands, to whom he was oblig'd both for his life and his Empire.

WHEN Caius had finish'd that business, which of all his affairs was of the greatest importance, there being no body left that could pretend to the Empire, or to whom any turbulent persons could in prudence apply, he turn'd his indignation upon Macro, resolving, that he also should feel the effects of his Cruelty and Ingratitude.

This Macro had not only serv'd him faithfully since his advancement to the Throne, (which would have been no extraordinary thing, because Princes who are fortunate shall never want flatterers) but he had been a great means, that Tiberius had chosen him for his Successor: For besides that there never was Prince of greater Sagacity and Penetration than Tiberius, the experience, which his years had given him, gave him so large an insight into the secretest Cogitations of Man, that he began to be jealous of Caius: he suspected him an Enemy in his heart to the whole family of the Claudii; and that if he had any natural affection at all, it was only for his Relations by the Mothers side, so that Tiberius began to be apprehensive for his Grand Child, if he should leave him a Minor. Again he looked upon Caius as incapable of the Government of so great an Empire, by reason of the weakness and levity of his parts, which seem'd rather inclining to folly than otherwise: so little Solidity was there to be observed either in his word or his actions: But there was no Stone that Macro left unturned to discuss these suspitions, and especially his apprehension for his Grand-Child.

E He assured the Emperour, that Caius had an extreme respect for him, & so great an affection for his Cousin, that he would willingly leave the Empire to him, & that it was nothing but his reticence and modesty, that made people think him weak in his intellectuals. When Macro found these Reasons would not work, he feared not to offer himself in Caution: and the Emperour had no reason to suspect his Sincerity after the Testimony, which he had given of it not only in discovering, but defeating the Conspiracy of Sejanus. In short, he was always commending Caius, (if it may be called commending to undertake his justification against all uncertain surmises, and undetermined accusations) and carried himself so towards him, that, if Caius had been his Brother or his Son, he could not have done more: Several have attributed the Cause to the respects, which Caius always shew'd to Macro, but more to the good offices of his Wife, who for some private Reasons was always crying him up, and magnifying him to her Husband, and every one knows the influence of Women, especially if they be immodest, for then no Art nor Flattery can escape them, that may conceal their transgressions from their Husband. Macro, being ignorant of some passages in his house, interpreted these artifices for affection, & the greatness of his Enemies pass'd in his thoughts for the trust of his friends. That he had preserved Caius in so many dangers, and could not imagine, that he would ever be ingratifull, gave him the confidence to admonish him with great liberty upon an apprehension, that he would either ruin himself, or be corrupted by other people. He was like a good workman, jealous of his own manufacture, and could not endure it should be spoil'd. Caius falling asleep one day at at the Table, Macro was bold to wake and admonish him, that it was neither decent nor H recourses for he in that condition might easily be slain. When Caius was looking upon his Dancers or Mimicks with such extraordinary pleasure and attention, that he could not contain from imitating their Gestures; when not contenting himself to smile, or be pleas'd, he brake out into a loud Laughter among the Comedians or Buffoons; or when he sung or play'd among the Musicians, he jog'd him Gently, if he was with in reach, to the end he might give over, and told him in his Ear, what nobody else durst have ventur'd to have said.

You are not, SIR, to abandon your self to the pleasures of your sense like other men, but are rather to surpass them in gravity and prudence, as much as you transcend them in dignity and extraction. How strange will it appear, for the Monarch of the World, to be unable to moderate himself in such slight and contemptible things? The great honour, that invites you, obliges you to do nothing unsuitable to the Majesty of so great and so redoubted an Emperor:
 When you are in the Theatre, or Circus, or in the place of any publick exercise, you are not to consider the show or spectacle so much, as the pains and care, which those persons, who present it, have taken to do it to your content; and are to argue thus with your self: If these persons have taken so much pains in things that are useless to the life of man, and only serviceable to the pleasures of the Spectators, that thereby they may merit their applauses & acclamation, what is there incumbent upon a Prince, who professes an art infinitely more estimable? Do you not know, that there is nothing equal to governing well, seeing it causes plenty in all places capable of Cultivation, and secures Navigation, by which all the Provinces have Commerce, and communicate their respective Commodities? Envy and Jealousie, to frustrate this happy Communication, have like poison infected some persons, and some Towns: But since your August Family has been advanced to the Sovereignty and Supreme power, which extend it self, as well over the Seas as Lands of the whole Earth, it has repelled these monsters into the most reclyse and obscure Solitudes. To you alone it is that this supreme Authority is committed.
 Providence has plac'd you, as a judicious Pilot, to manage the Helm. It is your office to look to the good conduct of this incomparable vessel fraught with the welfare of all mankind; and as so noble an office is above all estimation, you ought not to take pleasure in any thing so much, as in rendering so many Nations, as are under your dominion, happy by your benefits. 'Tis true they may be oblig'd by particular persons, but it is from their Prince, only they are to expect this excellent conduct, by which he shows down his bounty upon them with full hands, reserving only such things, as in prudence are necessary for the remedying of such accidents, as cannot be foreseen.

Thus it was, that this unfortunate Counsellor advis'd Caius with designe to have made him better; But his wicked nature turn'd his remedies into poison, made a mock of his counsel, and became much worse; in so much as, when Macro came towards him one time, he said to those who were then about him: Do you see that impertinent Schoolmaster, that ridiculous Pedagogue? he would take upon him to give instructions, not only to a Child, but to a person wiser than himself. He prates, as if a subject was to command an Emperor, and an Emperor, that is not ignorant in the art of Governing, and he believes himself excellent in that science. But I would fain know, where he learned it. For my part, I was brought up to it from my Cradle, receiving continual instructions from my Father Brothers, Uncles, Cousins, Grand-Father, Great-Grand-Father, and many other great Princes, from whom I am descended both by the Father and Mother, without so much as mentioning the seeds of virtue, which Nature mingles with the blood of those, she designs shall command: For by the same reason, as Children are observ'd to resemble their Parents not only in the lineaments of their face, and the qualities of their mind, but in their very gestures, inclination and actions, by the same reason those, who proceed from a Race accustomed to domination, do receive with their existence a disposition, that makes them capable of all the impressions necessary for the formation of a great Prince. I therefore may say, that, when my Mother carried me in her womb, and even before I was brought into the World, I was instructed in the art of Governing, and yet a private person, whose thoughts have nothing in them that is noble and sublime, has the confidence to give me Counsel in the Conduct and Regiment of my Empire, which to him is an impenetrable mystery.

In this manner Caius conceiv'd every day more and more aversion to Macro, endeavouring to charge him with false crimes, but such as might at least carry in them some appearance of truth; and of this sort he believ'd he had found one by these words, which fell from Macro upon a time.

The Emperor is of my making, and has no less obligation to me, than to those who brought him into the World. Three times by my prayers and contrivances have I rescued him from the fury of Tiberius, who would have put him to death; and when Tiberius, who would have put

A put him to death, and when Tiberius dyed, I caus'd him to be declared Emperor by the Guards, which were under my Command, remonstrating and inculcating to them, that the only way to keep the Empire entire was to pay obedience but to one person.

Many people approved this discourse in Macro, as knowing it was true, and not yet understanding the inconstancy and dissimulation of Caius: But not many days after the unfortunate Macro and his wife were put to death; which was all the recompence that the ingratitude of Caius afforded to the fidelity of his servant, for having secur'd him against death, and advanc'd him to the Empire. Some say, Macro was compell'd to kill himself, and that his wife did the same, though it was more than suspected Caius had been kinder to her formerly. But what is more unconformable than love, by reason of the frequent exceptions and disgusts that happen, where the affection is irregular?
 Nay so infatigable was the cruelty of Caius, that he put to death the whole family of Macro, leaving not so much as one of his Servants alive.

CHAP. V.

Caius caus'd his Father in Law Marcus Syllanus to be slain for giving him wife Counsel: and the Murder of him was followed by the Execution of several others.

WHEN this perfidious Prince had in this manner quitted himself of his Competitor in the Empire, and of a person to whom he ought both his authority and life, there was a third design that remained to be executed, to the perpetration of which he employ'd his utmost address. His Father in Law Marcus Syllanus (who was a person of great Generosity, and of illustrious extraction) after the death of his Daughter who died very young) continued to Caius the affection of an own Father rather than of a Father in Law, believing that, though the Princes was dead, he could not but have the same sentiments for him. Upon this score he spake to him with great liberty about the measures, which he was to take by his actions to answer the hopes which were conceived of him: But Caius, being to vain an Opiniater, that instead of owning or mending his faults, he flattered himself with a Fancy, that he was excellent in all kinds of virtues, & look'd upon those as his Enemies, who gave him good counsel, he perverted the good Counsel of Syllanus, reputed it an insolence, grew insupportable towards him, and could not endure any longer to have him an impediment to the irregularity of his passions. After this he banish'd as well out of his thoughts as his heart the remembrance of his wife, and by more than barbarous Cruelty caus'd him to be put to death for Treason, from whom the had received life, and who ought to have been respected by him as an own Father. The noise of this murder, which was followed by the execution of several others the most considerable in the Empire, was spread all over the World: every body spake of it with horror, but in private, their fear obstructing the publication of their resentment. Nevertheless the people being easily deluded, and not without difficulty to be perswaded, that a Prince, who had appeared so good and so gentle, should be so suddenly changed, it was said in his excuse. That, as to the death of the young Tiberius, the Sovereign power could not admit of a Partner: That he was only prevented by Caius, for if his age would have permitted, he would have treated him in the same manner: That it was perhaps by the Providence of God, and for the benefit of the whole World, that Tiberius lost his life, to secure the Empire from Civil and Foreign Wars, which would have divided into factions by the several great persons, who would have possess'd the interest both of the one and the other: That nothing is more desirable than peace: That Peace cannot subsist but by good conduct in the Provinces; and that a Province cannot be well govern'd, unless the Government be in a single person, whose authority maintains all things in quiet and repose: That, as to Macro, he was grown so sallow and proud, that in appearance he had quite forgot that excellent direction of the Oracle at Delphos, Noce te ipsum, which is a thing so necessary, that with the knowledge of one self one cannot fail to be happy, nor avoid being unhappy, when it is not attained: That it was insupportable for Macro to see himself up above the Emperor, as if it was not his office to command, and the subject to obey: In this manner it was that the ignorant either out of flattery or sely interpreted the whole sense of Macro: and, as for Syllanus, it was said, that it was ridiculous in him to pretend to as much power over his Son in Law, as a Father has over his own Son, seeing those Fathers, who are but (saxen, d. j. b.)

mit without trouble to their own Children, when they are advanced to any dignity or office, and that it was imprudently done in him to imagine, that, being but his Father in Law, he should have a right to interfere in publick affairs, without considering that his alliance with the Emperor was extinguished by the death of his Daughter, Marriages being but outward ligaments, which, though they joyn Families together at present, yet they are broken upon the death of either of the parties.

This was the discourse, which was used in some of their assemblies to excuse the Emperor's cruelty; for there having been none of his predecessors, of whose meekness and bounty they had conceived a better opinion, they could not (as I have said) imagine he should be so changed in a Moment.

CHAP. VI.

These horrid and criminal actions passed in the mind of Caius for so many victories obtain'd against the most considerable persons of his Empire; For his fury had extinguish'd the lustre of the Imperial Family in the blood of his Cousin young Tiberius, whom he ought in justice to have taken into the partnership of the Government. His abominable inhumanity had exasperated the Senat by the death of Syllanus his Father in Law, who was one of their greatest ornaments: and his horrible ingratitude had taken away the life of Macro a person of the first Rank in his Court, and to whom he was oblig'd particularly for the Grandeur, to which he was advanc'd.

Having perpetrated these great things, he believed, that, there being no body left, who durst oppose himself against his pleasure, he ought not to be satisfied with the greatest honors, that could be confer'd upon man; but that he might expect and challenge what was given to the Gods; and it is reported, that to persuade himself to this strange an extravagance his argument was thus:

As those, who conduct and have the care of Herds of Cattel whether Oxen, or Sheep, or Deer, are neither Oxen, nor Sheep, nor Deer themselves, but men of a nature infinitely more excellent, than the nature of those animals: so they, who have the command of all the men and Creatures in the World, ought to be considered as more excellent than men, and receive reverence like Gods.

Having admitted this ridiculous fancy into his head, and taken the boldness to publish it, he came by degrees to the effects: He began first to desire to be revered as one of the demy-Gods, such as Bacchus, Hercules, Castor and Pollux, Tryphon, Amphiarus, Amphilocus and others; but he laugh'd at their Oracles and Ceremonies, and ravill'd them from them, that they might be attributed to himself.

He changed his habit and dress like a player. Sometimes to personate Hercules he wore a Lions skin about his shoulders, and a Club in his hand: sometimes he wore a Hat like Castor and Pollux; and sometimes in imitation of Bacchus he wore the skin of a young Hind. But in this point he differed from those pretended deities, that, whereas they were contented with their respective and particular Ceremonies without envying what was confer'd upon the rest, he required them all, that he might be accounted above them.

Nevertheless that, which contracted the great throng of spectators, was not that he had three bodies like Gerion, but because he transformed himself into as many different shapes as Proteus, who, as Flower describes, changed himself into several Elements, Animals, and Plants.

But, Caius, this vain resemblance with these Demy-Gods was not the thing, you ought to have affected; you were rather to have imitated their actions and virtue. Hercules by his glorious labours delivered both Land and Sea from such Monsters, as troubled the repose of mankind: Bacchus, who was the first that planted the Vine, brought a liquor into the World so pleasant and comfortable both to the body and mind of man, that it made them forget their sorrows, exhilarated and fortified their hearts in such manner, that the effects of it are still seen in the dances and festivities, not only of the most civiliz'd, but of the most barbarous Nations. As to Castor and Pollux, the two Sons of Jupiter, it is not said, that one of them being immortal and the other mortal, he, who had the advantage of immortality, not being able to think that his brother should die, would needs equal and debase himself to the condition of his Brother by communicating

A meeting to him part of his immortality, and in some measure subjecting himself to death, which was the gentlest expression of kindness that could be imagined. These Herces then, who were the admiration of their own ages, and are still the wonder of ours, were not adored and reverenc'd as Gods, but for their benefits and good actions to man. But, Caius, what have you done in imitation, that may in courage you to such an exaction? To begin with Castor and Pollux: have you imitated the perfect friendship that was between those two Brothers, and made them so glorious? you without compassion to the youth and tenderness of him, who ought to have been to you as a Brother, and with whom you were in justice obliged to have shar'd the whole Empire, you (I say) have cruelly embrued your hands in his blood, and sent his sisters into Exile, to reign with the more security and quiet your self. Have you imitated Bacchus, and diffus'd an universal joy and cheerfulness over the whole Earth by any admirable invention? you, who being to be considered no otherwise but as a publick Plague, have found out nothing but new inventions to turn that joy into sorrow, that cheerfulness into sadness, and make peoples lives a burden: You, who in recompence of the infinite wealth and advantages, which flow in to you daily from all parts of the World, do with your insatiable avarice crush and deprels your people with the weight of so many new Tributes and Impositions, that you enforce them to abominate your horrible inhumanity. Do you imitate Hercules in the nobleness of his actions, and in the difficulty of his Labours to introduce and establish peace, to distribute justice and restore plenty both at Land and at Sea? you, who on the contrary being most lazy and fearful of your sex, have banish'd all order, and quiet, and happiness, to introduce disorder, and trouble, and all kind of misery in their places. Is it then by these measures you think to pass for a Demy-God? and do you desire to be immortal, that you may continue these afflictions eternally? Is it not more rational on the other side to believe, that, if you were really one of the Gods, the odiousness of your conduct would degrade you, and tumble you down again into the degree of a man, seeing vice is as efficacious to make people mortal, as virtue to immortalize? Forbear then to compare your self to Castor and Pollux, who were so much Celebrated for their Brotherly love, after you have been so cruel as to have murdered your own Brother; and do not pretend to the honors, which are given to Hercules and Bacchus who signalized themselves by their good deeds, whilst your crimes and iniquities are sufficient to render them useless.

CHAP. VII.

The folly increasing every day, he exalted the honour of a God, and imitated Mercury, Apollo, and Mars.

BUT the arrogance of Caius rested not there: he thought it beneath him to be honoured as a Demy God, and therefore pretended to be equal with the Gods. At first he would pass for Mercury, and habited himself like him, wearing a Caduceus in his hand and winged Buskins upon his Legs. To represent Apollo he appeared another time with a Crown upon his head glittering with Rays, a quiver at his back, with Arrows in his left hand, and with his right hand distributing Largeesses among the people, to shew that his bounty was greater than his exaction.

After that he instituted sacred dances, in which songs were sung in praise of this new God who before, whilst he personated Bacchus, contented himself with the names of Ecceus, Licars, and Liber. Many times also, when he represented Mars, he arm'd himself with a head piece, a Cuirasse, and a Buckler, showing himself publicly with a naked Sword in his hand, accompanied with Bravo's and Hectors ready for any murders that he should command them, and all to imitate the fury of that deity, who breath'd nothing but slaughter and blood. So extraordinary a spectacle fill'd with astonishment the minds of his people, who could not sufficiently admire, that he should pretend to any resemblance with those, having nothing of their virtue or good qualities to recommend him, and that he should expect to take upon him the marks of that good, which they had procured to mankind. For what else is signified by the Winged Buskins of Mercury, but that he was an Ambassador of the Gods, and an Interpreter of their wills, the Greek name implying no otherwise, but that he was the messenger of happy news, which he conveyed with expedition? And not only a God, but a man would with great difficulty be persuaded to be the messenger of bad. The Caduceus

What did it import, but that he was the Stickler, and Mediator in Tretries, and all matters of Peace; seeing men also used the same upon the like occasions, and otherwise there would have been no end of the ill consequences of War? But that Caius put on his winged Brodequins upon his Ankle, was it to publish and spread abroad thorough all the Provinces the noise of his Crimes, which ought rather to have been buried in perpetual Oblivion? And why should he give himself so much trouble, when without stirring from his place, he committed such an infinite number of impieties, which streaming incessantly from that detestable source, overflow'd the whole world, and was a more pernicious Deluge than the former? And why should he carry a Caduce, when there was nothing to be found either in his words or actions, that had the least appearance or tendency to Peace; But on the contrary, there was not a Province or Town in all Greece I or Babary, in which he was not the occasion of division and troubles? Let our pretended Mercury then quit that Name, which is so unfuitable for him.

And as to Apollo, In what was it that he could pretend to resemble him? Was it in the glittering of his Crown, as if the Sun and the Day were more proper for the commission of Evil, than Darkness and Night? There are none but actions that are virtuous, and worthy of praise, that are fit for the Day, whilst actions that are wicked and scandalous ought to look out the thickest and most private obscurities in Dens and Caves.

This counterfeit Apollo has no less overturned and perverted the Order of Physick; For, whereas the true Apollo invented wholesome and salutiferous Remedies for the Cure of Maladies, this made use of nothing but such poisons as were mortal and destructive. His insatiable avarice animated him principally against the greatest and most opulent persons of Italy, because among them there was more Gold and Silver to be found, than in all the rest of the World; and had not God Almighty delivered it, there had not been a place in the whole Empire, that his avarice would not have pillaged, ruined, and destroyed.

Apollo was celebrated likewise not only for his excellency in Physick, but for his Predictions, which by his Oracles he communicated for the good of Mankind, that they might not sink under those Calamities which hung over their heads. But the Oracles of Caius extended no further, than to the foretelling to the most illustrious, and best qualified persons, Confiscation, Exile and Death; the only favours, that were to be expected from his oppression, injustice and tyranny. What similitude was there then betwixt these two Apollo's? And what shame was it, that Songs should be sung equally in commendation of them both, as if it were a less crime to attribute to a vicious man the honours, which were due only to a God, than to counterfeit Money, which carries but the Image of a Prince?

But nothing was more strange, than to see a man, whose Mind and Body were so notoriously effeminate, arrogate to himself the force and courage of Mars, and delude the Spectators by changing his Habit as frequently as a Player upon a Stage. For in what was it that he might be said to resemble not only the fabulous Mars, which is but a fiction, but the true one (if there was such a one) which he desired to resemble, that has a Courage generous and beneficent, always ready to relieve the oppressed (as the Greek word signifies) a Courage, that by just and lawful Wars was still followed with a happy and an honourable Peace. For Mars hath two Names, One implying and representing him a lover of such Peace, as conduces to the tranquility of the Publick; and the other describing him, as a lover of War, which cannot be accompanied but with Calamity and Confusion.

CHAP. VIII.

Caius takes a prejudice against the Jews, because they would not, like other People, Reverence him as a God.

I Suppose I have clearly demonstrated, that Caius had but little resemblance with the Demi-gods, and less with the Gods themselves. Never Prince had more wicked inclinations. He embraced blindly and with an immoderate vehemence whatever came into his mind; his ambition was little better than madness; his obstinacy was invincible, and his irregular desires had no bounds in the abuses and outrages which he committed by his Power.

The Jews (formerly happy enough) felt the deplorable effects of it: for he looked upon them as the only persons capable of opposing his Designs, in respect that from their Infancy they had learned from their Parents by a constant Tradition (and it had been inculcated and confirmed to them by their sacred Laws) not to acknowledge any but the true God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth; For all other Nations, though groaning under the burthen of his tyrannical domination, in flattery complied with his desire, and by that means augmented his presumption and vanity.

Several Romans were not alhamed likewise to prostitute and dishonour the Liberty of their City by introducing into Italy the same base conformity and submission, which the Barbarians used in their pusillanimous Adorations. But he knew that the Jews, on the contrary, rather than consent to the least violence or intrenchment upon their Laws, ran to death as to immortality. For as a Stone cannot be taken out of a Building, but by little and little the whole Fabrick will run to ruine; it is the same in matter of Religion, to the destruction of which nothing could contribute more, than such an impious and audacious enterprize, as the pretending to change a mortal Man into an immortal God, which is far more difficult, than that God should be changed into a Man; besides that it would open a door to horrible infidelity, and dreadful ingratitude towards God Almighty, whose infinite Goodness is perpetually sprinkling and dispensing his Mercies and Favours upon all Creatures.

This was the occasion of that cruel war made upon our Nation: and what greater misfortune can befall any Servants than to have their Master their enemy? But the Subjects of Emperors are Servants; and whereas the moderation of the Princes, which governed before Caius, made their Dominion gentle and pleasing to all People, his Government was insupportable. Mercy was a Virtue unknown to him and so far was he from any remorse, that he made it his boast, when he trampled upon the Laws and abolished them, to make room for his own Violence and Tyranny. But the principal Object of his Fury were the Jews: It did not satisfy him to use them as Servants, but he treated them as Slaves, and as the most vile and abject of Slaves: So that it may with too much verity be affirmed, That they had in him, instead of a kind and indulgent Master, a cruel and unmerciful Tyrant.

CHAP. IX.

The ancient Inhabitants of Alexandria take occasion of Caius his animosity to the Jews, to do them all imaginable mischief: They demolish most of their Oratories, and erect Statues of Caius in their places: Indignities that were never practised under Augustus or Tiberius. The Praise of Augustus.

WHEN the Pique, which this Emperour had against the Jews, came first to the knowledge of the Inhabitants of Alexandria, who had had always a mortal and inveterate quarrel against them, they thought they could never have a fairer opportunity to revenge themselves; and therefore, as if they had received Orders to that purpose from the Emperour, or, having overcome the Jews in Battle, the right of War had exposed them to their fury, They fell upon them with irresistible violence, forced their Houses, turned their Families out of doors, sacked, plundered, and carried away all the best of their Goods, and that not in the night like Thieves, who were fearful of punishment, but at noon day, exposing and shewing what they had taken to every body they

they met, as if they had been their own, and bought with their money; some of them, H by a detestable association in that impious action, sharing their plunder in the Marketplace in the presence of those very persons which they had robb'd, and added mockery to their violence.

But what is it to have brought such People to indigence as were rich and splendid before; to have forc'd them from their Houses, and expos'd them like Vagabonds to all the injuries of the Air? These inhumane Alexandrians drove the Jews with their Wives and Children from all parts of the Town to coop them up like Beasts in so close a place, that not having given them liberty to bring any thing with them, they doubted not but that they would dye either with hunger, or the infection of the Air; Free respiration being so necessary to the Life of Man, by reason of the heat of the Bowels, that it is like adding fuel to fire, instead of fresh and cool air to refrigerate the Lungs, to give them nothing but the hot stifling Air of a great throng of People crowded together in a Press.

In this extremity these poor People, at least to take Breath, dispersed themselves, some into the Desarts, some along the Sea-Coast, and others into the Sepulchres; and if in any place of the sayd Town any of the Jews appeared, as not knowing what had pass'd, the Alexandrians knocked them down, or lam'd them with stones or with Cudgels, and handled them in the same manner as they did those who had escap'd out of that little place, where they had throng'd so great a multitude.

These cruel Persecutors upon the Banks of the River way-laid the Jewish Merchants, who traffiqu'd to Alexandria, they robb'd them of their goods, and burnt the Merchants alive; some in fires made of the wood of their own Vessels; others in the middle of the City, and that in a way more cruel than the other; because their fire, being made of a greener and more moist wood, choak'd them with the smoke, as well as tormented them with its flames; others they drew with Cords thorow the Streets and Market-places with such fury and indignation, that, their death being unable to satisfy their rage, they trod their dead bodies under their feet, and tore them into so many pieces, that had any body been so well dispos'd as to have buried them, he would not have found any thing remaining that might have exercised his Charity.

When they perceived the Governour of the Province (who in a moment might have appeas'd a greater Commotion) did not only connive, but encourage it, by pretending to be ignorant; they grew more insolent and audacious; they assembled in Troops, ran in great throngs to the Oratories of the Jews, (which were many in all the quarters of the Town) cut down the Trees that were about them, demolished some of them utterly, burnt others, and the flames of them consumed several of the neighbouring Houses, by which also the guilt Bucklers, Statues and Inscriptions, which the Roman Emperours had set up in honour of the Courage or Virtue of several of the Jews, which ought to have been revered, were burnt and consumed.

In short, Nothing was able to restrain their madness: For in stead of apprehending punishment or Correction, they understood the hatred which Caius had conceived against the Jews, and that nothing would please him better, than to have them treated M with that terrible Cruelty.

Again, to cajole the Spirit of this Prince by their new flatteries, to oppress and destroy us with more security, and invade and subvert our Laws without fear, they set up his Statues in such Oratories, as they were not able to demolish by reason of the great number of Jews which gave them opposition: and that, which they erected in the principal of all the Oratories, was placed in a Chariot drawn with four Horses in Brass, in which they were so ardently zealous, that having no Horses lately cast, they took them out of the place appropriated to their publick Exercises, lame and crippled as they were, and as was reported, made antiently for Queen Cleopatra, the last of that Name: Which N action of theirs ought rather to have offended Caius than otherwise: For seeing he affected extraordinary honours, though the Horses had been new, yet having been made for a Woman, they were unworthy of him; and though they were set up in favour of him, yet they were too much spoiled and imperfect to give him satisfaction. Besides they thought they should merit very much by changing these Oratories into Temples, to augment the number of those which were dedicated to him; which nevertheless they did not so much in honour of him, as in hatred to our Nation. And of this there needs no better proof, than that for three hundred years together, during the reign of ten of their Kings, they never consecrated a statue to any of them in their Chapels, though they placed their Kings in the rank of their Gods, and gave that Title to some of them, And O it is no wonder, that, though they knew they were but men, they should honour their Princes

A Princes like Gods, seeing they payed the same adoration to Doggs, Wolfs, Lyons, Crocodiles and several other amphibious Creatures, inasmuch as all Egypt is full of Temples, Altars and Groves consecrated to their honour.

But as they were the greatest flatterers in the World, and considered the Fortune more than the person of any Prince, they will answer perhaps, That the Roman Emperors being more puissant and prosperous than their own Kings, it was but justice to give them more honour. What answer can be more ridiculous? For why then did they not give the same honour to Tiberius, to whom Caius was obliged for his Empire, since that Prince reigned three and twenty years with such prudence and felicity, that he prelev'd to his dying day, not only the Greek Provinces, but the Barbarous in profound Peace, and the enjoyment B of all things? Was it that in his Birth he was inferior to Caius? He excell'd him on both sides, both by the Father and Mother. Was it that his Education or Learning was less? What person in his time was wiser or more eloquent? Was it that his years were not so many, and by consequence his Experience not so great? What Emperor ever ended his days in a happier old Age? And even in his Youth was not his capacity and judgement wonderful; which is not commonly acquired but by number of years? yet you never thought him worthy of such extraordinary honour.

What shall I say likewise of that inestimable Prince, who seem'd by the Eminence of his Virtues, to be rais'd above the condition of men; and by the multitude of his good deeds, and the felicity of his Reign, was the first who merited the glorious name C of Augustus, and having received it himself from no body, transmitted it to his posterity? The Sea was in opposition against the Land, and the Land against the Sea. Europe was in Arms against Asia, and Asia against Europe. All the Grandes of the Empire divided to determine who should remain Master, and it may be said, that the whole race of mankind was ready to perish by this bloody and cruel war kindled at the same time in all parts of the world; when in so horrible a Tempest this great Prince took the Reader into his own hand, restored Peace to the whole World, renewed Plenty and Trade, civiliz'd the Manners of the most barbarous Nations, overwhelm'd as it were all the great Towns with so much happiness, that they might have pass'd for Free States, maintain'd Peace, encouraged Justice, and forbore not unceasingly to pour out his Favors D upon the People with full hands, even to the end of his days.

This incomparable Emperor had Egypt under his Dominion for three and forty years together: yet you never paid him that honour, which you have done to Caius; you set not up his Statues in the Oratories of the Jews, though never Prince deserved so much reverence as he, not only as he was the Foundation of the August Imperial Family: But as he was the Uniter of that Sovereign Power, which was divided before, and used it with such moderation, that thereby he procur'd the publick Felicity, there being nothing more certain than that laying of the Antients, The Government by many is most dangerous in respect of the mischiefs which do follow over diversity of Judgement. The Example likewise of other People ought to have oblig'd you: for in all other places they paid him E divine honour, and consecrated many rich Temples to him, such as are not to be seen (either Ancient or Modern) in other Towns, and particularly in Alexandria: For what other is comparable to that, which upon his account bears the name of Sebastian, built near the Port, and in such esteem with Mariners and Sea men? It is so spacious and lofty, it is visible a far off. It is full of excellent Pictures, admirable Statues, and other rich Presents both of Silver and Gold, that have been offered by great Persons: nothing is more Magnificent than its Portico's, its Quire, its Galleries, its Library, and its Grove. In so general a Concourse of People, could any man of sense say, That this was not to pay Augustus all the honour that was due to him, except putting up his Statues in the Oratories of the Jews? No without doubt: But that which hinder'd it F then was, that they understood that incomparable Prince took as much pleasure to see every body live regularly, and according to the Laws of their Country, as he did care to have the Roman Laws put in execution; and if he received any honours extraordinary from the blindness of his adorers, it was not that he approved it himself, but that he thought it might conduce to elevate and enhance the Grandeur and Majesty of the Empire. For what can be a greater instance of his Moderation, and that he would not suffer himself to be puff'd up or dazzled by the vanity or extravagance of their respects, than that he would never admit the Title either of a God or a Master? and indeed not only rejected that flattery, but express'd great approbation of the horror and detestation of those which declare for such things? Otherwise how could he have permitted that the G Jews (the greatest part of whom have been Enfranchis'd by such Masters as had taken them Prisoners in the Wars) should be allowed to possess in Rome to great a part of the City as lies beyond the Tyber? He was not ignorant that they had their Oratories, where they met for their Devotions, especially on their Sabbath day; That they raised their Tenth to send them to Jerusalem, and that they offered their Sacrifices there also. Yet he did not Banish them from Rome; and he was so far from abolishing their Religion, or subverting their Laws and their Customs, that he gave rich Presents to our Temple, and ordained, that every day Sacrifice should be made to God Almighty, which is observed to this day, and will be observed for ever, and remain an eternal Mark of the virtue of that incomparable Emperour.

He ordered likewise that the Jews should be comprised in the publick distributions of Money and Corn, which were made among the People in certain Months; and if it happened those Distributions were made upon their Sabbath-day, at which time it is not permitted among them to do or receive any thing, especially for their own profit and advantage; he took care that their portions should be reserved, and delivered the next day; which made the Jews so considerable among other Nations, that, though naturally they had no kindreds for them, yet they durst not molest them in the exercise of their Religion.

And Tiberius treated them in the same sort, though Sejanus did what he could by his Calumnies to ruin those who inhabited at Rome, because he knew they could not be brought to joyn in his abominable Conspiracy against his Master. And this Prince sent afterwards to all the Governors of Provinces, that, except some few who had been meddling in that Plot, all the rest of the Jews should be well treated, and not obliged to change any thing of their Customs; because they were naturally peaceable, and had nothing either in their Laws or Manners contrary or inconsistent with the Tranquillity of the Empire.

CHAP. X.

Caius being already enraged against the Jews of Alexandria, was much exasperated by an Egyptian called Helico, who had been formerly a Slave, but was then in very great favour.

CAIUS having passed to that degree of Vanity, as not only to pronounce, but to believe himself a God, he found no People either among the Greeks or Barbarians more ready than the Alexandrians to humor him in his extravagant imagination: For there are no People more subtle, more hypocritical, more flattering, nor greater lovers of Confusion and trouble, than the Inhabitants of that Town. And so little is their respect for the Name of God, that they make no difficulty to attribute it to Ibis, and several other Creatures. And as they are very prodigal of that honour, they do easily delude such, as are not acquainted with that impiety in the Egyptians, whereas it is impossible to do so with those, who do know and detest it.

Caius being ignorant of their cunning, supposed it was real and not pretended, that they thought him a God, because they proclaim'd it publicly, and with all the formality and acclamations, wherewith they were accustomed to declare their respects towards their Gods; besides he considered the facillities they had committed upon our Oratories, as a great testimony of their Zeal; and there were no Poems or Histories that he could read with so much delight and pleasure, as the Relations that were sent him upon that Subject.

Those who made it their business to applaud or decry what ever lik'd or displeased him, contributed much to that humour, for most of them were Egyptians, and unfortunate slaves, brought up from their infancy in that abominable error, which prompted them to pay divine Worship to Serpents and Crocodiles. The chief of this abominable Band was a wicked fellow called Helico, who by his ill practices had wrought himself into the Court. He had some smattering of Letters, and he, whose slave he was first, and had taught him his knowledge, presented him to Tiberius: But that Prince had never any great esteem for him, by reason that the manner, in which he had been educated in his youth, had rendered him grave and severe, and made him despise every thing that was not serious. When after his death Caius succeeded to the Empire, this dangerous creature observing that there was nothing dissolute or voluptuous, to which Caius was not inclined, said thus to himself: Now is the time, Helico, that must needs be favourable to your designs; be sure you do not neglect to improve it to your advantage: You have a Master

A as you would desire your self. You have access, and are acceptable to him; your wit is pliable enough; you have a faculty in Drolling; and those tricks and inventions which are so apt to dispose People to mirth, are your excellence and element; you are versed in the Liberal and all other Sciences; you do not only know how to please by your flatteries, but by expressions, whole cunning (the more dangerous by how much it is more secret and occult) excites (specious and indignation against them, whom you have a design to prejudice, when your Master is in an humour to hear you; and that he is ready almost always to do, so much is he disposed to bear any thing of Calumny or Reproach; you need not trouble your self much for Subject, for with this the Jews will abundantly supply you, you have no more to do but to declaim against their Laws and their Customs, and that you have learned from your Infancy, not only from particular persons, but from most of the inhabitants of Alexandria. Let us see then what you can do.

These things running in Helico's head, he stirred not from Caius either night or day, and in the times of his private relaxations and diversifements, he left no opportunity of incensing him against the Jews by his forgeries and suggestions; which were the more effectual by being slyly and wittily delivered, for he would not profess himself their Enemy, but acted cunningly and sulkily; by which means he did them more mischief, than if he had openly declared himself.

When the Embassadors of the Inhabitants of Alexandria, who had acted so cruelly against us, understood how much this wretched man was serviceable to them, they gave him not only money, but hopes of procuring him great honours, as soon as the Emperour should come to Alexandria, where they did not question, but he would suddenly be; and on the other side there was nothing but he promised them, so much did he hug himself in the hopes of receiving those great honours in the presence of the Embassadors, who would not fail to repair to so famous a City, from all parts of the World, to pay their Complements to so great a Prince.

Having no knowledge that we had an Enemy so dangerous and considerable as Helico, we aimed only to defend our selves against such as were professed; But when we found it we applied all our Interest and industry to sweeten and take him off: No man did, or could do us more mischief than he; for he was one at all Games, at all Recreations, Feasts and Debaucheries with Caius; His Office of first Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber (which was one of the best places about the Court) gave him the advantage of his Ear when ever he detired, and his Master took great pleasure in hearing him: He laid aside all other designs, and intended nothing so earnestly, as to ruin us by his Calumnies and Scandals, which he did with so much artifice, and mingled them with his Jokes in so pleasant a manner, upon pretence of entertaining of Caius, rather than malice to us, that he made such an impression against us in the Emperours mind, as we could never extinguish.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews of Alexandria appoint an Embassy to Caius to represent their Sufferings; in which Embassy Philo is chief. Caius receives them kindly in appearance, but Philo found he was not to be trusted.

AFTER we had tried all our skill to make Helico our Friend, finding it was but labour in vain, because he was so insolent and proud no body durst come near him, and not knowing besides whether it was from any personal or particular spleen against us, that he provoked and exasperated the Emperour to our Destruction, we concluded to flee another Course, and resolved to present a Petition to the Emperour, which should contain in short what we had Remonstrated not long before to King Agrippa, when he was at Alexandria, in his passage to Syria, to take possession of that Kingdom, which had been conferred upon him by Caius: Hereupon we departed for Rome, secure, as we thought, of finding the Emperour an equitable Judge, whereas we could not have had a mortaller Enemy. He received us in the field of Mars, as he was coming out of his Mothers Gardens; his Countenance was pleasant and cheerful, his Words obliging, he made a sign with his hand that he would be our Friend, and sent us word afterward by the Master of the Ceremonies called Honus, that he would hear our business at leisure: In so much as there was not one of those who were present, nor indeed one of our whole Nation (unless of more than ordinary sagacity) that believed not our Embassy would succeed to our desires, and every body came and Complimented us thereupon:

upon : But my age and experience in Mundane affairs giving me a further prospect and penetration, that which transported other people became suspected by me : for I reasoned thus with my self :

How comes it to pass that, Embassadors being here from all quarters of the World, we should be the only persons, to whom the Emperor should vouchsafe to send word, that he would give us Audience ? For, do's not he know, that being Jews we should think our selves happy to be treated like other People ? Can we without folly expect favour extraordinary from a young Prince of another Nation, or believe that he has not greater inclination for the Alexandrians than for us, and makes such haste to determine our business in obligation to them ? I wish to God that, in stead of being an equal Arbitrator, his sentence be not Arbitrary, and that he does not prove himself our Enemy and their Protector.

CHAP. XII.

Philo and his Collegues discover, that Caius had commanded Petronius the Governour of Syria to set up his Statue in the Temple of Hierusalem.

WHilst these thoughts were in my head, and gave me no quiet either night or day, another misfortune that could not be foreseen, and portended not only the destruction of a part, but of the whole Nation of the Jews, fell out to accomplish my trouble. We waited upon the Emperor to Patetoli ; to which place being retired along the River for diversion, he entertain'd himself in the Houses of Pleasure, which are numerous, and very Magnificent, not thinking in the least of our Affairs, though he had ordered us to follow the Court, and we were ready, expecting every hour, when he should have decid'd our Controversie ; when on a suddain a certain Person came to us, with his Eyes staring, his Breath spent, and an universal discomposure in his Looks ; he took some of us aside, and said, Have ye not heard the terrible News ? He would have proceeded, but his Tears came so fast upon him, that they stifled his Words so strangely, that, do what he could, it was not possible for him to go on. One may easily conceive our astonishment and surprize. We conjur'd him to tell us the cause of his affliction, seeing it was nothing in appearance but for weeping before us ; and if the occasion was worthy of so many tears, it was but just (being accustomed to sorrows as we had been) that we should consent, and add our Compassion to his. He made a new effort, and told us with more sighs than words, The Ruine of our Temple is decreed ; for the Emperor has ordered his Statue to be set up in the Sanctuary, and to give the Name of Jupiter to it as an Inscription. The unexpectedness of the news made us almost immovable, and it was quickly confirmed to us by other People. We immediately retired, and shut our selves up in our Lodgings, to lament the general destruction of our Nation, and sorrow being Eloquent, what was it that it did not prompt us to say ?

Having in this manner expos'd our selves in the midst of Winter to the perils of a dangerous Voyage in hopes to have found some redress for our Sufferings, we met upon the Land with a Tempest much more cruel, than those which happen at Sea, because they are natural, and by consequence supportable ; whereas this was caused by a man, who had nothing humane but his shape, by a young Prince, who lov'd nothing but change and trouble, and who seeing his Will and Pleasure sustained by the whole Power of the Empire, he suffered himself to be carried away without any restraint to all Licentiousness and Tyranny ; which was an Evil the more great and deplorable, because not capable of any visible remedy. For who durst be so bold as to represent to him, that it was not consistent with his duty to violate the sanctity of the most August Temple in the World ? Or could one indeed without the loss of his Life have remonstrated against so great an impiety ?

Let us dye then (said we among our selves) seeing nothing can be more honourable, than to lay down our Lives in defence of our Laws. But our Death not being able to produce any good effect, and being Embassadors as we are, may it not be to augment the affliction of those who sent us, and give advantage to such of our own Nation, as have no friendship for us, to say, that to deliver our selves from some present inconvenience, we desert the Interest of the Publick ; though the lesser Interests are always to give place to the greater, and Private to Publick. For in the subversion of Government, all the Laws, by which its Grandure and Consilience was maintained, do for the most part suffer the same Fate, and are abolished with it.

A May it not be imputed to us likewise as a crime to abandon the Jews in Alexandria, by abandoning an affair in which their Safety or Ruine is involv'd, and the Safety or Ruine of our whole Nation, and leave them in fear, that a Prince of his Violence and Cruelty will entirely destroy them ?

If it be Objected, That seeing, which way so ever we resolve, no Success is to be expected ; why should not we think of retiring in safety : I Answer,

That to do so, we must have either no hearts, or no knowledge in our divine Laws. God perhaps will make use of this opportunity as a tryal of our Virtues, and to see how we are disposed to comport under affliction : Rather, in stead of placing our safety in the uncertain succours of Man, let us put our whole confidence in God with a firm Faith, that he will assist us, as he has assisted formerly our Forefathers, when their Perils were (in appearance) beyond all Remedy. Thus it was we endeavour'd to comfort our selves under so great and unexpected a Calamity, flattering our selves with hopes of seeing happier times.

When we had remained silent for a time, we said to him who brought us the first ill News Why do you content your self, by having thrown an unhappy mood among us, to have kindled an universal trouble in our minds, which as a single Spark will grow to a Flame, and do not tell us, what it is that hath transported the Emperor to so extravagant a resolution ?

Every body knows (replied the person) that he would be revered as a God : and because he is persuaded, that the Jews are the only persons, who will not acknowledge him for such, he believes he cannot any way afflict and punish them more than by dishonouring the Majesty, and profaning the sanctity of their Temple, which he knows is the most beautiful in the World, decorated and enriched with the Presents of so many Ages, which no doubt, but his beland's and impiety will tempt him to seize.

Capito, a Commissioner for the receipt of the Tributes in Judea, has irritated him likewise against us by Letters which he has writ. This Capito having little or no fortune before he was sent into this Province, and having feathered his Nest well by his exaction since he came, he has a mind to prevent by his Calumnies the just Complaints, which he apprehends the Jews would make against him, and he has made use of the occasion aforesaid.

Jamnia is one of the most populous Towns in Judea, and all its Inhabitants are Jews, except some few Strangers, who (unhappily for us) are come thither to acquaint themselves with the neighbouring Provinces. Their aversion for our Manners and Customs is so great, that they cease not to do us all the mischief that they are able to do ; and understanding that Caius was inflamed with an idle passion to be worshipped as a God, and that on that account he had conceived a mortal hatred against us, they thought they could never hope for a fairer opportunity to destroy us. Wherefore they erected an Altar of Brick upon no other design, but because they were sure we would never suffer the Laws of our Ancestors to be violated in that manner ; and their malice and cunning has had the effect which was intended. For the Jews having pull'd down their Altar, they who set it up made complaint immediately to Capito, who was the contriver of the plot, on purpose to ruine their fellow Citizens. This wicked man, transported as it were to have succeeded so far, failed not to write to Caius, exaggerating every thing, and adding much to the truth, to provoke him the more. The violent and audacious Emperor no sooner had the news, but he commanded, that in stead of an Altar of Brick, they should set up a Statue of him as big as a Colossus, which was to be Guilt over with Gold, and placed in the Temple of Jerusalem : in which resolution he had two principal Councillors, Helico that notorious Buffoon, and Apelles the famous Comedian. who (as is reported) having prostituted himself, and expell'd his beauty for money when he was young, was now got upon the Theater in his old age. and the modesty of that profession every man knows. By these excellent qualities these two excellent persons were got to be of Caius his Council. With the one he consulted in matters of Rallery and Wit ; and with the other how such speech was to be pronounced upon the Stage, not so much as concerning himself with the Peace and Tranquillity of the Empire.

F Helico, being an Egyptian, bit us like an Asp ; and Apelles being of Alcaon was no kinder than he.

Every word, that this person spoke, was like a dagger at our hearts : but these two wicked Councillors were not long without their Reward ; For Caius caus'd Apelles to be clapt in irons for other Crimes, and tortured him upon the Wheel, but with several intervals, to increase and spin out his punishment ; and Claudius succeeding Caius in the Empire, he put Helico to death for other considerable Reasons,

Petronius his great trouble about executing the Order which he had received from Caius; to set up his Statue in the Temple of Jerusalem, because he was sensible of the injustice of it, and foresaw the ill Consequences.

Caius wrote then that his Statue should be consecrated, and set up in our Temple, and omitted nothing, that might injoin the Execution of that Order. He commanded Petronius Governor of Syria, to take half the Army, which was posted along the Euphrates to defend those Countries against the Kings and People of the East, and to cause them to attend the Statue; not that they were to add to the Solemnity of its Consecration, but to cut those Jews in pieces, who should have the boldness to oppose him. Is it so then, most cruel Prince, that, fore-seeing these poor people will sooner expose themselves to death, than suffer the violation of their Laws, and the profanation of their Temple, you declare War against them, and send a formidable army to consecrate your Statue by the blood of so many innocent Victims, without sparing either Women or Men?

This Order gave Petronius much trouble, by reason that on the one side he knew Caius could not endure the least delay in his obedience, and on the other side he saw the execution of his Commands very difficult, because the Jews would suffer a thousand deaths rather, than suffer any violation of their Religion; For, though all other people are tender of their Laws, yet it comes far short of the bigotry of the Jews, who look upon theirs as Oracles given by God himself: They were brought up in it from their youths: They have it engraven in their hearts: They forbear not to admire it: They receive into the number of their Citizens such Strangers as embrace it: Look upon those as Enemies who despise it: And have so great a horror for every thing that contradicts it, that there is neither grandeur, nor fortune, nor any temporal felicity able to tempt them to violate it; Nor is there any greater evidence of their Respect and Veneration for their Temple, than that it is certain death for any of them to dare to enter into the Sanctuary: But for the rest entrance is free to all those of their Nation, of what Province soever.

Petronius revolving these things in his mind, found the Enterprize so difficult, that he made no haft to put it in execution; and the more he considered this affair, the more he was perswaded not to touch upon our Religion, as well because Justice and Piety obliged him to alter nothing therein, as because of the danger he was like to encounter, not only from the Judgement of God, but from the Resistance of the Jews, who by that action would be driven to despair. He considered likewise the numerousness of that Nation, which is not like the rest crowded up in one Province, but dispersed in so great numbers almost quite over the World both upon the Continent and in the Islands, that they are well nigh equal in number to the Natives. And this gave him occasion to apprehend, that assembling together from all parts they should kindle a War, that could not easily be extinguished, seeing they were already very strong in Judea, no less Politick than Valiant, and ready to dy with their Swords in their hands with invincible Courage, rather than abandon the Laws of their Fathers so excellently Just, though their Enemies would needs have them to be Barbarous.

This wife Governour was apprehensive likewise of such of that Nation as inhabited beyond the Euphrates, in Babylon and those Provinces: for he knew for certain, as having seen it with his Eyes, that they sent every year to the Temple, under the Title of First-fruits, the money which they called Holy: without considering the danger of the ways, how great soever it was, and all because prompted by a principle of Devotion. So that he believed, and not without reason, that as soon as the Jews should have notice of the Consecration of this Statue, they would put themselves instantly into the Field, and block him up on every side.

These thoughts detained him for some time; but it put his mind into great agitation and trouble, when he considered he had for his Master a young Prince, who knew no other Justice than his Will: who could not endure to be disobeyed, let his Commands be never so unequal, and whose pride and presumption transported him to that excess of folly, that causing him to forget his Humanity, he would needs pass for a God: So that he could neither execute nor decline the execution of his Orders without manifest danger of his Life; only there was this difference, he might have it perhaps in the War, where

A where the events are uncertain; whereas it was impossible to escape, if he refused obedience to his unmerciful Prince.

CHAP. XIV.

Petronius gave Order for this Statue, but it went on but slowly. He endeavoured in vain to persuade the Jews to receive it. The Jews forsake the Towns and the Country to wait upon him, and begg of him not to execute an Order, that would be more insupportable to them than death, but to give them leave to send their Deputies to the Emperor.

THE Roman Officers, who with Petronius had the greatest charge in the affairs of Syria, were all for a War: because, knowing the fury of Caius, they doubted not, but, if they declined it, he would discharge his indignation upon them, in confidence that they must needs be accessory in this disobedience. But by good fortune it hapned, that they had time to deliberate, whilst the Statue was making: for there was none sent out of Italy, which, I suppose, God in his mercy ordered for the safety of his People, as also that there was no direction to take the halcyon-st and best wrought that could be found in Syria, for without that the War had broke out so suddenly, that no remedy could have been found for so great a mischief.

Petronius, having concluded to have a Statue made, sent the ablest Statuaries in Phoenicia to be sent for, furnished them with materials, and appointed Sydon to be the place, as the most proper for such a business. Having done so, he sent for the Chief Priests and Magistrates of the Jews, declared to them the Emperor's Command, and exhorted them to submit, and not run themselves into Calamity and Troubles which would be otherwise unavoidable; for the greatest part of the Army in Syria had Orders to proceed with fire and sword in case of disobedience; And Petronius did not doubt, but it he could have prevail'd with them, they could have persuaded the rest of the People, but he found himself mistaken: for this discourse went to near them, that after for a while they had stood still as immovable, they brake out into Rivers of Tears, tore their beards and their hair, and cry'd out with a voice interrupted with sighs, Have we then lived to this hour, to see what our Ancestors never beheld? But how can we possibly see it, who will choose rather to lose our Eyes and our Life, than be spectators of so horrible an impiety?

This report being spread abroad in Jerusalem and in all Judea, the Jews left their Houses and Fields, as it had been by consent, and repaired to Phoenicia to wait upon Petronius. Their innumerable multitude made those People believe, who were ignorant, how populous a Country Judea was: that it was a great Army marching against Petronius, of which they gave him immediate advice; but they had no other Arms than their sighs and their cries; which fill'd the Air with such a noise, that it ceased not, when they laid them by, and had recourse to their Prayers, which the excess of their sorrow put into their mouths. They were distributed into six Classes, three on the one side, the Ancient, the Young Men, and the Children; and three on the other, the old Women, the young Women, and the Maidens.

When they were brought in to Petronius (who was placed higher than the rest) they threw themselves before him upon the ground, beating their Breasts, and lobbing out so many sighs, that nothing could be more pitiful: and though Petronius commanded them to rise and come nearer, they were scarce to be persuaded: At length they approached with ashes upon their Heads, their Eyes swimming with tears, and their Hands behind their Backs, as if they had been going to Execution: and he, who was spokesman for them all, delivered himself to Petronius in these Terms.

SIR, To remove all pretence of accusing us of any evil design, we are come not only without arms, but without any intention of making use of our hands, which are the Arms, that Nature has given to all mankind, and do therefore present our selves before you to be treated as you please. We have left our Houses destitute, and brought our Wives and our Children along with us, to the end we may join their instances with our own, and by your mediation supplicate the Emperor either to preserve or extinguish us all together. We are naturally lovers of Peace, and are the more impetuously inclined to it, because, our greatest pleasure being to bring up our Children in our own way, there is nothing that conduces more to it. When Caius was advanced to the Empire, and we understood it by his Letters to Vitellius (who was then Governour in Jerusalem, and in whose place you have succeeded) we gave him a testimony of our joy, and signified it by publishing diffusing the good news throu the rest of the Cities. Our Temple was the first place, where sacrificing was offered for the happiness of his reign: Would it be just that it should be the only place, where that Religion should be abolished, which had been observed there in all Ages? We will leave our Temples, our Goods, and our Possessions to your Mercy: all we beg is that nothing be introduced into our Temple, but that it may remain in the same condition, as it was left to us by our Fathers. If you will not grant us that favour, take away our Lives, which we can lose with much more satisfaction, than behold the violation of our blessed Laws. We are informed, that great forces are preparing to fall upon and constrain us, in case we oppose our selves against this Order; but we are not so imprudent as to resist our Master: We will sooner dy, than entertain any such wicked design: He may kill us, and cut us in pieces, if he pleases, without any such danger; we intend nothing of defence; we will be rather our own Priests, and when we have sacrificed our Wives, and our Children, and Relations, we will shed our own blood and mingle it with theirs, and expire in petitioning God Almighty, that he would not impute it to us as a Crime, seeing we do it not either for want of respect to the Emperour on the one side, nor for non-observance of our Laws on the other. But before we are reduced to that extremity, our humble request to you, Sir, is, That you would vouchsafe us but some time, till we can make our addresses to the Emperour: 'Tis possible we may obtain from him, that he will not intervehupon the Worship, which we conceive due only to God, nor disturb us in the exercise of our Religion, and put us into a worse condition, than other Nations, to whom he has indulg'd their ancient Liberties and Customs, and confirmed the Decrees of Augustus and Tiberius his Predecessors, who were so far from condemning our Conduct, or reprehending our manners, that they entirely approved them. It may be we may be mollified by our addresses: The anger of Princes is not immortal, nor are their wills always the same. It is only by Surmises and Calumnies that the Emperour is exasperated against us. Permit us (if you please) to justify our selves, and inform him of the Truth. And what could be more severe, than that we should be condemned without being heard? If we can obtain nothing from him, who will hinder him then from what he would do now? But do not, Sir, beseech you, by refusing us the only hopes which remain to so great a multitude, obstruct our application, seeing we beg it out of a true sentiment of Piety, and not any Interest, unless it be said (as is true) that no Interest is so great, as that which respects Preservation.

CHAP. XV.

Petronius affected with the Condition and Humility of the Jews, and believing it unsafe to run them into despair, writes to Caius in such a manner as might gain time. Caius resents it highly, but dissembles it in his answer to Petronius.

THIS Discourse was accompanied with so many sighs and tears, that it wrought compassion in all that heard it, and particularly in Petronius, who was naturally moderate, and merciful. For the request made to him in the Name of the whole Nation of the Jews seem'd not unreasonable, and nothing could be more deplorable, than the condition into which they were brought.

Petronius propos'd and debated the business with his Council, and was much pleas'd to find those persons, who were most bitter and inveterate against them before, come about and grow more gentle and mild, and others not afraid to declare, how much they were concerned for the Extreme affliction of that People: so that though he was not ignorant of the Cruelty of Caius, and that he never forgave any man, yet he seem'd to act by the motion of that Spirit, which the Piety of our Religion infuses: Whether it was that, being a learned Man, he had had some smattering of it before; whether he had gain'd it thence his Governments in Asia and Syria (in which Countries there are great numbers of Jews) whether it was his own natural propensity, that inclin'd him to what was reasonable and just; Or whether it was because God does give usually good inclinations to great Men, both for their own benefit and the advantage of the Publick; which of these it was, I cannot determine, but so it was at that time. The result was, that the Statuaries should not be press'd; but that Orders should be given them to employ the unskill of their skill, and make the Statue so accurately, that it might pass for a Matter-piece.

Persons, which are a short time in doing, are a short time in decaying; whereas such, as are made with more deliberation, last longer by far, and are esteem'd through several Ages.

Petronius

A Petronius did not encourage the Jews to send their Deputies towards the Emperour, because he thought it not for their advantage to depend wholly upon the Capricio of a young Prince; yet he did not absolutely forbid them, because he saw there was danger both on the one side and the other. However, he wrote a Letter to Caius (without mentioning the Application which the Jews had made to him) imputing the Cause of the Delay on the Consecration of the Statue to the Artills, who being to make it excellent had required more time, that it might be done more suitable to the dignity of the person it was design'd to represent. He thought by this trick to gain time, and it was likely Caius might comply, because Harvest was at hand, and he might very well apprehend that the Jews (being made desperate, and not valuing their Lives, after the violation of their Laws) might burn their own Corn and destroy all their fruit, which would be the more inconvenient, because he was assur'd that Caius was upon a Voyage to Alexandria: for it was not likely that he would expose himself wholly to the dangers of the Sea with so great a Train, but rather steer his Course along the Shore of Asia and Syria, where he might embark and disembark as he pleas'd, and have the benefit of his Long-boats (of which he had 200 in his fleet) to supply it with provisions and forrage, which was requisite to be prepared in great quantities in all the Towns in Syria, but especially the Ports, by reason of the vast numbers which attended him as well from Italy as from all other parts of the world.

It was not doubted but this Letter would have been kindly received by Caius, and C that he would have approved of the delay, not in consideration of the Jews, but for the convenience of making such provision of Victuals, and therefore it was written and dispatched. But the Choller of this Prince was so inflamed at the reading of it, that his Eyes sparkled with fury, and clapping his hands together in a great transport, he said,

How Petronius! Have not you yet learned to obey your Emperour? Your great employments have puff'd you up with pride, and it seems you know nothing of Caius but his Name; but you shall know him better hereafter by your proper experience. You have more consideration of the Laws of the Jews (who are my mortal Enemies) than for my Commands who am your Prince. You apprehend their great numbers, as if you had not an Army as great, and terrible to the King of Parthia, and the whole East; yet your compassion for that pitiful Nation is stronger than your desire to please and obey me. You pretend (forsooth) the necessity of making provision for my passage to Alexandria; as if I could not be accommodated from the neighbouring Provinces, and as if the plenty of other Countries were not able to supply the sterility of Judea.

But why do I protract and spend time in unprofitable words? 'Tis by the death of this impudent fellow that I must convince him of the greatness of his fault, and that mine anger never ceases, though my threatnings may.

This furious Prince returned an Answer to Petronius; but being fearful of provoking such of his Governours as were capable of raising Rebellion, and particularly those E who commanded such potent and large Provinces as that upon the Euphrates, and who had the command of such Armies as that which was then in Syria, he dissembled his Choller; applauded the discretion and prudence of Petronius; only advis'd him by the by not to protract the Consecration of his Statue any longer, for seeing Harvest was over, there could be no considerable reason to defer it.

CHAP. XVI.

King Agrippa comes to Rome, and being told by Caius that he would have his Statue erected in the Temple of Jerusalem, he falls into a swoon; having recollected himself, he writes a Letter to Caius.

NOT long after King Agrippa arrived at the Emperors Court, knowing nothing of the Letter from Petronius, nor of the Answer which Caius had returned: when Agrippa came to pay his duty to the Emperor, he easily discovered by the manner of his reception that he was highly offended. He considered with himself whether he had done any thing that might disgust him: but remembering nothing of that, he concluded (as was true) that his passion was against some Body else. Nevertheless observing that that agitation of Spirit appeared not in his Countenance, but when he cast his Eyes upon him, his fear continued, and it came often into his mind to take notice of it to him; but he forbore, lest by an imprudent curiosity he should pull the anger of his Prince, which was fixed upon other People, upon himself.

No man seeing farther into Peoples thoughts than Caius, he quickly perceived that Agrippa was disturbed, and told him; I will tell you what you are so desirous to understand. You know me too well to be ignorant, that I speak no less with my Eyes than with my Tongue: These honest men of your Nation are the only People who disdain to acknowledge me for a God; and do seem to run themselves desperately into ruin, by refusing their obedience to an order that I have given for the setting up a Statue of Jupiter in their Temple. They have met together from all the Cities and Countries to present a Petition, which in effect is nothing but to testify their contempt and disrespect to my Commands.

He would have proceeded, but Agrippa was surpris'd with so violent a sorrow, that he fainted before him, and had fallen down, had he not been sustained by those who were about him. He was carried off to his Lodgings, where he continued insensible for a considerable time.

The concernment of this poor Prince augmented the hatred that Caius had conceived against our Nation. If Agrippa (said he) who has always had an affection for me, and has been obliged to me by so many favours, has so great a Passion for the Laws of his Country, that he is not able to endure that I should cross them, or so much as mention it to him, without hatred to his Life, what am I to expect from the rest of the Jews, who are not obliged by any Considerations of me to abandon their sentiments?

All that day, and a good part of the next, Agrippa remain'd in such astonishment, that he could not recollect himself; at length about evening he began to lift up his head; and opening his eyes with much trouble, he cast them upon the People who were about him, but knew no body, and having done so he fainted again, but with something more freedom of breath. Not long after he opened his eyes again, and coming a little to himself, Where am I (said he) with the Emperor? and is he present?

Take courage Sir, (said some about him) You are in your own Lodgings, and the Emperor is not present. You have slept enough, awake now if you please, and try if you know us. Here are none but your Friends and your Servants, whom you love, and I am sure they love you beyond their own Lives.

Then the Prince opened his Eyes, recollected himself, and found by their countenances what an impression his malady had made in their hearts. The Physicians caused the greatest part of those who were present to withdraw, that they might apply their remedy, and give him to eat with more convenience. Upon their presenting him something to eat, he told them,

Trouble me not with your Delicacies: in the affliction I am in, it is sufficient to keep me from starving; and indeed I should not persuade myself to eat at all, had I not some hopes of being able to assist my Country-men in so unfortunate an extremity.

These words he delivered with Tears, and then took what was barely necessary, for the sustenance of his Life, and would not suffer them to mingle one drop of Wine with the Water which he drank. After which he told them, I have now received what I could not have refused without destruction to my body. There remains nothing, but that I employ the utmost of my endeavours with the Emperor to divert the storm that impends: and thereupon calling for materials, he writ this Letter to the Emperor,

S I R,

MY Respects and awe for your Majesty deters me from presenting my self before you. Your Lustre amazes me, and your Comminations affright me: A Letter will better express my humble request, than I could do it by word of mouth. You know (great Sir) that Nature has engraven in every man's heart an ardent affection for his Country, and a singular veneration for the Laws which have been derived to him from his Ancestors, as you have sufficiently testified by your Affection to the one, and by the great care your Majesty takes to have the other observed. The same inclination is so naturally and so strongly radicated in all subjects, that there is scarce a People, to whom their Laws do not seem just (though in effect they be otherwise) and the cause is, for that they judge commonly more by Respect than by Reason.

You are not ignorant Sir, that I am by Nation a Jew, and born in Jerusalem, where that blessed Temple is placed that is dedicated more particularly to the honour of Almighty God. My Predecessors have been Kings of that happy Country: Some of them have been Chief Priests, and exulted more in that dignity, than the Crown; being persuaded, that as God was above Men, so the Priesthood was above the Throne; Divine things being the Object of the one, and but Humane things of the other.

Finding my self (Great Sir) obliged by so many Ligaments to this Nation, this Interest, and this Temple, I could not refuse them my Intercession to your Majesty; Let me therefore with all humility beg, that you would not permit my poor Country-men to lessen their Zeal and Allegiance to you, of which no People in Europe or Asia have always given greater testimony for your August Imperial Family, in what ever their Religion and Laws would dispence with. They have not only made Vows and Sacrifices for the prosperity of your Empire upon publick Feasts and Solemnities, but every day. Which shews that it was not only by bare words, and false obligations, but by real effects proceeding from the sincerity of their hearts, that they signified their affection to your Predecessors.

As to that sacred City in which I had the happiness to be born, I may say it is not to be considered only as the Metropolis of Judea, but it is the Capital City of several other Provinces, by reason of the many Colonies with which it has peopled Egypt, Phenicia, the upper and lower Syria, Pamphilia, Cilicia, several other parts of Asia, as far as Bithynia, and a great way on the other side of the Sea.

In Europe, it hath furnished with Colonies, Thessalia, Bessia, Macedonia, Etolia, Athens, Argos, Corinth, with the greatest part of Peloponnesus, besides the most celebrated Isles, as Euboea, Cyprus and Candia.

What shall I say likewise of the Countries beyond the Euphrates, in which (unless it be part of the Province of Babylon, and some other Governments) most of the Cities that are seated in fruitful Countries are inhabited by the Jews? So that if the Country, in which I had the honour to be born, may find favour in your Eyes, you will not (great Sir) oblige one single Town, but a vast number of Cities in all places of the World; and it would be a thing suitable to your Grandeur and Fortune to have all people participate of your favours to them; for there is no part of the Earth in which your glory will not be proclaimed, nor any person living that will refuse you those praises and acknowledgments that will be due to you.

At the request of some of your private friends you have given whole Cities the freedom of Rome, and thereby advanced them before others, to whom they were formerly inferior; in which you obliged (no less than the Towns) the Persons by whose intercession you granted that honour.

I can say without vanity, that among all the Princes, who pay obedience to your Majesty, there are very few who precede me in dignity, but none who surpasses (I may say equals me) in point of affection to your Majesty, both as I am born your Subject, and obliged by many express and particular favours. I dare not be so confident as to beg the freedom of Rome for my Country-men, to exempt them from Tributes, or give them Infranchisement: I request, Sir, only a favour that will be no charge or inconvenience to your Majesty, but a great benefit to them; and there is none so great a benefit to the Subject, as the favour of their Prince.

Jerusalem had the first news of your happy succession to the Empire, and published it immediately through all the neighbouring Provinces. Since then Jerusalem was the

"the first City in the East, that proclaimed you Emperour, may not see with reason H
"hope for some particular grace, at least not to be put into a worse condition than any "of her Neighbours?

"Having spoken for my Nation and Country-men, it remains that I do now with all "humility supplicate you for our Temple, being consecrated to God Almighty, and "his Majesty inhabiting it. We have never admitted any Image or Statue there, because "Painters and Sculptors represent only such Deities as are visible, and the God which we "worship being invisible, our Ancestors have thought, that they could not without im-
"piety undertake any such representation.

"Agrippa your Grandfather had a respect for this Temple: Augustus ordered by Let"ters expresses that the First-fruits should be brought thither from all parts, and that not a I
"day should pass but Sacrifices should be made.

"The Emperess your great Grandmother had it in the same Veneration. There "was neither Greek nor Barbarian, nor Prince (how great soever his pique was to us)
"nor Sedition, nor War, no Captivity, nor other of the greatest desolations that could "happen to any People, that could ever prevail with us to admit an Image into our "Temple; for even our greatest Enemies have born a reverence for this place, because "it was consecrated to the Creator of the Universe, for fear of those dreadful Judge"ments, which they knew had befallen those persons, who had had the boldness to vio-
"late it; of which, without instancing in Foreign Examples, I shall recount such as are
"domestick to your Majesty.

"When Marcus Agrippa your Grandfather in favour to King Herod my Grandfather K
"condescended to visit Judea, and coast along the Shore to Jerusalem, he was so taken
"with the Magnificence of the Temple, with its Ornaments, the diversity of the Orders "of the Priests, with their Vestments, and particularly with the habit of the Chief Priest,
"with the formality of their Sacrifices, and the Devotion of those who assisted: That he "could not forbear testifying his admiration. He took so much pleasure in the contem"plation of these things, that there was not a day past, whilst he remained at Jerusalem,
"but he visited them all, offered magnificent Presents, and granted to the Inhabitants "of that great City all that they could desire but exemption from Taxes.

"Herod paid him all the honour he could devise, and having received much greater L
"from him, attended him in person to the Sea-side, the People flocking from all parts
"to throw boughs and flowers in his way, accompanying him with a thousand Bene"dictions.

"Is it not, Sir, a thing known all the World over, that the Emperour Tiberius your "great Uncle during the 23 years of his reign had the same respect for our Temple, not "suffering any body to make the least alteration in the Orders observed there? Upon "which account (though otherwise I was a great sufferer by him) I cannot contain from "recounting an action that redounded much to his honour, and I know you take de"light in hearing the Truth. Pilate the then Governour of Judea consecrated to him M "in the Palace of Herod at Jerusalem certain guilt Bucklers not so much in honour to "him; as hatred to our Nation. There was no Image engraven upon the Bucklers, nor "no Inscription, but the Name of him who dedicated them, and the Name of him to "whom they were dedicated. Nevertheless the People tumultuated in such manner,
"that they employed the four sons of the King, the other Princes of the Blood, and the "most considerable Persons of our Nation to persuade Pilate to cause the Bucklers to be "removed, by reason it was contrary to the Customs of their Ancestors, which Customs "neither Kings nor Emperours had ever infring'd before; and seeing Pilate (who was
"of a violent and obstinate nature) did seem to refuse them, they cried out, Have a
"care of troubling the Peace which we enjoy: Have a care how you provoke us to Revolt, and "War: 'tis not by the violation of our Laws that the Emperour is to be honoured; you N
"must find another pretence to colour so unjust an Enterprize, and so insupportable to us; for this "magnanimous Prince is far from intrenching upon our Customs: If you have any Commission
"to that purpose, any Letter or other Order to authorize you in what you do, let us see it, and "we will dispute persons to wait upon him with our humble Remonstrances. These words
"exasperated Pilate, yet gave him much trouble, for he feared, that if they sent their "Deputies, they would inform the Emperour of his Exactions, Injustices, and horrible
"Crusties, by which he had afflicted many innocent persons, and put as many to death.

"In so great an anxiety Pilate, notwithstanding his Passion and Severity, knew not "what way to steer. He durst not take away the Bucklers, because they had been con"secrated; and if he durst have ventured upon that, he could not frame himself to com- O
"ply with the People, and besides he knew the mind of Tiberius.

Thofe

A "Those who interceded for the Jews perceiving, that though he dissembled it
"what he could, yet he repented of what he had done, writ a Letter to Tiberius with "great instance and respect; and there needs no further proof of its effects, than that
"after he had signified his displeasure to Pilate in his immediate Answer, he sent to him
"his Commands to remove the Bucklers to the Temple at Cesaria, which was built in "honour to Augustus, and it was done accordingly; by which invention all due respect
"was paid to the Emperour, without any invasion of our Laws. Those Bucklers
"had no image upon them, and yet now our Controversie is about a Statue: Those "Bucklers were placed only in the Palace of the Governour; and this Statue must be "set up in the Sanctuary, a place so holy, that there is only the high Priest permitted
"to enter, and that only one time in the year (after a solemn Fast) to burn Perfumes in "honour to God, and by his humble Prayers to implore his blessing on our whole Nation "for the next year. If any other, not only of the Comonalty, but of the Priests (not "excepting him who is next to the high Priest) presumes to enter; or if the high "Priest himself enters it above once a year, or more times that very day in which he has
"liberty to enter, than what is allowed by our Law, it will cost him his Life; nothing "can save him; so peremptory has our great Lawgiver been in his Orders for the reve"rencing this holy Place, and for the making it inaccessible. You are not then to doubt,
"great Sir, but your Statue shall be no sooner erected, but several of the Priests will "rather kill themselves, their Wives, and their Children, than be spectators of such "violence to their Laws.

"Thus it was that Tiberius acted upon this occasion; and as to that Prince (the hap-
"piest that ever govern'd the Empire) your most excellent Predecessor (who, having "given Peace to the whole World, deserved for his virtue and great exploits the glori"ous name of Augustus) when he understood, that we admitted not into our Temple
"any visible Image, as being improper to represent an invisible God, he admired the "Piety and Knowledge of our Nation, being learned himself, and accustomed to pass
"the greatest part of his time at meals in discourse of Philosophical points, that he had "been taught by the greatest Masters, and in the Conversation of learned Men, which "he kept constantly about him, that his Mind might receive its repast as well as his "Body.

D "I could instance in several other things evincing his kindness to our Nation, but I "shall content my self with two.

"Being informed that there was a neglect in bringing in our First-Fruits, he sent to "the Governours of the Provinces in Asia, to permit only the Jews to assemble toge"ther, because their meetings were not like the Bacchanals, to drink and debauch; and "contrive against the Peace of the Publick; but Academies of Virtue, where People "were instructed to love Justice and Temperance; and as to their First-Fruits, which "were sent annually to Jerusalem, they were employed only to offer Sacrifices to God "in the Temple. Wherefore this great Prince expressly forbid every body for molest"ing the Jews in what related to their Meetings and First-Fruits. If these were not "the very words, I am sure it was the sense, as your Majesty may know by one of the "Letters of C. Norbanus Flaccus, of which I have brought you a Copy.

"C. Norbanus Flaccus to the Magistrates of Ephesus, Greeting. The Emperour has "writ to me, that in all places under my Government, where there are any Jews, I should "permit them to assemble according to their ancient Customs, and to raise money to be sent to "Jerusalem: I do advise and require, that you give them no interruption.

"Doth not the favour and affection of Augustus to the Jews appear clearly hereby,
"seeing he permits the Jews to assemble publicly to collect their First-Fruits, and per"form other actions of Piety and Devotion?

F "I will give you another proof, and that no less considerable. He commanded that a "Bull and a Ram should be offered every day at his charge in honour to our God,
"which is observed to this day without any discontinuance; yet he knew that there "was no Image permitted either within the Temple or without: and no person surpas-
"sing him in knowledge, he thought it but reasonable, that there should be a Temple
"peculiarly dedicated to the invisible God, in which there should be no Image, and
"where men might utter their Prayers and Devotions with confidence of relief.

"The Emperess Julia, your Majesties great Grand-mother, imitating the Piety of "her incomparable Husband, adorned our Temple with several inestimable Vessels
"of Gold, without any Image engraven upon them, because, though Women do not "easily comprehend invisible things, yet her Wit and inclination to great matters had G "so elevated her in that (as in other things) above the pitch of her sex, that the un"derstood

"derstood intellectual things as well as sensible; and she was persuaded that the later H were but Types and Shadows of the former.

"Since then you have so many pregnant Examples at home of the great affection of your Predecessors to us; Continue, I beseech you, what they, from whom your person and succession is derived, have so carefully preserved.

"They are Emperours, who intercede in the behalf of our Laws to an Emperour; They are great Princes, to a great Prince; They are Grand-fathers and Grandmothers, to a Grand-child; Several to one single Person; all of them admonishing as it were in these terms; Do not you abolish what we have established, and what has been always observed; but consider, that though the subversion of this Order may possibly produce no ill effects immediately, yet the uncertainty of future Events ought to make the most hardy to fear, if they have not wholly renounced the fear of their Creator.

"Should I go about to recount all my Obligations to your Majesty, the day would fail me before I had finished; and yet it troubles me to pass them over too soon; But so great benefits will publish themselves. You have beat off my Irons, but those Irons incumbered but part of my Body, and the pain, that I now suffer, oppresses my Soul. You have delivered me from the apprehension of Death, and afterwards revived me, when a greater apprehension had put me into such a state, that I was lookt upon as dead. Preserve then, I beseech you, that Life, that you have restored, and would not doubtless have restor'd to have prolong'd my misfortunes.

"Your Majesty has advanced me to the greatest honour, that can be aspired; you have given me a Kingdom, and added to that Kingdom Trachonitis and Galilee. After such extraordinary Favours, do not, I beseech you, refuse me another; so necessary, that the not granting of that will make the other unprofitable; and when you have rais'd me to so glorious, so illustrious a condition, do not humble me down again into darkness and sorrow.

"I do not beg of you to continue me in that high sphere, where your favour has plac'd me. All that I beg is, That you would not interfere with the Laws of my Country; and if you deny me that, what will my Country-men, what will the whole World think of my Interest with you? Will not they have reason to believe, that I have either betray'd my Country, or lost the honour of your favour, which are two the greatest Evils that I dread? Nevertheless I must of necessity fall into one of them, seeing I must either be Cowardly or Perfidious in deserting an Interest, that ought to be so dear to me; Or else I must have lost my Interest in your kindness, if, imploring your Mercy for the preservation of the Temple and my Country, you should not think fit to use me with the same favour, that former Emperours have shewn to all such, as they did honour with their kindness.

"If I be so unfortunate as to be pleasing to you no longer, do not cast me into Bonds as Tiberius did, but put me immediately to death; For why should I desire to live, having lost your Majesties favour, in which only I repos'd my greatest confidence and hopes?

Caius was wrought upon by Agrippa's Letter, and sent to Petronius to do nothing in the Temple at Jerusalem. But he repented presently, and caused a Statue to be made in Rome, which he ordered to be sent privately to Jerusalem at the same time, when he should go to Alexandria, where he likewise resolved to be acknowledged for a God. The Injustice and Cruelty of that Prince.

WHEN King Agrippa had seal'd and dispatch'd this Letter to Caius, he expected the success with all imaginable impatience, as judging, that not only the Conservation or Ruine of Judea was at Stake, but the Interest of the whole Nation of the Jews spread abroad over the whole Earth.

This Letter produced great agitation in the mind of Caius. He could not with patience behold his Pleasure disputed, and yet he could not but be touched with the Reasons and importunity of Agrippa. He blam'd his affection for them, who were the only People, that durst withstand the Consecration of his Statue; and yet he could not but approve the sincerity of that Prince, as proceeding from the nobleness and generosity of his mind. At length his kindness for Agrippa prevailed against his Choller; he was mollified by degrees, returned him a favourable answer, and granted him the height of all favours, that he would desire from the aforesaid Consecration. After which he writ to Petronius to make no farther alteration in the Temple; but he blended his grace with such severe Conditions, as gave them always occasion to tremble; for he added this Clause to his Letter, But if in any other Town beside Jerusalem any body thinks fit to erect any Statue or Altar to me or mine, and any one be found so audacious as to oppose it, it is our pleasure, that he be banished upon the place, or sent Prisoner to us.

Was not this to revoke or cancel his favour at the same time when he granted it, seeing those words could not be considered, but as seeds of Commotion and War? For who doubted but those People, who were Enemies to the Jews, would fill their Provinces with sacrilege, and such marks of honour, as are due only to God (and that rather to destroy our Nation, than to oblige Caius) and then the Jews not being able to suffer such an outrage upon their Laws, Caius, to punish their resistance, would de novo command the Statue to be set up and consecrated in the Temple? Nevertheless, by the manifest protection of God, none of the People adjacent to Judea gave them this occasion of trouble, though there was so much cause to apprehend it. But some will say, What advantage had they by it? for though others sate still, Caius himself did not: For he immediately repented of the favour which he had granted, reasum'd his old resolution, and taking notice of the Statue that was making at Sidon (left it should beget a revolt) he gave order for a new one to be made of gilt Brass in Rome, with directions that it should be sent privately by Sea, and without notice let up in the Temple of Jerusalem, when he went himself into Egypt.

He omitted no Order in the preparation for his Voyage to Alexandria, so great was his desire to see it; and so firm his resolution to continue therein some time, because no other place seem'd to him so convenient for the execution of his ridiculous design of being owned for a God, out of an opinion he had, that the example of that great City (by reason of its situation, and the resort thither from all parts of the world) might induce other Towns less considerable to give him the same divine honour, as he was assur'd of in Alexandria. Besides, he was of so light and inconstant a nature, he never did any good thing, but he repented of it immediately, and found out some way to revoke it, and make things very much worse than before; and of this I shall give you some proof.

Having set certain Prisoners at liberty one day, he caus'd them about an hour after to be clapt up again without any hopes of ever being discharged any more, though they had committed nothing in the interim, that might move his displeasure.

Another time he sent others into Exile, who had committed nothing at all, and he look'd upon that sentence as a favour, because they, knowing his horrible inhumanity, expected, and had prepared themselves for death. Accordingly they were sent into the Islands, where they were put to plough and cultivate the Earth, and they took their misfortune patiently. But on a sudden, though they had given no new provocation, he sent Soldiers, and put them all to the sword, which was a great affliction to several great Families in Rome.

If he gave money at any time to any body, he would be sure to have it again, not by way of loan, or upon condition to pay them Interest, but by way of Authority and Violence; and the poor people were not only glad to restore it, but they scap'd well, if it did not cost them all their own, whether it was their Parrimony, or acquired by their own Industry and Labour.

Those, who thought themselves highest in his favour, he ruin'd under pretence of affecting; obliging them to such excessive expences in vain Feasting and Entertainments, that sometimes one single Treat was so magnificent and sumptuous, that it was sufficient to undo a man utterly, and forced him to borrow, what he was never able to pay; upon which score some persons were afraid of his friendship, because it was not only useless, but dangerous; and to be esteemed rather a snare, than an advantage.

This was the humour of Caius, who hating no nation like the Jews, no Nation felt so much the effects of his hatred. He began in Alexandria to sequester their Oratories, and fill them with Statues, and no man durst oppose to great a Violence. There was now only the Temple at Jerusalem unviolated; and to compleat his Impiety, he would needs ravish that from God, and impropriate it to himself, with this Title,

THE TEMPLE OF THE NEW JUPITER, THE ILLUSTRIOUS CAIUS.

What do you intend, most presumptuous and insatuated Prince? You are but a Man, K and would usurp upon God. 'Tis not enough for you to have dominion over so many People, that there is scarce a Nation or Climate, to which your Empire does not extend! But you will not suffer in the whole World one single Place to be appropriated to God Almighty, in which it may be lawful with sincere Piety to pay him that Devotion, which is due to his Divine Majesty.

Are these the great hopes which the World conceived of your Reign? Or do you not know, that this course is no less, than to draw upon your self and your whole Empire a deluge of all imaginable mischiefs?

CHAP. XVIII.

With what austerity Caius treated Philo, and the other Ambassadors from Alexandria, and how he would not be persuaded to hear what they could say.

BUT we must come now to the Passages in our Embassy. The day appointed M for our Audience being come, we were no sooner introduced, but we could easily perceive by his Mine and his Gestures, that Caius was rather become a Party than a Judge. For if he would have acted like a Judge, he should have advised with his Counsel in an affair of that importance, wherein all the Priviledges were in question, that for four hundred years together had been enjoyed by so great a multitude of Jews, as lived in Alexandria, without the least intrenchment or molestation. He ought to have heard both sides, debated the whole matter with his Counsel, and afterwards pronounced a just and equitable arrest. But, instead of proceeding by those methods of Justice, the pitiless Tyrant, bending his brows upon us with a furious Brutality, caused the two Intendants of the Gardens of Mecenas and Lamia (which are near both the Town and his Palace) to be called to him (for he had been retired thither for his recreation three or four days) He commanded them to open the doors of the several Apartments, which opened into those Gardens, for he was disposed to walk, and gave Order that we should follow.

We threw our selves down at his feet, and saluted him with the Titles of Emperour and August. The manner in which he received our Salutation was such, that we quickly found, that we were to despair not only of success in our Embassy, but the safety of our Lives. For he told us frowning, and with an angry kind of smile; Are not you the declared Enemies of the gods? Are not you they, who, when others acknowledge my Divinity, do refuse and despise me?

And saying so, he lifted up his hands towards Heaven uttering such expressions, that I heard with too much horror to repeat them again.

O. R.

A Our Adversaries observing it, and concluding that they had gain'd their Cause, could not conceal their excess of Joy; and there was not one of all the Attributes, wherewith God himself is honoured, but they gave to him.

There was a person named Idorus, a great and dangerous Calumniator, who, perceiving Caius to be infinitely well pleased with his Flatteries and Cajolments, said to him, Sir, You would abhor these people much more, and these who sent them; did you know their malice against you. They are the only People, who refuse to offer Sacrifice for your safety; and generally the whole Nation is guilty of the same stubbornness. At which words we were not able to contain; but cried out, that it was false; for we sacrificed Hecatombs to that purpose; and having wash'd our Altars with the blood of our Victims, we did not devour the flesh of our felous like several other Nations, but burn'd all together in that sacred fire, and this we have done more than once or twice; for we did it three times, first upon your advancement to the Throne: Next, when you recovered of your great fit of sickness, which was an affliction to the whole World: And the third time, when we made it our solemn prayer to God Almighty to give you success in your Enterprizes in Germany.

'Tis true (the furious Emperour reply'd) you offered Sacrifices, but it was to amuse, not to me; and therefore, What honour did I receive by it?

We could perceive at those horrid words our blood to freeze in our veins. In the mean time Caius passed from one apartment to another, finding fank where any thing was amiss, and giving order how it should be mended. We followed him, jostled and derided by our Adversaries, who abus'd and mock'd us, like Mimicks on a Stage; and indeed our whole negotiation might have pass'd for a Comedy, having nothing in it but appearance of Truth. For he, who ought to have been our Judge, was our Accusers; and our own party animated him against us. Having him therefore for an Enemy, and such an Enemy, what could we do but be silent? And being silent is a kind of defence, especially where nothing can be said, that would have been pleasing to him, and the fear of his violence upon our Laws had shut up our mouths.

When he had given direction about his buildings, he demanded seriously and with great gravity of us, Why we were so scrupulous in eating of Hog's-flesh? Upon which our Adversaries (to Cajole him with their flatteries) fell out into so immoderate and undecent a laughter, that some of the Prince's Officers, which were about him, could scarce brook so great a disrespect; and it was so much the greater, by how much his humor was such, there was not any but his Privado's and Intimates, that could without danger take the liberty upon them of but smiling in his presence.

We replied most humbly to the Emperour, That the Customs of People were different, and that as among us there were some things forbidden, so there were others prohibited to other Nations. And one of our Company instancing in those who eat no Lamb, the Emperour laugh'd & reply'd, They have no reason for the flesh is not good. These raileries augmented our trouble very much; but at length, in some kind of heat he asked us, upon what grounds we founded our freedom? We began to lay before him our grounds, and he foreseeing well that they would be reasonable, and that we had many more to corroborate them, he rose up on a sudden, and ran into a great Chamber, causing his servants to shut the Windows, whose glass was contriv'd so as to let in the Light, but keep out the Wind; and was as clear as Crystal. We followed, and he came to us again, and demanded of us very moderately, what we had more to say? We would have gone on with our Reasons, but in stead of hearing them, he ran again in great speed into another Hall, where he had commanded several ancient Pictures to be brought for him to see; so that finding our selves so often interrupted in our affairs, and in such different manner, supposing we were to expect nothing but death, we address'd our selves in our extremity to the true, for protection against the counterfeit God: and it pleas'd him to have compassion on us, and by his infinite goodness to moderate the fury of Caius, who commanded us to withdraw, and went away himself, only saying to those who were next him, These People are not so bad, as unfortunate and bestot not to believe me to be of Divine nature.

In this manner we departed not only from his Judgment, but from his Theater, and Prison, for what was it but a Theater, where we were laugh'd at and derided? And the rigors of a Prison are they comparable to the torments we endured from so many Blaphemies against God, and so many Menaces from an enraged Tyrant against us? Because ours (forsooth) was the only Nation, that obtruded his being owned for a God.

G Upon this we desisted, and respited for a while, not out of love to our Lives, for could our death have been servicable to the conservation of our Laws, we would have embrac'd it it with joy, as conducting us to a happy Eternity. But because besides this it would have been destructive to our Laws, and offensive to those who sent us, for as much as the management of such things are usually judged by their success, we comforted our selves in some measure, that we had escaped such a danger, yet not without continuing in great apprehensions, what judgment the Emperor would give. For how could he be informed of the Equity of our Cause, when he vouchsafed not so much as to hear us? And what could be more cruel, than to see the safety of our whole Nation depend upon the manner, after which we five (who were Embassadors) should be treated? For if Caius should declare in favour of the Alexandrians, what other Town would let the Jews live in quiet? What other Town would forbear them? What other would not destroy their Oratories? What other would not refuse them the Exercise of their Religion? So that the abolition of all their Privileges, and the entire Ruine of the whole Nation were before us, and the thoughts of them overwhelmed us with sorrow; and the more, because we could see no resort nor refuge from our miseries: For those who before seemed to favour our Affairs, began now to despair of our safety, and retired not daring to assist us any farther, though we sent to importune them; so little expectation had they of Bounty or Justice from a Man, who would make himself a God.
